Most Excellent and Most Sacred

MAJESTY

SIR,

Lthough the quality of this work be truly fuch , that, confiders ing the brightness of Royal Majesty, and the obscurity of its own extraction, it cannot expect a bare acceptance, much lefs plead any merit in this address, yet doth it find more reason for hope than despair; for as much as the whole World hath taken notice that your Majesty's Grace and Clemency is founded more upon the transcendent goodness of your own Disposition than the qualifications of your Subjects. Allowance hereby being made for what is mine, it were needless to insist upon the Nobility and usefulness of the Subject, the excellency whereof as humane transferideth not your Orb, and the utmost improvement of which is within the sphear of your activity. It were a piece of pedantry to shew to your Majesty that History is the store-house whence Precedents may be fetched for all forts of Actions, Publick and Private, Military and Civil; that it is a Mirrour of prudence to shew both their beauty and deformity, a Touchstone to discover deceits, an Incentive to virtue, and a Terror unto vice; that in it are contained the Prudence of times, imbecillity and strength of Nations, Reasons of State, Councils of Peace, and Stratagems of War; that in it Monarchy triumpho eth over the Confusions, Alterations, and Seditions of Popular Government. And should I go about to instance in the various helps it affoardeth to the management of Civil matters, I might justly incur more than the cenfure that light upon him, who was so impertinent as to read a Lecture of the Art of a General in the presence of Hannibal. For it may justly be said that your Majesty hath improved History to the utmost; that your actions have so far imitated antient Patterns as to exceed them. Others have wasted and destroyed Nations, you have recovered and restored three dying ones. 0= thers have raged with fire and sword, have rooted out, overt urned, and made defolate; your Majesty by Mercy and Grace hath replanted, settled, and in. riched. Alexander conjugated the effeminate Persians, and subdued other Nations whom their own unfitness for Military matters helped him to overcome. Cæsar tamed the naked Galls, and painted Britains, whom fool-hardiness and barbarism had armed against themselves; or if there be any other Atchievements of them, or others, which feem more glorious, yet the valour of their Soldiers, the experience of their times and vicifitude of humane affairs, challenge to themselves the greatest share of reputation. Your Majesty hath subdued those things which are beyond Mars his reach: You have tamed wild and extravagant pafsions of men, Conquered Stubborn and perverse dispositiones Laid low prejudice, and convinced such, whom all these Distempers had rendred affectedly ignorant and disobedient. Your Majesty's Conquests therefore so much more excel the commendations of others, as it is more glorious to cure than kill, to restore than to destroy, to follow the dictates of Compassion and Mercy, than of indignation and revenge, to Conquer the mind than the Body; and indeed to overcome one's felf than subdue others. That this is no flattery History will as-Certain future times, and both the mouths and hearts of your People at prefent do testifie, which, though in other matters they may disagree, yet all unite, in this concent, that you are the True Father of your Countrey. In our acclamations during those folementies of your Majesty's Royal Coronation feeing there is no need of wishing you the Goodness of Trajari, we so much the more pray that the Happiness of Augustus may light upon you, and that those folemuities may in one part imitate the Secular ones among ft the Romans, that though some of us have heretofore seen the like, yet through the length of your happy Reign none of us may do it for the time to come. I for my part, though a well-wisher to History, unfeignedly defire, that not till after very many years so great an accession of glory may come to it, as will accrue from the passages of your Majesty's Government; and that in the mean time your Majesty may be as happy in the Love and Loyalty of your People, as they are in your Princely clemency and care. To this, both a fense of merit and duty binds me, being

Your Majesties most Loyal Subject

WILLIAM HOWEL.

PREFACE.

He French (who first Introduced this Custom into the World of writing Prefaces before the works of others) have used that liberty with so much excess in the commendation of their friends, that they have rendred it not only suspected to the Reader, but prejudicial to their repute whom they intended to honour by it. But as I cannot approve the indifcreet zeal of those persons that would rather abrogate a good Office when abus'd, than indeayour to reform it. I would neither wave an imployment which gave me the occasion of hinting to the Reader some such things as may be of concernment to him in the perulal of this work, and which the modesty of the Author would not permit him to communicate, neither on the other fide would I willingly recede from the strictness and feverity of truth. So that whatfoever shall fall from me to his advantage shall not need any favourable construction to make it pass, nor shall I take that freedom to mix Fiction and History together: The use of this latter is so obvious to every eye, that it is needless to foeak much of it, it shall suffice me in short to say, that by the knowledge of History we are taught wisdom, and led to virtue, there being nothing in the Actions or Fortunes, either of publick or private persons, to which somewhat in former Ages bore not a resemblance, and which by a due confideration of the circumstances we may not with profit apply to our present occasions. How much we are excited to virtue by it, they that know the power of Emulation in noble minds will eafily conclude: which is manifest by the famous examples of Themistocles, whom the victories of Miltyades robbed of his repose, of Alexander, who was stirred up to the desire of glory by reading the actions of Achilles, as Cafar by reflecting upon his; add to this, that fuch persons whom these Precedents of virtue will not encourage to it, are aw'd by History from running headlong into vice, when they cannot but look on the writers of the prefent Age to be fet as fpies upon their Actions, and must expect when they are dead to be exposed without fear or flattery to the Impartial censure of the living. For who is there that would fo much value the pleasure of a glass of Wine, as not to abstain from drinking it, if he knew it had been all night steep'd in Antimony.

These, besides many others, are the benesits which accrue to us by the knowlege of History in general, but that I may inform the World how much it is acknowleging to the worthy Author of this Institution in particular, and wherein those excellencies of his consist, which distinguish him from the ordinary crowd of Historians, Ut possit digits monstrair or dicier bit offs, I must take leave to insist upon these ensuing heads, wherein I shall plainly make appear to the equal and candid Reader, that History is reduced by him in this work to such order, and exact Method, as never yet in any Language.

For

For, first you have here all the Empires in distinct Chapters by themselves, with the Contemporaries of them distinguished in the same manner from each other, and from the Empire to which they were coataneous. Whereas both in Systems and in larger Volumes of General History they are mingled together with a strange confusion, like the several ingredients of an Olio in the same Dish, where the variety of the Meats destroy the taste of one another, and he that would read any History by it self, finds it immediately embroyl'd and interwoven with the affairs of other Nations, so that he will not easily form a perfect idea in his mind of that which is given him but in parcels.

In the next place this Author has furnished you with a general Defeription of Greece, its antient Kingdoms and Commonwealths, from their first Originals, the succeptions of Kings, changes of Government, and forms of the several Republicks, with the power and nature of their respective Magistrates and Officers, not omitting the most considerable Customs, Laws, and Antiquities of each of them, deduced from the best Hiltorians, whom you still find quoted in the Margent; this, as it hath never been intirely performed by any Author heretore, so ought it to set a peculiar mark of Honour upon ours, who hath been careful to give us an exact account of that Countrey, which was the Mother of Arts and Sciences. After this, if we will turn our eyes upon the Macedonian Empire. and the several parts and branches of it, as the Kingdoms of Syria,. of Macedon, and Ægypt, we shall still have greater occasion to admire the learn'd diligence of the Author. The Grecian Monarchy after the decease of Alexander not being more dismembred and rent in pieces by his Succeffors, than by those Writers who have transmitted the memory of it to posterity, particularly, the Asian and Ægyptian Kingdoms under the Seleucida and Ptolomies have never been compiled in one History, and I have often wondred in my perusal of this Inflicution, by what means the Author of it could arrive at so clear a knowledge of those perplex'd successions. It was certainly a work of great labour to compare Historians, and to weave these several Arguments and loose pieces into one entire Loom, which I the rather mind the Reader of, because it is not easily perceiv'd by every ordinary capacity; for the uniformity of the style, and the unbroken order of the whole is such, that they only who are conversant in Antiquities are able to judge what travel and study were required to it.

The Roman History next invites our observation; wherein the success of this Author hath sufficiently recompensed his worthy pains; I dare confidently affirm, No modern Pen hath yet carried it on with so great light from the Original of the City to the time of Constantine. For from the banishment of Tarquin to the new modelling of the Government by Augustus, you have all the Intermediate Changes, Alterations, and Seditions of it, while yet. 2 State; as, the contests of the Patritians and Commons, with the several motives of them; The displacing and restoring of Annual Magistrates, the Description of their Offices, the Rites and Ceremonies of their Religion; all collected with great diligence from the Fathers of Roman Hiltory, but never given us in one body by antient Authors, or by any of later days. I confess I have read a French Historian, who from the Reign of Augustus almost to that of Justinian hath given me the greatest satisfaction of any man; Yet he often amuseth himself (as some of our bad Chroniclers at home have done) with passages of small concernment, and below the Dignity of an Hiltorian to relate: and from the Foundation of the City to Augustus, pays his Readers with a bare translation of Florus. Sr. Walter Rawleigh (never to be mentioned without honour) concludes his History with the end of the Macedonian War, and the conversion of that Kingdom into a Roman Province: much about the same time we are forsaken by our best Guide Livy, whose Decads from the Captivity of Perfeus to the time of Octavius Cafar (whose Contemporary he was) are wholly loft: for in the conclusion of his fourty fifth Book (the last which is left us) he introduces King Prusas speaking to the Romans, whom he came to visit, in these words ; Deos qui urbem Romam incolerent Senatumque & Populum Romanum salutatum se venisse, & gratulatum quod Persea Gentiumque Reges vicissent, Macedonibusque & Illyris in Ditionem redactis, auxissent Imperium. But as this Author hath supplied the Defects of Livy, and continued the Roman History five hundred years beyond Sr. Walter Rawleigh, so in the alteration of the Government from a Commonwealth to a Monarchy by Augustus, the reasons which induced the Emperour to make that change, the manner how, and the form of it, are delivered with so great care, and describ'd with so much life, That I could not but take a particular notice of it; and (with the civility of those that carve to others where themselves best like) invite the Reader to a more exact observation of that which hath given me so great contentment.

Neither hath he deserved less of Christian than prophane History: for from the Primitive times till Constantine the Great he hath deduced the Successions of Bishops in the principal Sees, with the practice of the Christians, and a faithful relation of their sufferings in all the persecutions.

For what concerns our own Island, I think he hath perform'd the part of a true Englishman, and a lover of his Countrey: for he hath vindicated the Antiquity of its first Discovery by the Phenicians, and that not only by the probable reasons alleged by that great Person Bochartus for the Etymology of the word Britannia, but by other indeniable, and convincing Circumstances, which as it redounds to the honour of our Nation, so reseets a part of that glory to our Author.

One particular of no flight consequence I had almost omitted: That as the Reader may without any intervening matters impertinent to his present purpose read the History of any Empire, or Kingdom Contemporary to it, by it self, so he may likewise observe that the principal passages in all of them are link'd together by Synchronisms, not only placed in the Margent, but in the beginning or end of every notable Occurrence.

fome of those Excellencies, which amongst many others I have observed in this Institution of History: of which if I may presume to give my private opinion, (though I am conscious to my self how little it ought to fignifie to the World) I think the work taken altogether is for the order of it handsomly and judiciously contrived, for its stile perspicuous, and for the learning in the several parts of History, Antiquity, and Chronology, uncommon. Those who desire a greater politeness in the style may consider, that the storid way of writing, which hath undefervedly acquired fo great a name to some of our own Age and Nation, is nothing proper to an Historian, and that our Author bussed himself in matters more ferious, and of greater use, he chose rather the plain but comely strength of the Dorique Pillar, than the Effeminate, though curious shape of the Counthian. For my own part, I confess that plainness and unaffected simplicity is pleasing to me : and I think no Intelligent Person that goes upon business, will leap Hedges out of the open and direct Road, to Travel over Flowry Fields. or painted Meadows.

This fell out on the 29th day of the 6th Month, and the 196 of the Year confifting of Lunar Months; or the 17th day of the 7th Month, if they were Solar.

The Ark rest. 6. On the 17th day of the 7th Month the Ark rested upon the Mountains of Aeth on Avarat. rarat, according to the Hebrew; if, in this place the Version of the 70, and S. Hierom in the Vulgar, be not rather to be credited (which have the 27th,) feeing it is not probable that the Ark should rest the same day, or two days before the Waters began to decrease. On the first day of the roth Month were the tops of the Mountains seen; and sorty days after, Noah sent forth a Raven which went to and fro, until the Waters were dried up from off the Earth. The Raven returning no more unto him, seven days after he sent forth a Dove, to see if the Waters were abated, which finding no rest for the Sole of her foot, returned unto him. He stay'd yet other seven days, and again sent forth the Dove, which in the Evening brought in her mouth an Olive-leaf; so that he knew the Waters to be abated. Then, seven other days passed, he sent her out the third time, and she returned not to him any more, the waters being now so much fallen, that the ordinary Hills might be uncovered, wherein the might continue and feed; although the Plains and Vallies were still overwhelmed. On the first day of the first Month of the 601 year of Noab's Life, the Waters were dried from off the face of the Earth; yet fo, as it still remained moist and dirty, having been so long a time soaked with such a quantity of moisture. Therefore he stai'd yet 55 days more, till the 27th, day of the second Month, before he went out of the Ark; so much time having been requifite for drying the Ground (especially in low places) and for the growth of Grass, and other things necessary for the sustenance of Living Creatures, which had continued in the Ark 365 days, or a full Solar Year, which exceedeth the Lunar

The Ark rested upon the Mountains of Ararat; by which place most understand Vide Ecchard Armenia, rejecting the pretended Verses of Sibylla, which place it upon a Mountain of Phrygia, near to the City Celana, and out of which the two Rivers Marsyas and Meander do iffue. Some will have it to have rested about Araxene, a Plain of Armenia, through which the River Araxes runneth, by the foot of the Mountain Taurus. But the far greater number confisting both of Heathens, Jews, and Christians, pitch upon the Mountains of the Gordyeans, otherwise called Carduchia Cardiei, Cordsei, Cordueni, Gordi, Cordei, Curdi, &c. the Hill it felf being varioully named Kardu, Cardon, Kurud, Kardynus, Cordyaus, &c. What Hill soever it was, it must have stood Eastward of the Countrey of Shinar or Babylonia, and the Vine must have naturally grown there; upon which, and other accounts these Gordyean Mountains are rejected by a Learned () Writer of modern times, who af () Sir Walter firmeth that Ararat named by Moses, is not any one Hill, so called, no more than 6.7. [64.10. any one Hill among those Mountains which part Italy from France, is called the Alpess and will have the same Ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, to keep the Name all along and even in India to be called Ararat. For that the best Vine naturally groweth on the South-side of the Mountains Cancas; and, because of other excellencies of that Soil, he thinketh it most probable that Noah there setled himself, and planted his Vineyard. And he alloweth best of the Opinion of Goropius Becanus, who conceiv'd the Ark to have refted on the highest Mountains of that part of the World. (4) Josephus Hierome the Ægyptian, who wrote the Antiquities of Phanicia, related the same; besides Mnaseus, and many others: amongst whom Nicolas of Damaseus is considerable, who in his 96th Book spake of the Hill Baris, in the Countrey of the Mynians, (a People in Armenia) upon which many faved themselves in a Deluge, and one being carried thither in an Ark, there rested; who might (saith he) be the same man concerning whom Moses the Law-giver of the Jews wrote. Xisthrus by one (b) is related, being forewarned of a Deluge by Saturn, to havefled (b) Anydona by Boat into Armenia, where, the Waters decreasing, he sent out Birds to discover apud Ensistem, dry Land; which, finding none, returned to him again. He is faid by (c) a se-lib cond to have escaped a great Deluge which hapned in his dayes (being also fore- () Alex Polywarned by Cature thereof) by providing an Ark wherein with himself Pind histor and color to have chapter a great Detuge with naphot in the case with himself, Birds, Cyrill.control warned by Saturn thereof) by providing an Ark, wherein, with himself, Birds, Cyrill.control Creeping things, and Beasts were preserved. that Age there was but one Language, which Mythologists (a) so far extended as (a) Plato is to make men and Beasts to have spoken in the same Dialect. Noah is called an Polit. Husbandman, (or, in the Hebrew phrase, a man of the Earth;) and Saturn's wife, Rhea, is the same with the Earth: he (b) being also said to have taught Janus (b) Strvius in the Use of the Vine, and Sickle, in imitation of Noah, who planted a Vineyard. From Noah's once being overtaken with Wine, the liberty of the Saturnalia might proceed; and from his Curling of Cham with Servitude, the Cultom (c) observ-(c) Athoneses ed amongst the Romans during that Solemnity, of exercising servile Offices. The lib. 14. occasion of the Curse was Cham's seeing his Father's Nakedness, and making a jest thereof; and the Poets (d) feign'd a Law made by Saturn, that none should see (d) Callimachi the gods naked and go unpunished. Saturn and Rhea are said (e) to have been the min. begotten of the Ocean and Thetis, and thence the Ancient Romans would have (f) timeso the Badge of Saturn to be a Ship; which things much accord with the History of Orlah Aure-Noah. Saturn devoured all his Children but these three, Jupiter, Neptune and Pluto, doing Guits. who divided the World amongst them, as did Sem, Cham and Japhet. Of these, Roman, ad ini-Cham, the youngest agreeth with Jupiter, being named Jupiter Hammon. Japhet tiam with Neptune, for that he had his portion in Islands and Peninsula's. Much is faid on both fides for these several Readings; but most likely it is that this Cainan was neither thought of by Moses, the 72 Interpreters, nor S. Luke; but that by a militake of the Transcribers, he crept into the Copies of Luke, and the 70. Beza had a Copy of Luke very ancient, and now in the Publick Library of the University of Cambridge, wherein he is not found; and, what is more, he was not acknowledged by the Primitive Church, as appeareth by (b) Ireneus: That the (b) Lih.3.6.3; Version of the 72. most anciently had him not, is probably inferred from Josephus 3 that de bus it who, though he wrote in Greek, and usually followeth that Translation, nameth him not 3 neither doth Epiphanius against Heresies; nor Hierome in his Hebrew Translation. ditions, though he there discourseth of the differences betwixt the Hebrew and Gerard Johan. They came from the East into the Land of Shinar, and there began their Work. Some put no other diffin-Gion betwixt the City and Tower but will have it only a City adorned with Towers. 12. What the Sons of men (in opposition to the People of God so called) laboured to prevent in the Building of Babel, was thereby brought upon them; the Lord scattering them abroad upon the face of the Earth, and yet doing them more good than they intended to do themselves. He hath five (c) Sons men-(c)Gen. 10.222 tioned in Scripture, Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram. Of Elam descended the Elamites, or Elymans, Neighbours to the Medes, and whom Luke placeth betwixt Media and Mesopotamia; from whom also the Neighbouring Regions were named: For Susan, the Metropolis of the Susians, is by Daniel placed in the Province of Elam; and, befides that, (d) Gabriana, Carbiana, Massatica, and Susia-(1) Debis est. na, as far as to the River Euleus; near the Mouth of which also upon the Per aims, vid Eo chard Philes, fian Gulf, Pliny and others place the Elymeans.

In it Strabo placeth the Babylonians, Elymeans, Paretacans, 737 Diois Water Grant and Syrians (from Higgst to Pontus, where 1240. the Leuco-Syrians dwell) called also Affyrians. Syria and Afffria were of old time (8) Suidas;

promiscuously used; but at length Custom obtained that Emphrates, or Tigris part-3. Arphaxad. ed them. From Arphaxad, Josephus would have the Chaldeans issued, which, as he and others fay, were anciently called Arphaxadeans; but in Scripture they are constantly read Chasclim, from Chesed, or Chased, Son to Nachor, the Brother of Abraham, and therefore owe their Original rather to him; and from Arphaxad feemeth to have received its Appellation part of Affyria, called Arphaxitis, and named Arrapachitis by Ptolomy. From Lud came the Lydians, anciently also known by the name of Meones, as we have it from Herodotus, and others; the Carians Lib. 15 and Mysians also, who inhabited the South part of Asia, beyond the River Meander, being reckoned of the fame Original by him: Of Aram descended the Arameans and the Arimi, called Sprians, after the growth of the Affyrian Empire.

Four Sors of Aram are mentioned by Moses, which () essewhere are reckoned () 1 Chross amongst the Sons of Sem, viz. Huz, Hull, Gether, and Mas, or Mesech.

14. Huz, or Uz, by general confent of the Ancients, built Damascus. There The four Sons being two belides of the same Name, this hath made a confusion amongst Writers. 1. Har. One (b) was the son of Nachor, the Brother of Abraham, whose Seat is called (b) Gen. 22.22 Austis (i) in the Greek, and his Posterity Austia, a People of Arabia the defert, (i) Jobs. 1. mentioned by Ptolomy. (k) Another of the Posterity of Esau, or Edom; who fixed (c) Gen. 36.28 in Arabia the Stony, on the Borders of Canaan, from whom Idumea is (1) called () Lam. 421. the Land of Uz. Hull (by Josephus named Otrus) as they fay, inhabited part of 2. Hull. Armenia. Gether was the Father of the Bactrians, according to Josephus; accord-3. Gether. ing to Hierome, of the Carians, and Acarnanians: and Mercerus strangely joyneth all these Nations, so far distant in place, together in Original. Mas (called also (m) Mesech) is thought by Josephus to be the Founder of the Mesaneans, a Peo (m) 1 Chroni

ple near the Camp of Pasinns, about the Mouths of Tigris. Hierome maketh him the 1. 17. Father of the Maones; being the same with the Lydians, whom he himself deriveth elsewhere from Lud. (n) Others will have him to have given Original to the Peo-(n) Junius, Bes ple inhabiting the North-part of Syria, between Cilicia and Mesopotamia, near the Mountain Masius; or to the Inhabitants of this Mountain, called Masieni, and Ma-

Jostan the fe- flani. Eler the Son of Selah, besides Phaleg, had another Son, named jostan, whose cond Son of thirteen Sons Moses relateth, as the Founders of so many Nations; Almodad, Shecons source uniterest source are related, as the countries of the many attentions. Explain this repetition of the property of the season.

Havilab, and Jobab. Their dwelling was from Meßa, as thou goeft, faith Mose, unto Sephar, a Mount of the East. They inhabit, saith Josephus, from Cophenes, a River of India, that Countrey of Syria which lieth upon it; as now the Text is: which cannot but be false Geography. And for Syria, Aria is rather to be read; which, as Pliny faith, according to the Judgment of others, included three other Provinces of the Gedrost, Arachote, and Paropamiside, being terminated with the River Cophetes.

15. But neither in this place is there any thing to be met withal like Mesha, or Sephar, or any people thereabout of the same name with Jostan, or his Sons; neither could that Ophir, to which Solomon fent for Gold by Sea, and which they also will have denominated from one of the thirteen, be near Aria, which lieth at the foot of the Mountain Paropamisus, at a vast distance from the Ocean. Great Their Seat. Bochartus therefore placeth them in the Mediterranean parts of Arabia the Happy, the Inhabitants whereof, if they may be heard, challenge Jostan for the Founder of both the Arabian Nation and Language, calling him otherwise Cahtan. From Almodad then, descended the Amodeans, by the Greeks called Allumaota, whom Ptolony placeth in the middle of Arabia, near the Head of the River Lar, which emptieth it self into the Persian Sea. From Saleph the Salapeni, who lived more remote upon the Borders of Arabia Defart, not far from the Spring of the River Be-3. Hassarma- tius. From Hassarmaveth (which word is variously written, and by the Arabians called Hadramanth or Chadramanth) were named the Regions Adramyta, Chatramis, Chatramitis, and the Inhabitants Athramotite, Chatramotite, Chatramote, Atramitæ, and Adramitæ, whose Metropolis was anciently called Sabota. Sabbata. Saubata, at this day Sebam. From Jerach came the Alilai, a People inhabiting near the Red Sea: Jerachei in Hebrew, and Alilei in Arabick, being the Sons of Farlach. Hilal. or the Moon. 16. From Hadoram iffued the Drimanti, placed by Pliny upon the Persian Gulf, 5. Hadoram. 6. Uzal. near the Mace. From Uzal, the Inhabitants of the Kingdom of Alieman (in the Eastern part of Arabia) seem to be descended. Sanaa the Metropolis, being by 7. Dicklab. the Jews still called Uzal. Dicla, in the Chaldean and Syrian Tongues fignifying a Palm; from him must that part of Arabia have been called, wherein that Tree most grows, inhabited by the Minei, Obal (in the Arabian Tongue Aubal and Abal) feemeth to have passed over the Gulf into Arabia Troglodytica, and to have given Name to the Mart-Town and Bay of Abalites or Avalites. Abimael was the 9. Abimael. Father of the Malita, whom Thophrastus maketh to have inhabited one of the four 10.Shebah. Regions fruitful in Spices. Of Seba came the Sabaans, properly to called; named also Sabata, who dwelt by the Red Sea, betwixt the Minaans and Catabanes, which Nations also, together with the Chatramote, are by Writers often included amongst the Sabaans. Besides this Seba, there were three others of that Name, and Founders of Nations. As (a) one the Son of Chus, another his Nephew by Ragmah. and the (b) third the Son of Jockshan, and Nephew of Abraham. Seba the Son of (b) Gen. 5.3. Jostan joyned to the Arabian Sea; the rest to the Persian; so that the Sabaans, (of whom the Greeks and Romans know no distinction) are said by Pliny, to live from Sea to Sea. The Son of Joksan lived on Robbery; but the rest by Commerce with other Nations. Ophir (in Arabick, Auphar, fignifying most rich) gave Name to that part of Arabia near the Sabeans, which was inhabited by the Ceffanite, Cafandres, or Gasandra, so called from the Treasures; Gold, for its plenty, being here in little request. Another Ophir there was also in India; in the Island Taprobane, as most probable; the Phanicians being accustomed to give old Names to new-found places. From Chanila the Son of Jotlan (for there was another of this Name, Son to Chua) descended the Chanlonita, called otherwise Carbi, and Cerbani, the most warlike of the Arabians, whose Seat is yet called Chaulan. Of Jobab, the last of the thirteen, came the Jobabita, placed by Ptolomy next to the Sachalites. This was the Habitation of the Sons of Jostan from Mesha, called otherwife Musa and Muza, a samous Port upon the Red Sea, as one goeth to Sapkar a Mountain Eastward, where was a City of the same Name; both Port and City being well known to the Egyptians and Ethiopians, who used to trade into these parts. This was the Inheritance of the Sons of Sem, the choisest of all, though contained only within Asia. 17. To Japhet fell a very confiderable part of Asia, and Europe, the least of the Divisions of the Earth, but better improved than the rest, and far more populous; of later times the Seat of Learning,& of two Empires, which extended their power to the Inwards both of Asia and Africa; and in an especial manner blessed with more than worldly prosperity, since Japhet dwelt in the Tents of Sem. The Greeks Japet's seven acknowledged him for their Founder, by the name of Japetus, than whom they thought nothing more ancient. Moses reckoneth seven of his Sons, and as many Nephews. The Sons are (c) Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech and (c) Gen. 10. 2. Titas. Josephus maketh Gomer the Father of the Galatians, which if so, the same Original must be extended to the Gauls, of whom the other were but a Colony; and to some the Names of Cimmerii and Cimbri, whereby the Inhabitants of the Western parts have been known, as also those of Kumero, Kumeri and by Cymbro, which our ancient Britains (of the same stock with the Gauls) called themselves, feem to own no other Original. But another thinketh the Land of Gomer to be Bothartas lib. 3. that part of Phrygia called Catecaucemene, lying upon the Rivers Cayster and Mean-cip. 8. der, and the City Philadelphia; the Plains of which consist of a burnt kind of Earth like Ashes, and the Hilly parts are all Stony, the whole Countrey being brittle, adust, and easie to be inflamed. This he gathereth from the signification of Gomer and Phrygia, both which import Burning: Moses (according to his Judgment) not alwayes calling the Founders of Nations by their true and proper Mames, but by the Names of the Countries which they planted. Ever when the word is of the Plural Number, as of the Sons of Javan, Chittim, and Rodanim; and all the Sons of Mifraim and Canaan (except Sidon and Heth) must needs be Names of Peoples, not of particular Men. Hat farmaneth he proveth to be the Name of a Place only; for that it fignifieth the Region of Death; as Dikla, a place of Palm-trees; Ophir, a rich; Johab, so called from the Defart, and several o-

mab. From Aßhenaz those descended, according to Josephus, by the Greets called Regines; which who they were, is not to be understood. Most probably, by Aßbkenaz is signified Bithynia, in which is the Bay Ascanius, besides a Lake and River of the same name; or Troas and Phrygia the less, in which were Ascanea, both

Countrey and City, and Island Ascanie. From Riphat, Josephus deriveth the Paphlagonians, a People of Asa the less, near Pontus, and Neighbours to the Phrygians. Togarma is variously expounded by Writers. It appeareth out of Ezekiel (a) that (a) Chap. 58. Gomer and Togarma were not far diftant; both North of Judea: and that from

Togarmah came Horses and Mules to be sold at Tyre. Hereto well agreeth the Opinion of Josephus, who placeth Togarmah in Phrygia, to which Cappadocia was near adjacent, North to Judea, and excelled in the Breed of Horfes and Mules.

19. From Magog, Japhet's fecond Son, descended the Septhians, according to Josephus and others; Gog and Magog, being that part of Septhia about Caucasus, which the Colchi and Armenians (whose Language was half Chaldean) called Gog-half with the September of Gog and thorough Septhe Coucasus on the Proceeding of the Control of Company of C basan (i.e. the Fort of Gog) and thence the Greekt, Cancasus: to whom also Gogarene was known, which Stephanus describeth to be between the Colchi and Eastern

The same with Iberi. Magog seemeth to be the same with Prometheus. For as Prometheus was the Son of Japetus, so Magog of Japhet. Prometheus was seigned to be fixed to Caucasus, and Caucasus was the Seat of the Scythians of old time, till they expelled the Cimmerii, and succeeded them: Prometheus brought down Fire from Heaven, which might take Original from Magog his finding out of Metals in .. Colchis and Iberia. And the Fable of his Heart or Liver being eaten by an Eagle, may be found in (b) the word Magog, which fignifieth to be diffolved, or to decay: (b) Vid Bo Hierapolis, a City in Syria, seemeth to have been called also Magog from him; seeing charum !...

Deucalion the Scythian, and Son of Prometheus, is by Lucian faid to have confecrated the Temple there to the Syrian Goddess. From Madai it's generally granted. that the Medes are issued; the Medes and Persans being constantly in the Book of Daniel and Esther, named Medai and Paras. From Javan descended the Iones, (or all that inhabited Greece, from Thrace to the Isthmus of Corinth, the Macedomians being included) Homer calling them Iaones, and Alexander being fignified man being includes the Name of the King of Javan.

20. The Sons of Javan were Elisa, Taribib, Kittim, and Dodanim; from whom four Provinces took their Names From Elisa, Holis, according to Josephus, but rather Elis (the most ancient and ample Region of Peloponnesus, part whereof is by Homer called Alisium) to be taken for the whole Peninsula. From Tarsis, Josephus and others derive Tarfus, the great City in Cilicia; some Carthage; another Tunis; but Ensebins and Bochartus understand the Iberians or Spaniards, amongst whom was a place called Tarlessus. Besides this, there was another (*) Tarss in the Indian * 2 Chiron. 20. Sea, whither Ships went from Esion-gaber; and indeed, whatever the word origi- 36. nally fignifieth (whether Cilicia or any other place) it is secondarily applied to the Mediterranean Sea, which reacheth unto Phanicia, and sometimes seemeth to denote the Ocean it self. Josephus will have Cittim to have possessed himself of the Island Cyprus, where was a City called Citium, the native place of Zeno the Stoick; and hence, he faith, the Hebrews called all Illands and maritime places by the name of Chethim. Others will have the Chians, some certain Nations of India; others Cilicia, some, Macedonia to be understood by this word. The Romans are by Daniel fignified under this name, and in Italy were of old the Cities Cetia, Echetia, and the River Cetus; and Chittim imports the same thing with the word Lati-

um, betokening to lie hid. The Opinion therefore of Josephus is very probable, that these Islands and Coasts of the Mediterranean might be known to the He-4. Dodanim, or brews, under the Name of Chethim. Dodanim (omitted in Josephus) by some is Chap.11.v.29, interpreted Dardanians, by others Dodoneans. But most anciently it was read 300 Rhodanim, which the Greek rendreth Rhodians, though the Name of Rhodes is later than Moles his time. Bochartus therefore placeth this People in Gaul, about the River Rhodanus (now Rhene) which he proveth not to have been so named from Rhoda, a Town there Founded by the Rhodians. Rhodanim, he faith, fignifieth Tellow, or Saffron-coloured, which agreeth well with the colour of the Hair of the ancient Gauls, either Natural, or Affected; wherein also the Britains shewed themselves descended of the same Stock; as Jornandes judgeth.

21. Tubal and Mesech (the fifth and fixth Sons of Japhet) are joyned in Scri-5. Tabal. pture, most commonly, together; as near to each other. Josephus, from them deriveth the Iberians, and Cappadocians, who had a City in his time, known by the Name of Mazacha. Bochartus understandeth by Mesech and Tubal, the Moschi and Tibareni, which are so joyned together by Herodotus, as Mesech and Tubal in the Scripture. The Moschi (besides Moschica, properly so called) possessed all from Phasis, as far as Pontus of Cappadocia; the Moschian Mountains reaching so far. Then next succeeded the Tibarens, according to Strabo, who extendeth their Borders to Pharnacra, and Trapezond, the Moschian and Colchian Mountains: so that they lay betwixt the Trapezuntians, and the Inhabitants of Armenia the less. Tubal and Mesech are noted by Ezechiel, to abound in Slaves, and Brass; which, Chap.27.V.13. by the Confent of Authors, fitly agreeth with the Regions of Pontus; especially Cappadocia. From Thiras, most Authors derive Thrace; a Woman of which Countrey was called Threissa; and many Names there, both of Places and Persons, perswade the same thing. This was the Portion of Japhet, answerable to the Blef-sing of his Father; that God should enlarge him. For unto it belonged all Europe, how big foever, besides Asia the less, Media, part of Armenia, Iberia, Albania, and those vast Tracts towards the North, inhabited of old by the Scythians, and now by the Tartars: To say nothing of the New World, into which it's probable the Scythians paffed by the Straits of Anian. To his Posterity belong the Northern parts, which by Jornandes, an Historian of the Goths, are deservedly termed. The Work-houses of People, and Sheaths of Nations.

22. Curfed Cham was not excluded from Earthly Bleffings. To his Lot fell Ægypt, and all Africk, a great part of Syria, and Arabia, belides Babylonia, Suliana, Affyria, and other Countries, which his Grand-fon Nimrod possessed himself of David very often calleth Egypt the Land of Cham or Ham: the Ancient Inhabi-Plutareh in Illtants themselves, Chamia, or Chemia. In Arabia and Africk the Name of Ammon, de. (the Aspiration being taken away) was universally known, as appeareth by Ammon, a River in Arabia, the Promontory Ammonium, and the People called Ammo-

nii. In Africk, the City Ammonis upon the River Cinyphus. The Chappel of Ammonis in the Island Meroe. In Marmarica, the City Ammonia, vulgarly Paratonium: And the Ammonian Countrey, where was the famous Oracle of Ammon. Nav. all Africk was called Ammonis, or Ammonia. Ham fignifieth Hot: in which respect it agreeth well with the Greek word Zeus, the Name of Jupiter. Ham was Noah's youngest Son; so was Jupiter the youngest of Saturn. From Cham's living in Africk, the hottest part of the World, Jupiter may be called the Lord of Heaven. And Saturn's being made an Eunuch by his Son Jupiter (or Calius by his Son Saturn, as Macrobius hath it) feemeth to relate to that Fault, for which Cham received from his Father a Curse instead of a Blessing. Of these things Bochartus giveth abundant satisfaction, to name no more.

23. Four Sons of Cham are recorded by Moses; Chus, Misraim, Phut, and Canaan. From Chus, by a general Mistake, the Æthiopians in Africk have been thought to be descended; whereas, by the Land of Chus, in Scripture is meant (a) (4) Vide Bopart of Arabia, inhabited by the Chuseans, called also Cutheans; of whom were charum lib.4. the Madianites, and Sephora the Wife of Moses, who did not flie into Aithiopia, cap. 2. and there marry her. They inhabited above Egypt upon the Persian Gulf, in c. 8. sec. 10. part of Arabia the stony and the happy; thought by some to be the same with the Ancient Scenites, and the Modern Saracens, being called Scenites from dwelling in His fix Sons. Tents; and Suracens, from their Robberies. Chus hath fix Sons mentioned; viz.

Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabtecha and Nimrod. Raamah hath two, Sheba, and Dedan. All these inhabited about the Persian Sea; except Nimrod, whom Moses affirmeth to have fixed his Seat at Babel. By the Name of Mizraim, is to be understood the Father of those who inhabited Ægypt, thrice in Scripture called Malor (the Singular Number of the word Mizraim) as it's thought, from the straightness of it, being extended out in length from the Sea towards Syene. From Migraim, Moses deriveth seven People or Nations: Ludim, Anamim, Lehabim, Pathrusim, Cassubim (out of whom came Philistiim) and Caphtorim. 24. Josephus will have the eight Sons of Mifraim to have possessed all the Country datiq. 1.1. c. 6.

Mifraim's 8 lying between Gaza and Ægypt, though Philistin only gave Name to it; from whom the Greeks called it Palastina. Lybis, hesaith, led a Colony into Libya, which he named after himself; but as for the rest, he confesseth both their Names and Assairs to be obscure, their Cities being overthrown, as he saith, in the Athiopian War made by Moles; concerning which he bringeth a meer Fable, taken out of Artapamus, and the Inventions of the Hellenists. As for Ludim, Bockartus by ten Arguments proveth the Æthiopians to be meant thereby, whom he will have also a Colony of the Ægyptians. By Anamim the Nemades of Africk, who inhabited about Ammonis, and in Nasamonitis, and for Anamians, might easily be called Amonians and Ammonians; they being also a Colony of the Hegyptians and Hethiopians, as appeareth out of Herodotus. Of the same Original he maketh the Nasamones, A-mantes, Hammanientes (who * made their Houses of Salt) and the Garamants. * Solinus. 3.3. Lehabim or the Lehabeans are thought to be the same with the Libyans bordering upon Egipt, from whom this Denomination might pass to those that inhabited 4. Naphtheim, the greatest part of Africk. Naphtheim he placeth in Marmarica upon the Mediter5. Pathrefon. ranean Sea; Pathrefon in Thebais, a Province of Heypt, called Pathros, and by many diffinguished from Ægypt, though Peopled from it. 25. Cashim he maketh to signifie the Colchi, though so far distant from Ægypt, out of which they descended; and from Palestine, the Inhabitants whereof descended from them; both their Language and Life in all particulars so absolutely agreed with the Egyptians, of whom, by the Heathen also, they have been thought a Colony, left there by Sefostris in his Expedition, though they be of 7. Caphtorim. more Antiquity than he. The Caphtorim feem to have been Neighbours to him; from whom also, together with them, the Philistines descended, as appeareth from Il Scripture. They are therefore to be placed in that part of Cappadocia, which | Jer. 47.4. lieth next to Colchos about Trapezond. It is probable that, upon the Report of Amos 9.4. the Richness of these Places, the Ægyptians sent out a Colony (for this drew this ther Phrixus, Jason, Sesostris, the Medes and Persians, and of later times the Saracens out of Arabia:) which, finding the Climate too cold, or the Countrey not to answer expectation, or perhaps molested by the Scythians and others; part thereof resolved to return home, and in their way seated themselves in Palestine, after they had expelled thence the * Anims. The Captain of this Expedition feemeth to * Deut. 11.22 have been Typhon, reported by the Greek Poets, to have made War against the Gods. and to have pierced as far as Caucasus; but, after many Battels, being stricken of Jupiter with a Thunderbolt, to have fledinto Palestine; where he died at the Lake of Serbonis, and still lyeth buried. 26. The third Son of Cham was Phut, who divided Africk with his Brother 3. Phit. Misraim. To Misraim fell Ægypt, and most part of Africk, as far as the Lake of Tritonic, which divideth Africk into two equal parts. To Phut, all from the Lake, as far as the Allantick Ocean; as may be gathered from (a) Herodotus. As far as the (a) Lib. 4. & Lake, he faith, all the Africans used the Customs of Ægypt; but those beyond 186, 187 them towards the West, a far different kind of Life. Some Names retained a Memorial of Phut, as the City Putea; a River of Mauritania Tingitana, called Phut; and the Haven Phthia, mentioned by Ptolomy, Pliny, and others. Canaan is the 4. Canaan. His Pofterity fourth Son reckoned in order by Moses. He begat Sidon, his First-born, and Heth, the Jebuste, the Amorrbite, the Girgaste, the Hivite, the Arkite, the Sinite, the Arvadite, the Zemarite, and the Hamathite. By Canaan was inhabited the Land, which thereupon bore his Name, and was afterwards conquered by the Hebrews. His Family was propagated as far as the Sea, the Phanicians being descended of him, as Eupolemus an Heathen Writer, in his Book of the Jews, bare witness, saying, That Saturn begat Belus and Chanaan; and the later begat the Father of the Phanicians : besides, one Cna is said by Sanchoniathon (a most ancient Phenician Writer) Euch Preser to have been the first Man that was called Phanician; whence, by Stephanus, Pha-Evane. 1.5 nice is called Cna, and the Phenicians, Cnai. But, what is more, the Scripture calleth Phanicia the Land of Canaan.

27. Sidon, the First-born of Canaan, was the Father of the Sidonians, or the 1. Sidon. Builder of the City Sidon, which was more ancient than Tyre, and the Metropolis to it; the Sidonians having led a Colony thither, and founded Tyre, according to Trogus (b) before the destruction of Troy; 240 years before the building of Solomon's Temple, as Josephus counteth. The Children of Heib dwelt in the Land of datig. 186.5.

Canaan, about Hebron and Barfeba towards the South; and from them the Anakims The John descended. The Jebustes held Hierusalem, and the Castle of Sion until David's 4. Amnonite. time. The Ammonites passed the Mountains of Judea, and passing over Jordan, made War upon the Moabites and Ammonites; seized upon Basan, Hesbon, and all the Country lying between the River Jabbok and Arnon: in memory whereof, one of their Poets wrote a Poem, which Moses (a) hath inserted into his (a) Num. 21.] Writings. The Gergasites seem to have continued about Geresa, or Gadara, over 27. against Galile, beyond Jordan, (b) till Christ's time. The Hivites dwelt in Mount (b) Mat. 8. 28. Hermon, towards the East of the Land of Canaun, from whom descended the Gi. Like 8. 2.7. beonites, living nigh to Jerusalem, and the Sichemites dwelling near to Samaria, more towards the West. The Arkites inhabited Arca, or Arce, a City in Libanus, mentioned by Josephus and Ptolomy. The Simites had a City called Sin, not far from Arce, according to Hierome: but Bochartus placeth them at Pelusum; Sin signifying Mud or Clay, as Pelos in Greek. The Arnadites, or Aradites, seized upon the Island Aradus, on the Coast of Phanice, at the Mouth of the River Eleutherus, and part of the Neighbouring Continent, where was Axtaradus, Marathus, and Laodicea. The Zemarites, or Semerites, dwelt (as it's thought) about Finesa, a notable to Zemarite. And the Hemathites were seated about the City of Syria, called Epiphania, and not at Antiochia, which is at too great a distance. This was the Inheritance of the Sons of Canaan, whose Border was from Sidon, as thou comest to Gerar unto Gaza, as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah and Zeboim, even unto Lasha; which some interpret Casarea Philippi, others Callichoe; but Bochartus thinketh it to be Lyfa, a City of the Arabians, in the mid-way between the Dead.

CHAP. II.

Of the Babylonian Empire, from the first Founding thereof, to its utter Subversion by Cyrus.

The Beginning I. of Nimrod's Kingdom

Fter the Division of the Earth, Nimrod, as we faid, the Son of Chus, and Nephew of Cham, fixed his Seat at Babel, and therein first began a Kingdom; having joyned to it (a) Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the (a) Gen. 10.10 Land of Shinar. By Erech, the Ancients understood Edeffa; and by Accad, Nifibis: But neither the Names nor Situation of these Cities do agree; they being in that part of Mesopotamia which lieth towards Armenia, and very far from Babylon. Therefore Erech is rather to be taken for Arecca, a City of Sustana upon Tigris, mentioned by Ptolomy, which also seemeth to be the same with Arderica or Anderica (b) in Herodotus; Ard in the Persian Tongue signifying Great. (b) Lib. 1. 6.] And well Arecca might so be called, which was so long, that sailing up the River, 185. one should meet with it three several days, one after another; as the Historian relateth. Bochartus thinketh Acchad (called also Archad) to have given Name to the River Argad, which ranthrough Sittacena, a Province near to Babylonia, and fince called Apolloniatis. By Calneb (which is also Calno and Cauno) is to be understood that City, by the Parthians re-built, and called Ciesiphon. It stood upon Tigris, three Miles from Seleucia, being the Metropolis of Chalonitis, a Province denominated from it, and mentioned by Strabo, and others. Babylon was exhausted by the Building of Selencia, as Pliny (c) telleth us; and the Parthians built (or re-built) (c) 116.6.226. Ctesiphon in Chalonitis, three Miles off, to drein Seleucia.

2. The Duration of this Babylonian or Affyrian Empire, till Sardanapalus, is vaand Duration of the affigured; the cause of which seemeth to be, for that some derived the Original thereof from the Birth of Chus, as Cappellus * thinketh; and so Herodotus * Ad A. M. might affign 1520 years to the continuance of it. Others from the Beginning of 1822. P. 45. the Babylonian Kingdom, as Diodorus, who reckoneth 1400 years to the Death of Sardanapalus. Some from the Building of Ninive, as Ctefias, who hath 1360.

And lastly, others from the Death of Belus, as Trogus and Eusebius; who give to it 1300 years. That Nimrod should begin his Kingdom within an hundred years after the Flood, is not very probable; as neither, that the Building of the Tower of Babel happened within that time: which would have been too short a space for the propagation of Mankind to 60 great Multitudes. An hundred years after the Deluge, Phaleg was born 3 in whose days it was that the Earth was divided. Some A. M. 759. make the Divilion to have been at the same time of his Birth, and thence his Name imposed, as from a thing already done, or in doing. Others assign it to the latter Lege Vossili Fag. end of his days, and will have his Name prophetically given by his Father : But there Chron. Differt. are not wanting, who take a middle way betwixt these two, and think the Divifion made when he was come to ripenels of Age, or in the middle of his Years; the Number of which amounted to 239. When Alexander the Great had conquered Babylon, which fell out about the 3675th year of the World; Calliflener the Porphyrus Philosopher, who followed him in his Wars, at the define of Ariffulle his Kinfman, and Simplicity of the Color of Ariffulle his Kinfman, and adults. enquired into the Antiquities of the Chaldeans, and could find no Observations of decelo. 1.2. any longer date than 1903 years; which being cast back from the foresaid years, fall in their beginning, into 1772 from the Creation, the 116th from the Deluge, and the 16th of Phales's Life.

Nimrod named 3. Nimrod, the Founder of this Empire, was by his Subjects named Bel, or Be-Edus. lus, which fignifieth Lord, or Sovereign. That he was the Ancient Belus, is thence proved; that (*) most of the old Writers accounted Belus the Builder of Babylon, *Semiramis am condiderate the builder of Babylon, am condiderate the builder of Babylon and c although some attributed it to Semiramis; herein relying upon the Credit of Clessias, vil, at phring which now is deservedly suspected by Learned men, and in no case worthy to stand crediting. Curfaith, had a Statue erected to his Memory at Athens, with a Gilded Tongue) nor ins. 1. 5. 6. 1. with that of Abydenus, who also collected his Histories out of the Chaldean Ar-Berous apad chives. After Moses hath spoken of the four Cities, which were the Beginning of Apionem, tib. Nimrod's Kingdom; we read that out of that Land (of Shiner the Engining of Apotem, tik.

joyned it to the Babylonian, as Julius Africanus hath delivered. But others con Firmicum tend, that this Affur is the Name of the Countrey, and not of a man; and that it is to be read, And out of that Land went (Nimrod) into Affur, (i.e. Affyria) and builded Ninive, &c. Otherwise they think it would be out of the way for Moses to mention the Son of Sem in this place, where he is in hand with the Genealogy of Cham; neither could it be peculiar to him to go out of this Land, and build Niniveb; feeing all Mankind almost, at the Division of the Earth, went out of it. The last Reading only maketh the Sense entire; for how else could the four Cities properly be faid to be the Beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom, except he added more untoit? Lastly, this seemeth very urgent, that, in Scripture Affria is cal- Mich. 5. 6. led the Land of Nimrod.

4. He was a mighty Hunter before the Lord; or, therein none was to be compared with him; things being faid to be such before God, as were so indeed, or in an eminent manner; He judging not according to outward appearance, but as they are in their own Natures. By the means of Hunting it is probable that he made Made way to Way unto his Monarchy: For under pretence of what was very necessary at this his Kingdom time (when men were few, feattered, and lying abroad, without defence againft by Hunting wild Beafts, which ever especially abounded about Arabia and Babylon) he might gather a Band of men, and by such Exercises (which the Heathens (a) by their (a) Xenophon Practice, as well as Opinion shewed to be convenient for breeding of Warriours) in Cyropadia. train them up, till he converted their force from Beafts, to Men. What was performed by him, feemeth to have been attributed to his Successors. Ninus is (b) (b) Diodorus. faid to have gathered an Army of Arabians, and therewith to have subdued the 1.2.p.64. A. Babylonians; which seemeth to have related to his Conquest of that Countrey. For being a Chasean, and consequently an Arabian, he might by the Assistance of his own Countrey-men and Kindred effect it; whom he (c) rewarded with that Region (c) Bochartus beyond Tigris, which thence, was, by the Hebrews, called Chus; by the Chalde-1.4. 6.12. ans, Chuth; Ciffia, by the Greeks; and Chuzestan, (i. e. the Province of Chus) by the Persians. From this usurping the Right of Noah, some think the Fable to have fprung, of Saturn being cast out of his Kingdom by Jupiter; the Word Nimrod The true Bar. fignifying a Rebel, and answerable to his Carriage. He is also judged to be the true Bacchus; this word being little changed from Bar-Chus, that is, the Son of Ninive.

Chus. Bacchus was the Son of Jupiter, and he was the Grand-son of Jupiter Hammon. The most ancient Name of Bacchus was Zagreus, which fignifieth a strong Hunter, answerable to the Epithete given to Nimrod. He undertook an Expedition into the East, wherein seemed to be contained the Facts of Nimrod, and his Successors. Bacchus was feigned to be born at Nysa in Arabia; and Nimrod was also an Arabian. And not unlikely might Nimrod be called to be over the Vines, who first reigned at Babylon, where was that most excellent kind of Wine, digni-Athenent. fied by the Ancients with the Name of Nettar. To the Reign of Belus, or Nimrod,

65 years are given by Julius Africanus. 5. Ninus, his Son, succeeded him, and Canonized him for a God; which gave, as tis said, the first occasion to Idolatry. He made a Confederacy with Arieus, King

His Conquests of Arabia (which Countrey withstood most Conquests;) and then invading Armenia, forced Barzanes the King thereof, to submit to his Vassallage. Next, he entred Media, where he took, and crucified Phamus, the King; and then, being pricked on by desire of Glory, and encouraged by his Success, he subdued all the People of Asia in seventeen years, except the Indians and Battrians; the latter whereof, under Conduct of their King Zoroaftres (or rather Oxgartes; for Zoroawhereot, under conduct of their rang Zoroughts (or lattice Organics) and yet at (1) Biblioth fler, the great Magician, lived many Ages after) stoutly opposed him, and yet at (1) Biblioth fler, the great Magician, lived many Ages after) stoutly opposed him, and yet at (1) Biblioth fler, the great Magician, lived many Ages after) length were brought under, as we have it from Diodorus, who reporteth also that Ctifia Childio. Ninus built Ninive, which he so named after himself. Whether he, his Father, or Julin, lib. 1. any other built it, a City it was of great Bigness, Strength, and Ornament, being in Compass fixty Miles; of a Quadrangular form, incompassed and fortified with a Wall a hundred foot high, and of fuch a Breadth as three Chariots might have been driven together a-breast upon it; adorned also with Towers 200 Foot in height. The place of it is not agreed of, and (b) some think there were two Ci-(b) Legt Boheight. I he place of it is not agreed or, and (b) folia think there were two of charti-badge, ties of this Name; one upon Euphrates in Comagena, and another in Affyria, beyond 1.4, c, 20. Tigris. As for Ninus, many things done both by his Father, and Successiors, seem to have been attributed to him. He reigned 52 years; and the manner of his Death is diversly related: (c) One saith, he was shot with a Dart as he lay before (c) Orossas. a Town. (d) Another writeth that Semiramis his Wife (whom he had chosen for (d) Dinon aher admirable Beauty, and now doated on) obtained leave to wear his Royal Robe, pad Elian. and reign over Afa five dayes; and then, when the had got the power into her at hands, commanded one of the Guard to kill him: But a (e) third only relateth (e) Diodons him to have here Gard in Price.

him to have been secured in Prison.

Simiramis, his 6. Heleft a Son by Semiramis, inamed Ninyas, who being but young, she put & aliis. Wife, counter on Mans Apparel, and counterfeiting his Person, as well as Sex, is reported to have done very great things; part of which might rather be challenged by the two foregoing Kings, and by fome that followed her. The Resemblance of her Justin ex Tro-Son in all the Lineaments and Proportion of her Body took away Suspition; for go. 1. 1. the further prevention whereof, the commanded the fame kind of Garment to be print. worn by the People. At length, when she thought she had got Fame sufficient

she made her self known; which detracted not from her Glory, but added to the Lustre of it. She re-edified and enlarged Babylon, incompassing it with a Wall made up of Brick, Sand, and a certain Clay, or Slime, clammy like Pitch, which there abounded; and * restrained, by new works, the violence of Euphra- * Herodotus. tes, which, formerly was wont to overflow into the Town. Not content with the Li, c.184. Empire, as her Husband left it, she enlarged it with the Conquest of Æthiopia, and made War upon India, though without Success; in which Undertaking, the only had Alexander the Great her Æmulator, as Justin affirmeth. But, after the had reigned 42 years, either for that she would have had to do unlawfully with her Son (being reported exceeding vicious of her Body,) or, because he was impatient of her to long retaining the Power, he flew her; although fome fay, the voluntarily refigned the Kingdom.

After her Death, the was feigned to be turned into a Dove, and worshipped for a Goddess under that shape: the occasion of which seemeth to have been the Bearing of that Bird pourtraied in her Ensign.

7. Ninyas, or Ninus, (as Justin calleth him) succeeding, imitated neither Grandfather, Father, nor Mother; but giving up himself wholly to an effeminate course of Life, would be seen of none except Concubines and Eunuchs. Yet to him is ascribed that politick ordering of the Militia, which was imitated constantly by his Successors. A yearly Choice was made of Officers and Soldiers out of each Diodorus, L.2. Province, to lie in Garrison in the City, and to be ready at all Essays, there to ?- 77. A. continue for one year; at the end of which, they were succeeded by new Levies. Hereby, the Subject was contained in Obedience; and yet, by fuffering the Souldiers no longer to continue together, all Conspiracies and Plots were prevented, which might else have risen amongst such multitudes; the space of a year not being fufficient for such through and intimate acquaintance, as might produce any confiderable Stirs. Those that followed Ninyas, for thirty Generations, trode, for the most part, in his paths; nothing either memorable, or certain, remaining of them, except Tentamus the 20th from Ninyas, to whom Priamus King of Troy, when he was belieged by the Greeks, fent for Aid. This Teutamus is faid to have fent him a Supply of 10000 Æthiopians, and as many of the Inhabitants of Susiana, with 200 Chariots, under the Command of Memnon, who bearing himfelf very valiantly against the Besiegers, was at length, by the wiles of the Thessalians, circumvented and flain. From the Beginning of the Affyrian Empire, to the Destruction of Troy, Eusebius reckoneth 943 years, Cappellus from the Building of Niniveb, 995.

Sardanapalus.

Tentamus.

8. The 3cth in order, was Tonos-Concoleros, by the Greeks and Romans called A.M. 3166, Sardanapalus, ennobled only above the rest, for his excess in Effeminateness, and his ruine caused thereby. He spent all his time among Women; with whom he would fit and spin, imitating them in all things possible, so as scarce ever in his whole time was he seen of the other Sex. This extraordinary corruption in Manners gave occasion to two of his greatest Officers to compass his Destruction. For,

Belefis and Ar-baces conspire Belefis (or Belochus) the Governor of Babylon, a great Magician and Astrologer, out of the Doctrine of the Stars, foretold to Arbaces Governor of Media, (otherwisecalled (a) Arbachus, (b) Orbachus, and (c) Pharnaces,) that one day he should (a) Juftin. obtain the whole Principality of Sardanapalus, and excited him to Attempts suta- (6) Gaurenius. ble to such an Atchievement. Arbaces herewith puffed up, promised him the posfession of Babylon, if his Prediction should take, and laboured to ingratiate himself with the Captains of the feveral Provinces. Then having a great defire to fee what manner of Life the King lived, he hired an Eunuch to bring him into the Palace; where, beholding with his Eyes his diffolute Carriage, he despised him, and much more encouraged himself in the hope given him by Beless. They now resolved, the one to draw the Medes and Persians, and the other the Babylonians, to revolt; and Arbaces communicated his Defign and Purpose to the Governour of Arabia, his great Friend. 9. These things being as diligently put in practice, as readily undertaken, the Diodornis next year an Army of 400000 men coming up to Ninivel, where the King then lay; under pretence of relieving the former years Guard, refolved to employ their Force in the Ruine of the Affyrian Kingdom. Sardanapalus, having timely notice of the Revolt, drew out such Forces as were in the City, and falling upon the Rebels in the Plain, put them to the Rout. They flying to the Mountains, and recollecting their Courage, came down again, and engaged; but with the fame fuccess: after which they retreated to the same place. Hereupon, Arbaces calling the Officers together, to advise what was to be done, all of them were for disbanding the Army, and departing home, except Belefts, who, urging them with what the Stars portended, prevailed with them to stay; but to no other purpose than He obtaineth that the King might gain the third Victory, which shortly happened. Now they three victories fully resolved to be gone; when Belests, his Credit being deeply engaged, spent the whole night in viewing the Stars; out of the Mystery of which, he was bold to affirm, that Help would come of its own accord, and great Changes follow, if they would have Patience but five dayes longer. They being yet prevailed with for this once; before the five dayes were expired, News came, that great Forces were coming from Badria to the aid of the King. To them Arbaces fent, and eafily perswaded them to joyn with the Conspirators.

10. Sardanapalus knowing nothing of this, and puffed up with his Success, returned to his former Course of Life; which Arbaces understanding from certain Fugitives, and how his Army lay in a secure and careless posture, drew down upon it in the Night, and made a great Slaughter, and drove those that escaped, into Niniveh. Hereupon the King committed the Conduct of the Army to Salemenes, his Wives Brother, and took upon himself the Desence of the City; but the Rebels twice in the Field overthrew his Forces, and killed the General with most of his Souldiers. Then was the City closely befieged, and many Nations revolted to the Conspirators; which the King considering, and sensible of his Condition, sent out his three Sons and two Daughters, with a great Treasure, to Cotta, the Governour of Paphlagonia; and, dispatching Courriers into several Provinces, took what care he possibly could for the making of New Levies.

11. Neither was he behind-hand in providing all things within, that were neceffary for Relistance. There being no fear of Storming the Town, by reason of the wonderful strength and height of the Walls. He considered the main danger to lie in the Affections of the Inhabitants; to whom, that they might have no cause to attempt any new thing, he supplied all Necessaries in a plentiful measure. Two years and above he held out, and doubted not but to be able to do it, till Relief should come; and the rather, for that they had an Oracle that Niniveh should never be taken, till the River first proved an Enemy to it; which he never The River fwelling with could suspect. But in the third year fell such Rains, that Euphrates (or Lycus, upfwelling with so on which, some conceive that Strabo placeth the City, and not Euphrates, nor Tigris, as others) swelling with abundance of Waters, made a Breach in the Wall twenty Furlongs in length. At this, the King utterly discouraged, as judging the Oracle to be fulfilled, left he should fall alive into the hands of his Enemies, he built a Pile of Wood in his Palace, upon which he heaped his Treasures, and rich Attire; and, making a little Room in the midft, wherein he bestowed himself, him burneth him- Concubines and Eunuchs, fet fire to the Heap, and so perished with this Compa-

Belefis, according bylon to Belifis, to Agreement, having received the Principality of Babylon, and understanding from an Eunuch, how great Treasure Sardanapalus had burnt with himself, begged the Ashes of Arbaces, under pretence of having made a Vow, in the Heat of the War, to carry them to Babylon, and therewith to raise a lasting Monument of the Destruction of the Affirian Empire. He being ignorant of his covetous Design, granted his Request; but, when the Matter was discovered, referred his Judgment to a Council of Officers, who condemned him to Death: Yet, being defirous to begin his Reign mildly, he not only remitted this Punishment, but permitted him to enjoy all the Gold and Silver already transported; and, what remained, which amounted to many Talents, he conveyed it to Echatane, the chief City of the Medes. (d) Diodorus and (e) Strabo tell us how he levelled Ninus (or Ninive) (a) L.2. p. 816. with the Ground. For having, as he (b) (b) Lib. 1. 6.9; writeth, an Ambition that way, he made himself Popular by pretence to the Love 7, 98, &c. of Justice, which then ran at a low Ebb amongst them, for want of Authority. He first took upon him to decide the Controversies of his own Village; which, performing with much Equity and Conscience, thence became known to other Parts; and at length became to Famous, that few would bring their Causes before any other Judge than him alone. Being aware of this, he withdrew himfelf, giving out, that no longer could he undergo fuch a Burden, and thereby neglect his Private Affairs. Hereupon, Robberies, Violence and Oppression returned throughout the Countrey; infomuch, that the People, gathering together from all Quarters, after a ferious Debate, concluded there was necessity of having a King, under whose Protection every man living might the better mind his Domestick Mat-Deioces, how ters. About 71 years after, Nabonafar, or Nabonaffar, obtained the Kingdom there; from the Beginning of whose Reign, that Famous Æra, or Epoche, known by the Name of Æra Nabonafari, is derived. It is counted from the first Day of that Agyptian Month Thoth (Febr. 26.) which fell out 746 Julian years, and 310 days before the Æra of Christ, as Cappellus, and others reckon; 424 years before the Death of Alexander the Great; according and having ruled with abundant Severity, 53 years, left the Kingdom to his Son Phraortes. He, after he had Reigned 22, left, for Successor, his Son Cyaxares, who

to Ptolomy (c) the Prince of Mathematicians, in the 8th. Olympiad. This Author (c) Magn. synhath preferved the Names of such as Succeeded Nabonafar, in his Catalogue of tax.1.3. c.8. Kings. He Reigned 14 years; after him, Nadiis, 2; then Chezirus, or Porus, 5; Jugens, or Ilulens, 5, and then Mardocempadis, 26, in his Time happened the (d) (d) lim 1.4. three most Ancient Eclipses of the Moon, observed by the Babylonians: The first c. 6, 7. of them in the first of his Reign, and the 28th of the Month Thosh, and the 27th year of Nabonafar. The second, in his Second year, on the 18th of Thosh. And 176 days, 20 hours and an half after this, the third Eclipse fell out, on the 15th day of the Month Phamenoth. Scaliger and others, think this Mardokempad to be the same with him, who, in the (e) Scripture is called Merodach-Baladan, the Son (e) 2 King. 201 of Baladan. But Cappellus conjectureth there were two Merodachs, Sons of Bala-12. dan, and Nephews of Nabonafar, whereof the one was called Merodac-Kempad. and the other, Merodac-Baladan.

16. Mardokempadus, having Reigned 12 years, was succeeded by Arkianus, who ruled 5. Then followed an Inter-regnum for two years; after which, Belibus obtained the Kingdom for 3; then Apronadius, 6; Rigibelus, 1; Mefeffimordak, 4; after whom, another Inter-regnum enfued for eight years; he being also written Meselficardac. Now the Royal Race seemeth to (f) one, to have failed, and E-(royal Park) Sarchaddon the King of Affyria, to have again subjected the Babylonians to his King-Testament. ad dom; and his Reason is, for that he who followed at the end of this Inter-regnum, A. M. 3323. is by Ptolomy called Assaradinus, which he thinketh to differ only from Efarchaddon in the Sound of feveral Languages. If fo, this is he, who brought out of the East-Countrey, Strangers to inhabit Samaria; whence, Salmaneffer had, 40 of more years before, transported the Ephramites. He is also, by the Posterity of this new Colony, called the Great and Noble Asnapper. But how this Assyrian Kingdom had fprung up again, during these two Principalities of the Babylonians and Medes, is to be confidered.

17. It is not probable that the valt Empire of Sardanapalus was all (nor perhaps The Arifing anew of the greatest part) subject to Media and Babylon; but that, although Arbaces left Affrica Ring not the Meder to their Liberty, yet feveral People he did, for want of Power to dom. How, keep them under: Hence, in some time, the People beyond Emphrates, weary of when, and by the Aparchy and Conference on the property of the People beyond the permitted by william to add that Anarchy and Confusion under which they laboured, might be willing to admit of a Prince again, though not of the Old Stock of Belis'; whose Successors, having far excelled in Power and Dominion, the Greeks accounted Sardanapalus

the last King of the Assirians. Who this new Prince should be, remaineth very obfoure. 18. After the Subversion of the kingdom of Ifrael, he over-ran all Phanicia and Syria. He fent an Army against the Tyrians, at such time as Elulaus their King, made War upon the Citteans, which had Rebelled; but a Peace was prefently made, and he drew back his Forces. Not long after, Sidon, Arce, Paletyrus, and other Towns revolted from the Tyrians, to him; so that they alone standing out, he returned; and having a Supply of 60 Ships from the Phanicians, ingaged with them in a Sea-Fight; but they having but 12, yet overthrew his Fleet, and thereby obtained great Credit. At his Return, he set Guards upon the River, and Water-Courses, and there kept them five years together; which constrained them to make a Shift with Wells and Pits, as Menander (f) related out (f) Apad Jose-

The time of this Saolduchinus falling in with that of Deioces (who according to Herodotus, built Echatane the Metropolis of Media) if any Credit be to be given to the Book of Judith, we may judge him to be that Nabuchadonofor mentioned there to have overthrown Arphaxad, King of the Medes, and Builder of that City in the great Plains of Ragan. After he had taken him in the Mountains, he flew him, plundred Echatane, and then returned Victoriously unto Niniveh, where he Feafted his Army for 120 dayes. The Year after, entring into Confultation how to subdue the several Nations about him; he ordained Holophernes his General, who straightly Besieged Bethsara, a Town of Judea; by the Wisdom and Courage of Judith, the Widow of one Manaffes of the Tribe of Ephraim, was circumvented, and had his Head cut off in his Tent.

21. Saosduckinus (or Saosducmus) having Reigned twenty years, Chuniladanus Succeeded him, thought also to be the same with Saracus, mentioned by Alexander Polybiffor. Against him came (a) Phracetes, the Son of Dejoces, in revenge (a) Herodoms of his Father's Death; after he had first of all others subdued the Perssans, and b. 11022.00. the rest of Asia. But his good Fortune here forsook him, and he perished with the greatest part of his Army, in the 22th, year of his Reign. His Son Cyaxares Succeeding, is faid to have been more puilsant than his Ancestors, and the first that distinguished the People of Asia into several Provinces, and Souldiers into their several Ranks of Pikemen, Horsemen, and those that used Darts. He fought with the Lydians; at which time so great an Eclipse of the Sun happened, that the Day seemed to be turned into Night. Having brought to his Obedience all Alia, beyond the River Halys, he gathered his Forces together, and went against Niniveh, with Intentions to destroy the City. He overthrew the Affirians in Battel, and Befieged the Place; but it happened at this time that a great Army of The Scythians Scythians, having driven the Cimmerians out of Europe, under the Conduct of obtain Asia 28 Madyes, the Son of Protothya (called otherwise Judathyrsus) their King, still fol-

Cyaxares hereby was constrained to raise his Siege, went, and gave them Battel; but was overthrown, and lost the Dominion of Asia; which, the Scythians having obtained, marched straight for Ægypt. Planmetiches the King met them on their way, when they had new entred Palestine, and by good Words, back'd with Money, prevailed with them to go no further. They enjoyed the Dominion of Asia 28 years; after the expiration of which Term, managing their Affairs with as great Neglect, as formerly they had used Diligence in polling and rifling the Countrey; the greatest part of them being entertained by Cyawares, were made drunken, and flain, and the King recovered his Dominion. At this time A. M. 3378. the Prophecies against Ninivel seem to be fulfilled in its Destruction. For in the latter end of the Greek Book of Tobit it is written, that Nebuchadonofor and Affuerus took Niniveh, Tobius being yet alive, who is said to have lived 127 years (or, as the Latine hath it, 99.) 95 having already passed from the taking of Samaria; at which time he was carried Captive with his Father into Assiria by Salma-

24. He distributed the Captives into Colonies about Babylon, adorned the Temple of Belus (which Semiramis had built) with the Spoiles; repaired and increased the Buildings of the City, and fortified the Chanel of the River, that the Enemy should not make Use of it against the Town. He added a new City to the old, and compassed both with three Walls of Brick. He raised divers remarkable Ædifices, built a new Palace, and about it a Garden or Wilderness, so much celebrated by the Gracians. His Wife being a Mede, and, according to the Nature of her Country, delighting in mountainous woody Prospects, brought him to imitate with Art, what was wanting in the Plains of Babylon. This Garden was Vide Diodor. made four-square, taking up in Compass fixteen Acres, in height equalling the 116. 2. p. 70. B. Walls, fet with tall and beautiful Trees. It was borne up by stone-Pillars; upon which a Pavement of four-squared Stones being laid, Earth was heaped up in great Quantity, and Engines were made for the Conveyance of Moisture out of Euphrales to water it. Four Moneths after, he also car- 2 Chron. 36. ried away Captive Jechonias, or Jehojachim his Son, and made Mattaniah his Un-Jerem. 22, cle King in his stead. This Mattaniah, whom he named Zedekiah, rebelled against him, notwithstanding his solemn Oath of Fealty taken at his Institution; and therefore in the eleventh year of his Reign he was also taken by the Babylonian, had his Eyes put out, and was so carried to Babylon: the Temple and City were burnt with Fire, and the People led into Captivity, as will appear in its proper

25. Nebuchadnesar returning home, was exceeding Proud, and puffed up at his Success. He erected a great Image of Gold; in the Dedication whereof, all Daniel 3: his chief Officers were commanded to fall down and worship; which was obeyed by all except three Jews, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, the Companions of Daniel. For their Punishment they were cast into a fiery Furnace, heated seven times hotter than usual, and so miraculously preserved from the Fury of the Flame, that not an Hair of their Heads was sing'd; though it killed those that cast them in. At this, the King astonished, by publick Edict acknowledged Gods Power, and forbad the blaspheming of him. Yet repented he not of his Pride, and notwithstanding a sufficient Warning given him by God in a Dream, exaltbuilt for the House of the Kingdom, by the Might of his Power, and for the Honour of his Majesty. But the same Hom, as he was answered by a Voice from Heaven, the Kingdom departed from him, he was driven from men, made to eat Grass as Oxen, and his body was wet with the Dew of Heaven, till his Hairs were grown as Eagles Fea-thers, and his Nails like Birds Claws, and seven times passed over him, till he knew that the most High ruleth in the Kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will. And this time prefixed being expired (seven years as most suppose, though some reckon but three and an half, counting for times, Winter and Summer) his Reason returned to him, with the Glory of his Kingdom, his Honour and Brightness; his Councellors and his Lords fought unto him; he was established in his Kingdom, and excel-lent Majesty was added to him. Therefore he shamed not by a publick Writing to own the thing, praised, honoured and extolled the King of Heaven, all whose works he consessed to be Truth, his wayes Judgment, and that those that walk in Pride he is

26. Of these strange Passages the Heathen were not utterly ignorant. Abyde-Apad Eastb. nus wrote, that being exceeding proud, and going up upon his Palace, he was the taken with a divine Fury. This he had out of the Annals of the Chaldeans, who Anal spice. fancied him to have been feized on with a prophetick Spirit, and so to have va-pan, hip in nished. Megasthers in his fourth Book of India, endeavoured to shew how this King in valiant Exploits exceeded Hercules by far; that he subdued the chief City of Africk, and a good part of Spain. Diocles, in his second Book of Persia, made mention of him, and Philostratus both in his Histories of Phenicia and India; writing, that he fought against Tyre thirteen years, which, 'tis probable, at length he took by Composition, and there placed Baal King in the room of Ithobalus. What he did against this City, God taking as Service done to himself, promised Ezek. 20. him the Land of Egypt for his Wages, which we must accordingly believe to have been paid. At length, having foretold that Babylon should be lost to Cyrns, as Abydenses wrote; he died after he had reigned forty three Years, being in Ptolomies Catalogue of Kings, called Nabocolassar, which may be corruptly written for Nabocodolassar.

Evilmerodach.

27. Evilmerodach his Son succeeded him, who lifted up the Head of Jehoiakim King of Judah, in the 37th year of his Captivity, spake kindly unto him, set his A. M. 3440. Nerigliffor after his Death, reigned four. After him came his Son Laborofardochus; who being of an untowardly Disposition, was made away by his Relations, after nine Moneths, and they preferred to his Place one Nabonidus a Babylonian, by Ptolomy called Nabonadius, by others, Nabannidochus and Labynitus. cession we have from Berosus the Chaldean, attested by Ptolomy, who yet leaveth out Laborosardochus, either for his small Continuance, or because he reigned together with his Father. But learned men do not agree in the manner of reconciling whether the this History, with what Daniel hath written of Belshazar. Some will have Labynifame with Bil- tus or Nabonodus, to be Belshazar, Nabonodus being the last of the Kings, which Bellhagar also seemeth to be; at his Death, Babylon being taken by Cyrus, as the Interpretation of the Writing on the Wall hinteth : Peres, Thy Kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians. As for Darius the Mede, he seemeth to them to be noother than Cyaxares, the Son of Allyages King of Media, and the Uncle of Cyrus, who of his own Accord delivered Babylon to him: and they think this sufficient to prove that Laborosardochus could not be Belshazar, because he hath but nine Moneths affigned him by Berofus, whereas we read in Daniel of the third year of Belshazar.

28. Others think they have ground enough to deny Nabonidus to be Belshazar, who is called the Son of Nebuchadnesar; in regard no such Relation is mentioned by Berosus, that can intitle him to so much as his Grand-child, which Laborefardochus was by his Daughter, being called his Son by a common Hebraism: For the Latin Version of Josephus, which maketh Nabonodus of the Blood; it is in no case agreeable to the Original, which plainly relateth him to have been of the Conspiracy. For the fifth year of Belfhazar, it well enough agreeth with Laborofardochus, iz Tile autile because he reigned four years with his Father; and after his Fathers Death, nine anoughous Moneths by himself. Now the History of Daniel only relateth Belsbazar to have been flain, not that Babylon was then befieged by Cyrus: it being improbable, fay they, that a time of fo great Danger, the King and his Nobles should spend in Feafting and Jollity; but rather likely, that behaving himfelf too infolently in that drunken Fit, he was knocked in the Head by his Companions, as Berofus 270 citator hinteth, and the Scripture rather seemeth to approve than contradict. As for the descripturari-Interpretation of the Writing on the Wall, it might note what was already determined, and within a little time was to be accomplished, concerning Cyrus the Persian, who being at that time known to the World, could not be hid from Daniel, who had met with his name long before in the Prophecy of Isaiah, and had his Mind, without Doubt, fixed upon the 70 years of Captivity foretold by Jeremiah; to which a Period should shortly be put by that Person. That Darius Medus was of Median Descent, appeareth, but that he was King of the Medes, can no way be evinced; especially seeing that no ancient Greek Historian maketh mention of (a) Green ad Cyaxares the Son of Aftyages, (whom we read to have had but one Daughter) ex-quintum fracept Xenophon; and he either one Purpole seemeth to thwart Herodotus, or to from Ep. 1. have written his Cyropedia, rather (a) to shew, what a Prince ought to be, than what Grand Cyrus Cyrus was indeed, and so to have taken some of that Liberty of Invention which of George de others (b) have done of late upon the same and other Subjects. But though Jo-vernour of No-vernour of Nofeph Scaliger may feem to shew more Reason for this latter Affertion, yet Pereri-fire Dame de la us truly affirmeth the thing to be obscure, perplexed, and difficult. mance of 10

Cyrus.

29. If Laborosardochus be taken for Belshazar, then Nabonodus must be the same with Darius Medus; whom further, some would have to be the Brother of Aftyages, not his Son, and yet called Cyaxares. In him the Empire of the Babylonians ceased, and was derived upon the Persians by Cyrus, whose first Beginnings are to be viewed, with the Progress of his Actions, which made way to that Pitch of Greatness whereat he arrived. Herein Historians do not relate the same things. That Aftyages was his Grand-father is acknowledged by all, except Ciesias, who will have them nothing akin, and calleth him Aftyigas: His Father's name is granted to be Cambyses, his Country Persia, but his Condition is diversly reported The Sum of of. Herodotus writeth how Alfrages dreaming two Dreams concerning his Daughwhit Herodotes ter Mandame, (which by the Wizards were interpreted to portend the Loss of his ren concerning Kingdom, through the Greatness of her Issue) gave her in Marriage to one Cam-his Birth and byfes a Persian, of obscure Fortune; and not satisfied in this Security, sent for her when the was with Child, and as foon as the Boy was born, gave him to one Harpagus to be made away. Harpagus fearing he might afterwards be called to an Account by the Mother, for Violence offered to the Babe, delivered him to the Kings Shepherd, to be exposed in the Woods to the Mercy of the wild Beasts. This being done, and the Shepherd's Wife lately brought to Bed of a still-born Child, the prevailed with her Husband to fetch him home; nursed and brought him up as her own Son amongst the Shepherds. At seven years of Age being chosen King of the Boyes in their Play, he executed the Office with Severity, towards such as were disobedient, and for this was complained of by their Parents to the King. Being sent for and accused of the Crime, he would acknowledge none, alledging he had done like a King; and standing in his Justification without the least Change of Countenance, Assages was struck with Admiration, and presently called to mind his Dream. Upon Examination of the Shepherd, he got out the whole matter; owned him for his Grand-son, because he thought the Dream fulfilled in his boyish Reign amongst the Shepherds; only he thought it good to fend him out of the way into Persia.

30. But to punish Harpagus for his Disobedience, he invited him to Supper, and caused to be served up to the Table his only Son; of which, after he had eaten heartily, and approved the meat, he let him see his Entertainment, by the Head, hands and Feet, referved in another Platter, Harpagus for the prefent kept down his Passion, seeming to acquiesce in the Kings Pleasure, untill Cyrus came to mans Estate. Then, hearing of his Activity and Forwardness, he resolved by Presents to make him his Friend, meditating a convenient way of Revenge by the means of this Youth, from whom he expected something answerable to his Grand-fathers Dream. Knowing Astyages his tyrannical Carriage towards the Medes, he infinuated himself into the chief of them by Degrees, and secretly perswaded them, that it was convenient he should be removed from the Government, especially seeing they might with some Plausibility place Cyrus in his Seat. Having thus made War, he wrote Letters to the young man into Persia, (which, to prevent Discovery, he fowed up in the Belly of an Hare) wherein recalling to his Memory what he had suffered from his Grand-father upon his Account, he sollicited him to draw the Persians to revolt; then to come down with an Army into Media, where he might be fure of him or any other the Kings Generals, and so easily become Ma-fter of all. 31. Cyrus considering of a way how to accomplish this Business, which now he made no less than a Design, called the Persians together; first gave out, that he was chosen their General by Astrages, and then easily perswaded them, by laying open, how much Liberty was to be preferred before that Slavery they now underwent, to close with him and break out into open Rebellion. The old man hearing this, fent a Messenger for him; but he returned Answer, he would come fooner than he should have cause to defire his Company; whereupon he armed his Subjects of Media, and forgetting how he had formerly injured Harpagus, committed the Army to his Conduct. Harpagus revolting, he lost thereby the first Battel, yet was not daunted, but threatned Cyrus, nailed to Crosses the Magicians who had perswaded him to dismis him, and arming all both old and young that were in the City, led them out to a fecond Engagement, wherein his throweth Ally Success was worse than before, he being taken Prisoner. When Harpagus, boastages his Grand-father, ing of his Revenge, infulted over him, he taxed him of Imprudence and Injustice:

of the one, for that having Power to make himself King he should transferr the Dignity to another; and of the other, because for to revenge a private Injury, he had enflaved the whole Nation of the Medes, out of which he might rather have chosen one to the Kingdom, refusing it himself, than Him, who would now fo order the matter, that the Perstans, Slaves before, should be Lords and Masters of all. Thus Astrages lost his Kingdom, after he had held it thirty five years, enjoying all things else at his Grand-son's hands, till his natural Death: And the Medes became subject to the Persians, after they had enjoyed the Dominion of Asia beyond the River Halys, the space of 128 years, (except that Space wherein the Scythians kept them under) and in the second year of the 55th Olympiad. of the World 3446.

Herodous dians being accounted the first (b) of all Nations, that busied themselves in Cook-116. 1.6.49. ery, infomuch that they became a Proverb for it.

33. The Antiquity of the Lydians appeareth further out of the ancient Fables, market. Attis, Tuntalus, Pelops, Niobe and Arachne, being of this Country: Their Fruitfulness, from the Colonies they sent out into Peloponnessus and Caria, into Etruria also as they fay. Their Valour and Power is shewn to have been of great Antiquity Euseb. in from their holding the Dominion of the Sea 92 years, which they took from the Chron. Cretians about the time of Jepibe, and 1200 years before Christ, losing it again and recovering it afterwards. But Candaules with his Family being extinct, and Families of Ly- the Kingdom devolved upon the Mermnade (of whom Crafus descended) the Power of the Nation grew greater also at Land. These Heraclida, held it the space of 505 years, through twenty two Successors unto this Candaules, who so Herodoms I.z. far being enamoured of his Wife, as he esteemed her the most beautiful of all Wo- a 8, &c. men, constrained his Servant Gyges to see her naked. She espying Gyges whilst therein he only fatisfied his Masters Will, offered him the Choice of killing her Husband, and marrying her with the Kingdom, or of suffering Death himself; one of their two Lives being the leaft the could require in way of Justice. He in so great a Strait, preferring his own Safety before his Mafter's Life, slew him in his Bed-chamber, the place where the Fault was committed, and so enjoyed the Queen with the Kingdom; wherein he was confirmed by the Oracles of Delphos, to the Sentence of which, he and his Adversaries had agreed to stand.

34. Gyges reigned thirty eight years; in which Space, he made War upon Miletts and Supraa, and took the City Colopbars, Ardys his Son and Succeffor fubdued Priene, fought against Miletue; and in his time the Cimmerians being expelled their Seats by the Scythian Nomades, passed into Asia, and took Sardis, all but the Castle. He reigned forty nine years, his Son Sadyattes twelve, who gave Place to Alvartes his Son and Successor. Algattes waged a War with * Cya- vide supra paxares King of Media, and expelled the Cimmerians out of Asia; took Smyrna, and rigraph. 21. fet upon Clasomene. In the fixth year of the War betwixt the Median and him, whilst they fought upon equal Terms, the Sun was ecclipsed, which Thales, one of the feven wife men, had foretold to his Milesians. Both the Armies seeing the Day beginning to be turned into Night, left off fighting, and then by the Mediation of Syennesis the Cicilian, and Labynitus the Babylonian a Peace was concluded; Ariena the Daughter of Halyattes being marryed to Astrages the Son of Cyaxares, From the Tables of Ptolomy (or of Hipparchus) it appeareth that this Eclipse happened in the fourth year of the forty sourth Olympiad, the 147th of Nabonafar, the fourth day of the Ægyptian Moneth Pachon, (which answereth to the twentieth of September, three hours and twenty five Minutes before noon; nine Digits being eclipfed, and the Duration almost two hours. Halyattes purfued also the War left him by his Father, against Miletus, the Inhabitants whereof received from him two great Blows, for that none of the Ionians helped them except the Chians, in way of requital for the Aid they had afforded them against the Erythraans. At length, having Notice that he intended to fend a Messenger into the Ciey, at the Command of Thrasybulus their Prince, they brought all the Provision they had into the Market-place, which appearing to be much, and as fuch related to Alyattes, he thinking himself mistaken in his former Belief of their diffressed Condition, made Peace with them; and died after he had reigned fifty

35. Cræssus his Son succeeded him, at the Age of thirty five years. He made Herod. ad sir War upon Ephessus, which when he besieged, the Towns-men for their Security pra. c. 26. &c. gave up the City to Diana, by a Rope fastned from the Wall to her Temple; but for all this he brought them under, and subdued all the rest of the Greek Cities in the Continent. He brought into his Subjection all the People of Alia. within the River Halis, as the Phrygians, Mysians, Bythinians, Paphlagonians, the Mariandyni, Chalibes, Thracians, Thyni, Carians, Ionians, Dorians, Alolians, Lycians and Cilicians. Being grown great, and flowing with Wealth, and flourishing with Glory, the choicest Wits of Greece flocked to Sardis, and amongst the rest Solon the Athenian, who being now in his Travels, had been with Amelis of Heppt, and now came to visit Craesus. He kindly entertained him, and shewing him his Treasures, out of a vain Conceit of his own Felicity, demanded of him, whom he thought the happiest man. He answered, he esteemed for such one Tellus an Athenian, who having lived in good Credit, and leaving divers Children and Nephews of honest and vertuous Carriage, died in the War at Eleusine, after he had first helped to put to flight the Enemy; for which he was honoured by his Citizens with a publick and stately Funeral. Crassus expecting, if not the first, yet the second place, asked him, Whom he accounted next to Tellus, he replied Cleobis and Biton, two Brothers of Argos, who had fufficient to live on, and being very strong, had gotten the better in Trial of Masteries. On a time at the Feast of Juno, their Mother being to be drawn in a Chariot to the Temple, and the Heiffers not at hand, they yoked themselves, and drew her thither. She being much affected with the Piety of her Sons, prayed the Goddess, that whatfoever was best for Man, might be bestowed on them, who sleeping that night in the Temple, were found dead in the Morning, and honoured by the Argives with two Statues, erected to their Memory at Delphos.

36. The King was troubled that his Felicity should be so little valued, as not comparable to that of private men. But Solon plainly told him, that all things were uncertain in this Life, and no man ought to be accounted happy till his End; for which Philosophy, as strange to the Courtiers, he was dismissed with fmall Reputation for Learning. Crafus, growing exceeding proud and irreligious; to humble him, had a Dream. That the choifest of his two Sons, (whereof one was dumb) should be slain with the iron Head of some Weapon. Hereupon he removed all things of that Nature out of the way, looked to him diligently, and married him out of hand. But at this time it hapned, that a certain wild Boar haunted about the Mountain Olympus in Mylia, which, doing great harm to the Inhabitants, they were in no wife able to mafter, and therefore fent to Creefus, desiring him to send his Son, accompanied with a sufficient Train, to hunt and kill the wild Beast. He plainly denied, because of his Dream, to let him ftir from home; but the young man, having a great defire to the Exercise, thereby to approve himself for Activity to his new married Wife, obtained Leave to be fent, faying, that no fuch thing would be used in the game as that of which he had dreamed. He committed him then to the Care of one Adrastus, the Son of Gordius (and he of Midas) King of Phrygia, who having at unawares killed his Brother, had been banished by his Father. When they came into the Field, and had dislodged the Boar, Adrastus throwing a Dart at him, chanced to hit the young man, and so fulfilled the Dream; for which, offering himself to be killed, upon Cræsus his Refusal, as done without any Intention, he yet slew himself. Crasus took the Accident very heavily, and kept himself in Mourning

37. This Mourning was broken off by the Prosperity of Cyrus, who having now overthrown the Kingdom of the Medes, advanced highly the Affairs of Persia. Herein he found himself exceedingly concerned, so as to withstand, if possible, his Success, and make an Addition thereby to his own Fortune. For Encourage-Crossus Halves ment in this Design, he sent to enquire of the Oracles for and near; which an-griffus, magfwering with one Consent, that he should overturn a great Principality, he was nam perver fwering with one Consent, that he should overturn a great Principality, he was organism, much incouraged, not doubting but that of the Persians was meant thereby; and much more, atter the Oracle at Delphos had (in Answer to his Requiry, whether his Empire should long continue) bid him look to himself, when a Mule should have Possession of the Sovereignty of Media; taking this in a literal Sense, notwithstanding the constant Ambiguity of such Answers. Now (the Oracle giving way to it) he sent to make a League with the Lacedemonians, who being obliged to him, cafily complied; though no Supplies do we read of fent to him. For he, being in great Hafte, prevented the fending of any; and, with all the Force he could make, invaded Cappadocia, to revenge, as he pretended, upon Cyrus, the Injury offered to Aftyages his Brother-in-Law; but indeed to lay that fertile Country to his own Dominions. Having passed the River Hayis, he came into a place of Cappadocia called Pteria, the most safe of all the Country, near to the City Sinope, which was fituated upon the Euxine Sea. Taking up his Quarters here, he made Incursions, took the City of the Pterians, with all the rest round about, and banished the Syrians (so were the Cappadocians called by the Greeks, till subjected to the Persian Empire) though they had nothing ill deserved at his hands. 38. Cyrus coming against him sent to the Ionians, to draw them to his Party;

parted them, many falling on both fides. Craesius, though neither Party owned any Defeat, was blamed by his Souldiers for Ingaging with fo numerous an Army; so that, Cyrus not stirring out against him the next day, he thought it best to retreat to Sardis, and fent out of Hand for Aid to Amelis King of Ægypt, and Labynitus of Babylon, whom he had by a League obliged to him: to the Lacedamonians also, to dispatch their Auxiliary within five Moneths, with which, resting Retreateth to that Winter, he would re-invade the Persians the following Spring. Accordingly he dismissed all his Mercenaries, standing then in no need of them, as he thought a which Cyrus hearing, refolved with all Speed to follow him to Sardis, hoping he might utterly defeat him before he could recollect his Forces: and accordingly marching into Lydia, he prevented any Mellage of his Coming. Crassin, though exceedingly perplexed at so unexpected a thing, gathered his Subjects together, as time would give Leave, and provided for his Defence; which the other perceiving, and fearing the Power of his Horse (wherein the Lydians excelled all other People of Asia) took off the Burthens from all the Camels that followed the Camp, and fetting Riders upon them, placed them in the Front; the smell Overthrown of which (when the Armies joyned) the Horses not enduring, turned aside. Yet were not the Riders thereby deterred from Fighting, but dismounting, performed on Foot what could be expected, till over-powered, rather with number than Va-

but they standing off, he proceeded, and pitcht his Camp against Creefus. After some Skirmishes the Armies ingaged, and a very hot Dispute continued, till night

And belieged lour, they were put to Flight, and belieged in the City.

39. Cræsius thinking he might possibly be able to hold out some considerable time, fent again to his Confederates to haften their Succours. But Cyrus, on the fourteenth day of the Siege offering a great Reward to him that should first mount the Wall, one Hyraades, a Mardian, having taken notice of a place, which because of its Height and Precipitancy was held impregnable, and therefore neglected by the Besieged (where yet he had seen a Souldier come down to setch his Helmet, he had let fall) made means to climb up, and after him more and

Sardis taken, more followed, till the City was thereby furprized. All Places being full of Slaughters, a Souldier not knowing Creefus, was about to kill him; which he neglected, as willing to dye with his Kingdom. But his dumb Son, affrighted at vide Harod. the Danger he saw him in is said to have broken Silence (or Dumbnes) with this the text expression, Man, do not kill Craffus, and thenceforth to have enjoyed the Use of 15.6.5. his Tongue. Thus Cræsus overturned a great Principality, as the Oracle hadfore-Val. Max. 1. 5. told, after he had reigned fourteen years, and been belieged so many Days. 4 Ext. Ex-

Herewith the Conquerour was so affected, that, considering the Uncertainty of his own prosperous Condition, though the Pile was already kindled, yet commanded he the fire to be quenched, and receiving him into his most inward Counsels, held him ever most dear, and in great Esteem for his Wisdom; wherein, after such mani- A. on the same Terms as the Lydians were received; but he returned them no Satisfactory Answer, because of their Refusal formerly to joyn with him. All of them then (except the Milesans, those having yielded themselves) made their Application to the Lacedamonians, who refused to grant any Aid; but sent some to make Discovery how matters went in Asia. The Messengers sinding Cyrus at Sardis, according to Order acquainted him with the Pleasure of that Republick, not to fuffer him to molest any of the Greek Cities. He enquiring what the Lacedemonians were, presently slighted them, and answered, That if the Gods preferved him, they should have Cause to bewail their own Calamities, and not busie themselves with what concerned the Ionians. He committed Sardis to the Custody of Tabalus, a Persian; to Pattyas a Lydian, the Treasure of Crassus and others: and so set out for Echatane, making little Account of the Ionians (against whom he intended to fend fome Lieutenant) in Comparison of Babylon, the Badrians, Sace and Ægyptians, upon all which he had cast an hungry Eye with Pasiyas revolt- purpose to invade them. After his Departure Pastyas revolted, and drawing into Rebellion the Maritime Coasts, besieged Tabycus; whereat Cyrus being angry, as esteeming it a Plot of the Lydians, Crassus fearing worse things might come upon them, after an Excuse of the Generality, advised him to take from them the Use of Arms, and enure them to effeminate Courles, whereby they would eafily be ventri indulekept under. Cyrus according to his Advice, dispatched away with an Army, one v., however, Mazares a Mede, who sinding Sardis deserted by Pastyas, put in Execution what objections (Cressis had advised. 41. Pactyas having fled to Cuma, Mazares sent to demand him of the Citizens; but, they dismissing him, he fled to Mytilene, and thence to the Chians, who sold him to Mazares. He then reduced such as had revolted, and harassing the Country of Priene, with that lying upon Meander and Magnesia, fell sick and died. Harpagus the Mede succeeded him, and out of hand undertook an Expedition against the Ionians. The Phoceans being first besieged, obtained Truce for a day, and then shipping themselves, left their ancient Seat, and passed over into the Island Chius, and thence (for that the Chians refused to sell them the Islands Ocnusa, lest they should thither carry the Trassique) to Cyrnus, where twenty years before, they had built a City called Alalia. Here playing the Pirates, they were after five years defeated in a Sea-fight by the Tyrrhenians and Carthaginians, and then those that remained passed over to Rhegium in Italy, where they built a City named Hyela, in the Territories of Oenotria. The Teians also, after their Example departed into Thrace; where they built up a City called Abdera, the Foundations of it being formerly laid by one Temelius a Cla-The Ionians zomenian, whom the Thracians thence expelled. The rest of the Ionians stood it out against Harpagus, who yet utterly subdued, and forced them to undergo the Yoke the second time, having refused to follow the Counsel of Bias the Prienaan, (one of the seven wise men of Greece,) who advised them to shun Servitude by going to Sardinia, and there Planting themselves in one great and common City; as they had formerly rejected the Advice of Thales the Milesian (another of that number) to fet up one common Court at Tens in the middle of Ionia. After the Conquest of the Ionians, Harpagus subdued the Carians, Caunians, and Lycians, and brought all the lower Asia under the Dominion and Sovereignty of Cyrus, who in the mean while not idle, did as much by the upper Provinces; leaving nothing in his way, but clearing all before him.

42. Having conquered the rest of the Continent, he went against the Assyrians, who, being aware of him, had furnished themselves in Babylon for a long Siege. Coming to the River Gyndes (which rising in the Mantienean Mountains, runneth through the Country of the Dardaneans, and emptieth it felf in Tigris) he could find no Ford to pass it, and a certain white Horse, sacred to the Sun, boldly taking the Water, was overwhelmed in the Floods. Hereat being exceeding angry, he threatned to reduce it to fuch a Condition, as it should not be kneedeep, and accordingly fetting all his Army on work, derived it into 360 Rivulets, in which Employment he foent all that Summer. The Spring following, he marched for Babilon, the King whereof (Labinitus) opposed him; but, being defeated, retreated into the City, to which he then laid close Siege. In vain for a long time did he attempt the Taking of it. At length he divided his Army, and leaving the two stronger parts of it, the one at that side of the Town where the River entred, the other there where it came out; with the third he retired into the adjoyning Fens, and digging great Ditches derived the River into them. Hereby he brought it to such an Ebb, that his Souldiers easily passing it, became Masters of the City, and he of the Babylonian or Assyrian Empire. This is the Sum of what Herodotus hath written concerning the prosperous Fortune of

The Sum of Xinophon's Cy-

43. Xenophon, contrary to the former Story, will have Cambyfes his Father no obscure man; but King of Media: not a word from him of his Grand-father's Dream, or Exposing of the Infant. When he was twelve years old, he was sent for by Astyages into Media, where having tarried till almost a man, and being admired for Understanding and Abilities far above his Age; he returned to his Father, and entred into the College of Youth, where he was trained up in all ton parform. ftrict Discipline according to the Customs of Persia. Astrages dying, Craxares Xinoph. Circhis Son fucceeded him, at what time the King of Affyria having subdued all the initian. Syrians, Arabians, Hyrcanians, and had now fallen upon the Ballryans, promifed himself the absolute Empire of the East; if he could but bring under the Medes and Persians. He sent therefore to all his Neighbours; to Crassis King of Lydia the King of Cappadocia, to both the Phrygians, Casians, Paphlagonians, Cilicians, and Indians, accusing these two Nations of ambitious Designs to enslave them all, and procured them to joyn with him in an offensive and defensive League against them. Cyaxares hearing this, defired of Cambyfes his Brother-in-law to fend down Cyrus to him, with an Army; Cyrus being accordingly chosen General by the People, first subdued the Armenians, who because of this Combination of the Princes, had denyed to pay their accustomed Tribute to Cyaxares, and then perswaded his Uncle to invade the Assyrians, to keep the War from his own doors.

44. Making then an Inroad into Affyria, the King thereof, Crafus of Lydia, and divers other Confederates came against them, but in the first Engagement were worsted, and beaten back into their Camp, and amongst others the Affyrian himself (Neriglisson, if any) was slain. The Night following, all brake out of the Fortifications and fled; whereupon Cyrus prevailing with his Uncle to fuffer him to pursue them, with as many of the Medes as would follow him of their own Accord, in his way entred into Confederacy with the Hyrcanians, through the Conduct of whom he overtook, and again defeated them: they also slew the Kings of Cappadocia and Arabia. After this he invaded the Territories of the Babylonians, went up to the City it felf, and challenged the King to a fingle Combat, who refusing it, he, after some few Skirmishes thereabout returned to Craxares, upon the Borders of Media, to deliberate about carrying on the War: He found him greatly discontented at his Success (out of Apprehension that he had robbed him of all the Glory) and much averse to the War; but at length he appealed him and so wrought under hand upon the Officers of the Army, that they unanimously voted the War to be carried on. Some time being necessary then for Preparation, he chose out a convenient place for the Army's Quarters; and not long after, understood by certain Fugitives and Prisoners that the King of Affyria was gone towards Lydia with much Treasure.

45. Cyrus, supposing his Design to be for raising men, prepared for the main Chance, by horfing his Persians, inventing new and more convenient Chariots, and, to get Intelligence of the Enemie's Purposes, sent one Araspes into Lydia, who, under Colour of a Revolt, should infinuate himself into their Counsels. This Device taking, he disposed of his Affairs according as he saw behooveful. modelled his Army, and marched against the Confederates, whom without any great Difficulty he overthrew, all but the Hespitans. They put him to fore Trouble, and endangered his Life; but having fall n in upon their Rear, and thereby diverted the Front, he so overpowered them behind and before, as, glad they were to deliver up their Arms, and, upon Promise of better Entertainment, willing to change Masters and serve him. Crassus now, who commanded in Chief. fled amain to Sardis, whither Cyrus pursued him, and getting the Castle into his hands, by the Help of a Persian, who had been Slave to an Officer in it, got Posfession both of the City and its King. He, coming to Cyrus, acquitted the Oracle of Delpkes from all Blame, and took the Fault upon himself, in that he, overweening of his own Condition, had fooled himfelf continually in a fond Opinion of Happiness. After this the Carians falling into two Factions, both fent unto him: and he dispatched to them Adussa with some Forces, who overpowering both the one and the other, compounded their Differences.

Of Sacred History.

46. Then lent he Hystalper into Phrygia, who subdued the Country, and took the King Prisoner; at what time the Greeks of Asia submitted themselves, procuring by Gifts, that they should not be constrained to receive any Garison, but only pay Tribute, and ferve in the Wars. Afterward, in his March to Babylon, he brought under the greater Phrygia, subdued the Cappadocians and Arabians. He fate down before that City with a vast Army, the Walls whereof after he had viewed, he concluded there was no storming of it, and resolved, the best way was to pine them out. Understanding then, that they were provided within for a whole year, he divided his Army into twelve parts, affigning to each a Moneth to lye in Leaguer, at which the besieged scoffed, as utterly out of Danger. But Cyrus taking Notice how the River ran through the City, caused deep Ditches to be made, which by dreining, rendred it fordable, and fo taking Advantage of a folemn Feast, entred by night, and surprized them all in their Cups. The King was flain by Gobryas and Gadatas, who both, being formerly injured by him, had revolted to Cyrus. The Inhabitants, commanded upon pain of Death to deliver up their Arms, instantly obeyed. And thus the Babylonian Empire being quite overthrown, Cyrus assumed to himself Royal Majesty, settling his Court with great Wistlom, wherein Xenophon, in his most exquisite History, maketh him to have excelled, in all things, to Admiration.

Aftrigas, rather than they should be tortured, discovered himfelf, and was first bound with Fetters, but afterwards honoured as a Father by Cirus, who at length married Amytis, having killed Spitama, because he had denied he knew where he was. After the Marriage, the Badrians gave up themselves to Cyrus and Amytis, though formerly they made great and effectual Resistance. He relateth also how Cyrus made War upon the Saca, whose King Amorges he took Prisoner; but Speretha the Queen gathered an Army of 300000 Men, and 200000 Women, and therewith overthrowing Cýrus, took him with other Prisoners, and thereby redeemed her Husband. With the help then of Amorges, he made War upon Cræsus, and besieged Sardis, which City he took by a Stratagem taught him by Oebares; making Images of the Persians, and placing them upon the Walls, at which the Defendants were affrighted. But before this, Cra- Vide Julium upon the vialis, at which the Determants were arrighted. But better this, Gras Frontinum fus, deluded by a Spettrum, gave out his Son, an Hostage to Cyrus, and delaying Stratagum.1.3. to perform what he had promifed, procured his Death, which the Mother be-sap-8-holding from the Wall, tumbled her self down headlong, and yet was not killed; but the City being taken, fled to Apollo's Temple, and died there.

48. Cræsus being bound in the Temple, by an Art he had of Deceiving the sight, three times was loofed, though the Place was fecured, and committed to the Care of Oebares; for which they that were bound with him loft their Heads. Then was he brought into the Palace and more strongly fetter'd, but was loosed again by Thunder and Lightning. Hereat Cyrus his Anger abated, and giving him his Liberty, he used him ever after with great Respect, and bestowed on him a great City called Barene, near to Echatane. After this, Cyrus fent Petifacas his Eunuch to fetch Aftzigas from the Barcanians, both he and his wife having a great Defire to see him: But Petisacas through the Instigation of Oebares lest him in a defart Place, where he was famished to death. The Treachery was revealed by Dreams, and Petifacas was given up into the hands of Amytis, who plucked out his Eyes, his Skin over his Ears, and then crucified him: Oebares fearing the like Punishment, though Cyrus promised him Indemnity, killed himself. As for the Body of Aftyigas it was sumptuously buried, having been guarded by Lions in the Wilderness, till Petisacas setched it away. These improbable things are re-

Having served his Father-in-law and Uncle twenty years, and observing chap. 31, 32, what Envy he had contracted from him and his Sons, he stole away with all he had, and proceeded three days on his Journey, ere his Departure was known. Then Laban with his Friends pursuing, overtook him after seven days in Mount Gilead, which from the Event of this Meeting had its Name. After feveral Expostulations, they made a Covenant (Laban being warned by God not to hurt him) and, in Testimony thereof, laid together an Heap of Stones, which Jacob called Galead; but Laban, in his Syrian Tongue, Jegar-Sehadutha. Jacob then continued his Journey towards Canaan, wrestling with God's Angel in his Way; A. M. 2266. from which he received a Bleffing, and the Sirname of Ifrael. His Brother Efau also met him, and lovingly received him, contrary to his Fears. The first place he stayed at was Succoth, so called because there he built an House, and made Booths for his Cattel. Thence he passed over Jordan, and came to Sichem, where he bought of Hamor, the Father of Sichem, a Field, for a hundred Lambs,

But two years after Joseph had interpreted the Dreams of the Servants of Gen. 41.

Pharaoh, he was called up out of Prison; to explain the meaning of one, which the King himself had dreamed. This, betokening seven years of great Plenty to A. M. 22500 come, and after them as many of Famine; and it being necessary, as he hinted to Pharaoh, to chuse out some wise Man, who being set over the Land, should gather and preserve the Fruits of the Earth, against the time of Want: Pharaob made Choice of him, being about thirty years old, for this purpose: he appointed him next to himself, and gave him in Marriage Assault the Daughter of Pottpberah, Priest of On (or Heliopolis, where Strabo writeth, that the Priests of old time had their Habitation) on which he begat Ephraim and Manasses. According to A. M. 2297 his Prediction, seven most plentiful years ensued, wherein he gathered into Store-Houses the Corn that abounded; and after them came seven other of Famine, which prevailed fore both in Egipt and the neighbouring Countries of Canaan and Arabia. Jacob, amongst others, wanting Provisions, in the second year of the chap. 42, 43, Famine, sent his Sons down into Egypt to buy Corn. Joseph knowing them, &c. though undiscovered, accused them for coming as Spies, cast them into Prison, and dismissed them not, till, Simeon (the eldest of those which conspired against his Life) was bound and left as an Hostage, for their bringing down of Benjamin; that so their Story might be confirmed, of their being one Mans Sons, and that their youngest Brother was left behind. The next year; being pressed with Fa-

16. By Pharaoh's Consent, Joseph placed them in the Land of Goshen, and there Chap. 47. nourished them during the Famine. He fold to the Agptians the Corn formerly treasured up, and therewith purchased for the King all their Money, Goods and Lands, except the Lands of the Priests, which were not alienated. The Grounds he afterwards granted to the former Owners, paying the fifth part of the Profit to Pharaoh's Ule. After Jacob had lived in Heypt seventeen years, he Chap. 48, 49. adopted the two eldest Sons of Joseph, viz. Manasses and Ephraim, of whom the younger he preferred before the elder: He called his Sons together, bleffed them, and told them apart, what should befall them in their Posterity. From Reuben A.M. 2315. his first born he took the Preheminence, because he had defiled his Bed, and gave it to Judah. He prophefied of Christ's Coming, commanded them to bury him in the Cave of Machpelah, in the Land of Canaan, with his Ancestors, and then died at the Age of 147 years, in the year of the World 2315. Joseph caused his Servants the Physitians to embalme Ifrael, and a Mourning of Geventy days (or feventy two,) was observed for him, which number in that Country was only proper to Kings; Then, obtaining Leave of Pharoah, he and his Brethren, with a great Company of Courtiers, carried him into the Land of Canaan, and buried Gen. 50. him there, according to his Will, where they also mourned for him seven 17. Being returned into Egypt, Jeseph forgave his Brethren the Fault they formerly had committed against him (which now they feared he would revenge, after their Fathers Death,) and as long as he lived, he nourished them and their Children. This space of time was fifty four years after his Fathers Death, at the end whereof, having exhorted them to Unity and Concord, foretelling them their Departure out of Egypt, and commanding them thence to carry his Bones, he A.M. 2370-dich dyed at the Age of 110 years, when he had governed Egypt, under feveral Lib. 26.6. Ifrael had ten Sons, to whom he committed the Kingdom, and commanded them to call themselves Jews, from Judah, who died before the Division, and whose Portion was divided amongst them all. The youngest of the ten Sons was Joseph, whose excellent Wit his Brothers fearing, they fold him to some Merchants that carried him down into Hgypt. Here learning the Magick Arts, he became very dear to the King, having skill in working Wonders, and Interpretation of Dreams: moreover, nothing either Divine or Humane was beyond his Reach; infomuch, that he foretold the Barrenness of the Ground several years before it hapned, and all Higgst had perished with Famine, but that the King, by his Advice, caused Corn to be treasured up many years. finally, such was his Knowledge, that his Anfwers seemed rather the Oracles of a God, than the Replies of a Man. Then followeth, that Moses was his Son, who both wise and beautiful, became a Leader to such Ægyptians as were infected with Scab and Itch, and so returned to Damassem, the Country of his Ancestors. Which Lyes (with others hereafter to be mentioned) are to be attributed to the Malice of the Ægyptians. With the Life of Joseph endeth the first Book of Moses his History, called by the Greeks, Genesis, which containeth the Account of 2369 years of the World. The next to it in order of time, the Book of Job is thought to be; of which Moses also is reputed Author, by the common Consent and Opinion of the Hebrews.

Upon the Death of the first-born, he and his Subjects thrust them out with Haste, out of the Land, and forgot the Jewels of Silver and Jewels of Gold, which they had lent A.M. 2508, them. For the Israelites were commanded by God, to borrow these things: and, the Night before their Departure, to kill a Lamb; with the Blood of which they were to sprinkle the Lintels of their Doors, that the Angel appointed to do this Execution upon the first-born, might pass by their Houses, at the fight thereof. From the Departure of the Ifraclites out of Ægypt, to the Death of Solomon, and the Rent of the Kingdom.

The number I. of the Ifraelites at their Departure.

HE Number of the Children of Ifrael may be esteemed by what is recorded concerning their men of War, of the Age of twenty years Pide Pereium and upwards. Of these went out about 600000, besides Women in 121.04.49.E20.64 and Children; so that if those of that Age be reckoned as two parts of five, of the whole Multitude, (which is the usual Account amongst all Nations, to reckon men for War, as forty to a hundred, in respect of the whole Body) then the total number of all, both old and young, amounted to about 1500000. To these must be added a mixed Multitude; which, having taken up their Religion, went out with them, and is thought by some to have consisted of as many more; so that the whole Sum of all together, at that rate, would arise to 3000000. As for the number of the Israelites, it need not seem incredible, that from about 70 Persons in the space of 210 years, so many should proceed. For if but one man, in the thirtieth year of his Age, should begin to be a Father, and had but 19th Jacob. man, in the unritten year of his Age, income or a value, and had not pear jacob, in all ten Children, who also with their Posterity should beget at the same Age, Appell. at in all ten Children, who also with their Posterity should be the fixen the faxen Age, A.M. 2293; that one man, before 200 years, would have descended from him, of the fixth * has minnia. 2. Moses had gathered the People together, as Josephus writeth, about Ramesses in the pair the chief City of Gosphen, that they might be in a Readiness; and thence they quad disput came to Succoth where was their second Station. Here Mose propounded the tamous pair Command of God concerning the annual Observation of the Passeover, and the quiden seasons. Scaling the Passeover Confectation of the first born.

annually to be have been through that of the Philistines; but because the Ifraelites were born oral to in Slavery, and therefore had but low and poor Spirits; to exercise them, to stir them up, and left, for want of Experience, they should be so terrified as to return, God lead them another and longer way. From Succosh therefore they came to Etham in the end of the Desart, in two days; whither God conducted them by a Pillar of a Cloud by day, and Pillar of Fire by night, that never forfook them, till they came to the Borders of the promifed Land. From Etham they journeyed to Pihabiroth, and thence to the Red Sea. Hither Pharash pursued them with all his Forces, repenting he had let them go. They were there exceedingly fruck with Terrour, and murmured against Moses, for bringing them out of Higgs. In this Extremity God divided the Waters of the Red Sea, which being as a Wall on both fides to them, they passed over on dry Ground. The Reppisars essayed also to pursue them in this place, but the Pillar then removed from before them, and placed it felf between them, giving light to the Ifraelites, but caufing great Darkness to their Enemies. Hereupon ensued great Consternation, and a pannick Fear amongst the Respitans, which causing great Disturbance, the Lord also fought against them, and they fled. But then the Waters returned to their Sect. 2. Place and overwhelmed them all, so that neither Pharaoh, nor any one of his men escaped. This place of the Red Sea being here not at all fordable, the fole Power of God procured their Passage; though Josephus, to gain Credit to the Story from the incredulous Heathen, taketh off from the Miracle, by an Vide Strabounfuitable Comparing of it to Alexander the Great his Passing the shoar of the new 1.14.

3. From the Red Sea they journeyed three days through the Wilderness of Etham; (which, as it seemeth, stretcheth forth it self to both the sides of the Sea) where they found no Water. Thence they came to Marab, where they found Water, but bitter, and thence the Place had its name; which Bitterness was removed by the casting in of a certain Tree which God shewed to Moses. From Marab, they came to their fifth Station at Elim, where were twelve Fountains of Water, and seventy Palm-trees, and thence to the Red Sea; which name feemeth to be applied to some Bay or Creek thereof. From the Sea they came into the Defart of Sin, where they pitched their Tents on the fourteenth day of the second Moneth after their Departure. Here murmuring for Flesh, Quails were rained down upon the Camp at Evening, and in the Morning was there found Manna, which continued every Morning to fall, all the forty years they abode in the Wilderness. This Wilderness of Sin being very large, and reaching as far as Mount Sinai, they had feveral Stations in it. The ninth was at Diphka, the tenth at Alush, the eleventh at Rephidim; where the People again Murmuring for Water, the Rock being struck by Mujes gushed out into Streams. Whilst Exad. 17: they here continued, the Amalekites (descended from Amalek, who was the Son of Eliphaz, and Grand-son of Esan) fell in upon their Rear, and made Slaughter of the weaker fort. Moles against them sent Joshua the Son of Nun, he himself in the mean time praying to God in the Mount. And as long as his hands were lifted up the Ifraelites overcame, but when he let them down the Amalekites prevailed; so that Aaron his Brother, and Hur his Sister Miriam's husband, bore them up till the Going down of the Sun. 4. In the third Moneth they removed, and took up their Station in the Defart Chap. 19, 20.

of Sinai, over against the Mountain Horeb (which 'tis thought was some part of Sinai) and here they continued almost a year; to the twentieth day of the second Moneth of the next year. Upon this Mountain, God gave the Law of the ten Commandments in a terrible manner, on the fittieth day after their Coming out of \mathcal{H}_{exp} , as some of the Ancients apprehended. The day after, several other Hieronymus Laws were promulgated, as it were Commentaries upon the Decalogue both $J_{u_{exp}}$ definition. dicial and Ceremonial. Then Mofes having offered Sacrifice, read the Book of de Penticofte, the Law to the People, and made a Covenant betwixt God and them, and went up into the Mountain, where he remained forty days, fix in the lower and cloudy, and thirty four in the highest and fiery Part. In this space of time he received Advice concerning the Structure of the Tabernacle, the Ornaments and Confectation of Priests, &c. From this familiar Conversing of God with Moses, the Heathen Law-givers took occasion to feign such a Privilege to themselves. As amongst the Getes, Zamolxis gave out he received two Laws from Vesta; Zathroughes amongst the Arimaspians from a good Demon 3 Mneter, amongst the Egyptians, from Mercury; Minos the Cretian, from Jupiter, Lycurgus the Lacedemonian, from Apollo; and Numa the Roman, from the Goddess Egeria. To this * Biblioth I. 1: number * Diodorus, out of Ethnick Ignorance, addeth Mofes himself, writing p. 59. B. in that he counterfeited Conference with the God Jans.

5. But the People missing Moses so long a time, and not knowing what was become of him, raised a Tumult, and caused Aaron to make them a God that might go before them. The Hebrews have a Tradition, that Hur, oppoling this, was flain; but Aeron, overcome with their furious Importunity, made them a molten Calf of Gold, after the Falhion of the Hepptians, who worshipped two Heifers, Apis and Mnevis, which they accounted Gods. Forty days, and as many Chap 21, Sec. Nights being ended, God gave Moses two Tables of Stone, wherein was written the Decalogue by his own Finger, and sent him down, telling him wherein his People were employed. Moses something appeasing Gods Wrath, came down from the Mount; but seeing them dance before the Calf, in a great Rage cast the Tables out of his hands, and brake them. He put the Calf into the fire, and grinding it to Powder threw it into the Brook, and made them to drink of the Water.

After this going up into the Mount the fecond time, he interceded for the People, and at his Return, removed the Tabernacle, or Tent, wherein he used to speak with God, out of the Camp, in token of the Lords Displeasure. He hewed two new Tables of Stone, like to the former, and having given order for the making of an Ark of Wood, and all things about the Tabernacle, according to the Pattern shewed him in the Mount, he went up the third time, and continued there forty dayes and as many nights, without eating any thing, as before. In this time God wrote anew the Ten Commandments; and, being pacified, renewed the League conditionally, and proposed other Laws to the People. When Moses returned, his Face shone, so that he put thereon a Vail when he spake to the Multitude, to which he declared Gods Commands, urged the Observation of the Sabbath, and the Offering for making of the Tabernacle; in the Work whereof, the latter part of this year was spent by Bezaleel, and his Companions.

The Tabernacle reared, and in this Moneth were these things done which are spoken of in the third Book of Moses, called Leviticus. On the fourteenth day was the Passeover celebrated in the Wilderness of Sinai. On the first of the second Moneth God Nam. 19. commanded Moses to number all the Israelites, except the Tribe of Levi, from Nam. 1. twenty years old to fixty; the number of whom amounted to 603550. just so many as had been found seven Moneths before, when the Contribution was to be made for the Tabernacle. On the twentieth of the same Moneth, the Cloud Chap. 10. which rested on the Tabernacle, removed, and they following it in four Armies came from the Wilderness of Sinai to that of Paran, where they stayed twenty three dayes, in the thirteenth Mansion of Kidroth-Hattaavah. Here the People, Chap. 23. weary of their Heavenly Bread, lusted after the Flesh of Egypt, and were punished with a fudden Fire, which devoured many, and was at length quenched by the Prayer of Moses. Here also Moses complaining to God of the great Burthen chap. 11. which lay upon him; the Sanhedrim of the seventy Elders was instituted. In this place, moreover God gave the People Quailes for a whole Moneth, on which they furfeited, so that a Plague arose whilst the Flesh was yet betwixt their Teeth, and many perished. Hence the Place had it's name of Kibroth-Hattaavah, or the Sepulchres of Concupiscence.

7. From Hattaavab they removed to Hezeroth, where Aaron and Miriam spake Chap. 12. Miriam struck against Moses about his Wife; Miriam for that, was struck with Leprosie, and with Leprofie cast out of the Camp, till Aaron confessing their Fault, and interceding to Moses for her, he prayed to God, and she was healed. She being after seven dayes chap. 13. received again into the Camp, they removed, and came to Rithma, near unto Cades-barnea, in the same Desart of Paran. In the fifth Moneth of the second year, and the time of Vintage, Caleb the Son of Jephunne, Johna the Son of Nun, and ten other principal men were hence sent to spy the Land of Canaan. After forty days they returned, bringing with them of the Fruit of the Land. Caleb and Joshua incouraged the People, but the rest utterly disheartned them, causing them to despair ever to possess it, because of the Strength of the walled Towns, and the Gyants which there lived. This raised such a Mutiny, that they not only murmured against Moses, but spake of making them a Captain, and of returning chap 14 into Egypt, threatning to stone Caleb and Joshua, who laboured to the contrary. This so highly provoked the Lord, that he threatned suddenly to destroy them, and being prevailed with by Moses to mitigate his Wrath, denounced that none of twenty years and upwards should ever enter into the promised Land, but wander up and down till their Carkeises fell in the Wilderness; except Caleb and Joshua. And this Sentence was presently executed upon the ten, which had caufed the Sedition.

8. When they had therefore now arrived at the Borders of the promised Land, they were commanded to turn back again into the Wilderness towards the Red Sea. But to make some amends, as they thought, for their late Fear and Cowardife, they arose in the Morning; and against the express Command of Moses, went up into the Mountain to fight, where the Amalekites and Canaanites that there inhabited, smote and discomfitted them even unto Hormah. At their Return they wept before the Lord, but were not heard; and upon this Occasion, and the Death of those that fell daily in the Desart, Moses, as it's thought, composed the 90 Pfalm, wherein complaining of humane Frailty and shortness of Life, he fignifieth, that mans Age was reduced to 70 or 80 years: and 10 now the third time was it, as it were, cut shorter by the half; the two former having been im- Sect. 2. mediately after the Flood; and again, in the time of Phaleg, at the Division of

9. Thenceforth, from their Departure from Cades-barnea, are numbered feventeen more Stations in the Wilderness of Paran, wherein they spent 38 years, wandring about, till all the rebellious ones were confumed. The things which hapned in those years, cannot certainly be fixed upon any particular one. Mose herein being silent. Yet it is thought, that the History of the Man that gathered Sticks on the Sabbath day, and for it was stoned; of the Rebellion of Corab and his Companions, of Aaron's Rod that budded, &c. are to be referred to the latter part of the second year; none of the forty, except the two former and the last of all, being taken notice of by Moses, who recordeth only the seventeen Their Mansi-Mansions which were taken up, during the 37 years that passed between. The feventeenth and the last of these (being the thirty second Mansion reckoned from the Beginning) was at Ezion-gaber, upon the Red Sea in the Country of the the Rock Rephidim, here failed, being, as some think, swallowed up of the Red Sea. Hereupon Moses and Aaron were commanded only to speak to a Rock in that Place, to give out Water; but Moses, wearied with the Untowardness of the Multitude, uttered some words of Impatience and Diffidence, and firuck the Rock twice, so that the Water gushed out in great Abundance. Because through his Country; but, he opposing, he led the People by the Borders from Kadesh unto Mount Hor, where Aaron, died, some sour Moneths after his Sister Miriam, at the Age of 123, in the 40 year of their wandring in the Wilderness, and Eleazer his Son succeeded him in the Office of High-priest. In the cost, 21. fixth Moneth of the 40 year, the King of Arad, who inhabited the Southern parts of Canaan, came out against them, and took many Prisoners; whereupon, they vowed, if God would deliver his Country into their hands, to destroy his Cities. Hereunto God affenting, they went up, and prospering, gave to the Country the name of Hormah, which is the same with Anathema or Cursed. Then journeyed they from Mount Hor, to compais about the Land of Edom (against which God had charged them not to fight, because of their Ancestors) and came to the thirty fifth Mansion of Talmona, which fignifieth an Image. For here the People murmuring against the Lord and Moses, because of the Tediousness of the Journey, and loathing Manna, were bitten by fiery Serpents fent by God (the Greeks call them Dypsades, and Ælian maketh them chiefly to breed in Arabia;) so that many perished without Remedy. At length, Moses by God's Appointment erected on a Pole a brazen Serpent, upon which as many as looked, were presently made whole.

Arad van-quished.

11. From TJalmona they came to Punon, thence to Oboth, and so to fie-Abarim, Chap. 33, 8 34. on the Borders of Moab, in the Defart thereof, towards the Sun-rifing. Here runneth the Brook Zared, towards which, when they passed, God commanded them not to make War upon the Moabites, who had formerly beaten hence Giants called Emmim, as their Brethren the Ammonites had also outed others, known by the name of Zamzummim. Thirty eight years after their Removal from Kades-barnea, the Israelites passed Zared, all the Carkeises of the rebellious being in that space fallen in the Wilderness, and came to their thirty ninth Mansion of Dikon-Gad. Thence they travelled to Almon-Diblathaim, still in the Desart of Moab, and being to touch upon the Borders of the Ammonites, God forbad them to molest these also, because descended of just Lot. He commanded them to pass over the River Arnon; which having done, they removed to their 41 Mansion, in the Mountain of Abraim, over rgainst Nebo.

of Helbbon, to defire Leave peaceably to pass through his Borders; but he refused, School ling of and opposed them at Jahaz, where he was discomfitted and slain. The Ifra-Numb. 21. elites thus became Mafters of his Cities and Country, which (as Josephus Wri- Antiq lib. 4. teth) lay like an Illand between the Rivers; Arnon on the South, Jabock on cap 5 the North, (which falling into Jordan, loseth it's Name) and Jordan it self on the West; being on the East bounded with the Mountains of Arabia. As they proceeded by the way of Basan, Og King thereof, who remained of the Giants called Rephidim, opposing them, was also flain, and his Country wholly fubdued, with the Destruction of its Inhabitants; and in like manner all Argob (afterwards called Trachonitis,) wherein were fixty Cities. After these Victories, they removed from the Mountains of Abarim, and came to their forty second and last Mansion (taken up by Moses) near Jordan, lying from Jesimoth unto Numb. 22; Shittim, or Abel Shittim, in the Plains of Moab, which was fo called, because the Moabites formerly possessed them, till driven beyond Arnon by the Amorites. Here they continued till they were led thence by Joshua, to pass over Jordan.

13. When Balack King of Moab had heard all that the Israelites did to the Amorites; lest under Pretence of Passage, they might also seize upon his Kingdom, he consulted with the Midianites, and sent into Mesopotamia for Balaam Numb. 22, the Son of Bear, the Soothfayer, to come and curse them; intending after- 23,24, Chap. wards, to fall upon them. Balaam, having the Pleasure of God revealed to him, at first feared to come: and though he came at the second Message, and laboured all he could to curse them; yet was he over-ruled, and his Curse turned into a El-iling. But although he had no Power to cure, yet he advised the By his Advise King to that which tended especially to their Destruction; to fend some of the the People. the People most beautiful Women into the Camp, to draw them both to Carnal and Spiritual Fornication; the latter of which was committed with Baal-pear, the Idol of the Moabites. God being angry hereat, commanded the Principal of the Idolaters to be hanged up before the Sun, and Moses gave order to the Judges, to flay every one his men: A Plague also brake out amongst them, whereby in one day, 1 Cor. 15. fell 23000 Men: to which those that were hanged and fell by the Sword, being added, advance the number to 24000. Phineas the Son of Eliazar the Priest executing Judgment upon Zimri an Ifraelite, and Cozbi a Madianitish Woman, in the Act of Fornication; the Wrath of God was thereby appealed, and the Plague 14. A little after, God commanded Moses the third time to number the Pco-eththe People. ple. In this Space of 40 years all the men of War were perished, except Caleb and Joshua, which amounted to the number of 603000. Yet was there by this time fuch a Supply of young ones grown up, that they almost equalized the number of their Fathers; there being found 601730, from twenty years old and upwards, besides 23000 Levites, reckoned from a Moneth old. After this, Mose. by Gods Command, sent Phineas with 12000 men against the Midianites, who had chap. 31. conspired with the Moabites against them. He destroyed them, and amongst them Balaam the Soothsayer, who, as it appeareth, was not yet returned. The Women they brought away Captives; whereof the married ones they flew, and kept the Virgins for themselves. Now were the Lands of Sihon King of the Amorites, Chap. 32. The Land be and Og King of Bulban, divided amongst the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half yond Jardan Tribe of Manasses, on this Condition, that they should accompany their Brethren over the River Jordan, and affist them in the Conquest of the Land of Canaan, so long as need should require.

15. The time now drew near, that Moses must dye, being not to pass over into the Land of Canaan. Therefore in the eleventh Moneth of the fortieth year, he made a Repetition of the Law to the People, related God's Benefits bestowed Deut, 1, &c. on them, and exhorted them to Obedience. The Law he wrote in a Book, and commanded it to be read every feventh year, at the Feast of Tabernacles. He alfo, at the Command of God, wrote a Song concerning the future Idolatry, and Afflictions of the Ifraelites. Joshua being then ordained Captain of the People in his stead, he ascended from the Plains of Moab to Mount Nebo, part of the Moun-Deut. ult. tains of Abarim, and whose Top is called Phasga or Pisgah, looking towards Jericho. There God having shewn him the Land of Canaan, from the one side to the other, he died some five Moneths after Aaron, being 120 years old (the A.M. 2548. third part of which time, faving one Moneth, he spent, as Josephus writeth, in Antiq. 1.4. Government) in the fortieth year ending, after he had brought the Israelites out of Egppt, the year of the World 2548. God buried him in the Valley of Sect. 2. Moab over against Buth-Peor, and no man knoweth of his Sepulchre to this day. Concerning his Body, a Contest hapned between Michael the Arch-Angel and the Devil; the reason of which is thought to be, because Satan would have had the place thereof known, that the People might be drawn to Idolatry out of Reverence to fo great a Person. The Ifraelites mourned for him thirty days, and with his Life endeth the Pentateuch, or his five Books. The Book of Joshua followeth, taking it's Beginning from the 41 of the Departure out of Higgs, and the 2549th year of the World. 16. Whilst the Israelites were still mourning for Moses, the two Spies were sent John 1, 2,3,44 over Jordan, (as some think) to search the Land. The next morning after their Chapters Return, the whole Host removed from Shittim, and came to Jordan, where they lodged that night, and the next day passed over the River. As soon as the Feet of the Priests which bare the Ark touched the Water, it fell off on both sides, and made a way; fo that they went over on dry Ground, the Floods not returning to their place, so long as the Ark remained in the Chanel. On the tenth day of the first Moneth Nifan, they arrived in the Land of Canaan, and took A. M. 25491 up their first Mansion at Gilgal, not far from Jericho. Here (it's thought the theants up their first Mansion at Gilgal, not far from Jericho. next day) God commanded that all the Males should be circumcised, this Sacrament being omitted ever fince they left Mount Sinai; because they were in constant expectation of Travel: upon which account neither had they kept the Passeover since that time. Three days they rested, and on the fourth they did eat the Passeover, and the day following unleavened Bread of the Corn of the Land, at which time Manna ceased, after it had continued forty

17. The first place they fell upon with War, was the City of Fericho, which Chap 60 having compassed with the Ark seven days, on the seventh the Walls fell down of their own Accord, the City was taken, and all therein put to the Sword, except the Family of Rahab (the, having harboured the Spies, had Security promiled from them) whom Salmon of the Tribe of Judah married, to whom the bare Boaz. All the Goods found therein were also accursed, nothing thereof to be made Prey; which Law Achan transgressing, caused Ifrael to be discomsited at chan 7,8,9. Ai, and for that was first stoned, and then burnt, with all that belonged to him. The Kings of Canaan, startled at Josua's Success, combined against him; but the

Gibeonites, fearing the worst, counterfeited a Message to him as from a far Coun-Cribeonites, rearing the worst, counterrence a Message to him as from a far Country, and procured safety to themselves and Posterity; yet such as slavery was joyned therewith. Adonifedeck King of Jerufalem, and the Kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Labbish, and Deber, enraged hereat, conspired against them and fell upon their City; to the Relief whereof Josus being called, raised the Siege, and pro-Chaptic Country of Manager of the Command the Sur Start All Country of the Siege. fecuting his Victory against the Kings, at his Command the Sun stood still over Gibeon, and the Moon in the Valley of Ajalon. Upon which strange miraculous accident this is observed, that Ajalon being scarce a German Mile Westward off Gibeon, the Moon, as 'tis probable, was then decreasing, or in the Wane, and these two Luminaries standing till and moving together, the astronomical Account was thereby nothing at all disturbed. 18. Joshua drave the five Kings to that Streight that they hid themselves in a Cave at Makkeda, where after he had utterly vanquished and destroyed their Armies, he took them, and killing them, hanged their Carcases on five Trees till Sun-set: then cast them into the Cave and laid a great Heap of Stones thereon. After their Death he warred with many other petty Kings, as with Chap 11, &c. the King of Librah, Lachilh, Gener, Eglon, Hebron, and the relt: there was not one City that made Peace with Ifrael lave the Hivites, the Inhabitants of Gibeon: all others they took in Battel, and utterly destroyed, except such as it pleased God to referve, for a Lath and Scourge, wherewith to reduce them in times of Rebellion and for their Exercise to be as Thorns in their Eyes, and Goads in their Sides. The Canaanites being thus deprived of their ancient Habitation by Joshna and the Ifraeliter; Many of them, as is conjectured, removing to the Mediterranean-Sea, (where they were known afterwards by the name of Phenicians) continued not all there, but spread themselves abroad, and sent Colonies far and wide into many Places of Europe, Asia, and Africk, concerning which that exceli-lent Book of Bachartus, called Canaan, is to be consulted. That is remarkable, which Procopius mentioneth concerning Pillars erected in the Province in Pandallus, of Africk, called Tingitana, with a Phomician-Inscription to this Purpose: We are they who fled from the Face of Joshua the Robber, the Son of Nane.

Part I.

Sect. 2. How long this War continued till the Division of the Land, is not expressed in Scripture; yet is thence to be gathered. For Caleb being forty years old, when with others he was sent by Moses to search the Land, was at the time of the Division, as he saith, forty five years older. Now the Spies were sent out in the fifth Moneth of the second year, after their Departure out of Egypt, or sooner; fo that from that time to the Entranceinto Canaan, followed almost 39 years; (the Israelites being fourty years in the Wilderness) which being deducted out of the faid forty five, fix years and some few, Remain; during which, the War in Canaan The Chroschia, must have continued.

19. The Clerouchia then, or Division of the Land, fell out in the Beginning of the seventh year from their Entrance into Canaan, and in the year of the World 2555 also beginning. It continued about one year, as some gather from the Story. A. M. 2555. First of all, an Inheritance was given to two Tribes and an half, viz. The Tribes chap. 14, 15, of Judah, Ephraim, and the other half Tribe of Manasses. Then met the Israelites &c. together in Shiloh, because seven other Tribes yet remained undisposed of. Therefore certain men were fent from that place to bring a Survey of all the Land, which could not be done in a few days; and then, after their Return the Division was perfected; for all which no less than the space of a year seemeth necessiary. So, there are from the Beginning of the World to the end of this Division, Vide Ludov. 2555 years, containing just so many Weeks of Years, as there are natural Days Capellom in the year, viz. 365. Or if we make a great year consisting of so many years Chronel. Sacr. as the folar Year confifteth of Days; then have we fix (or feven) fuch great years. It is further observable, that from the Beginning of the World, to the Entrance of the Ifraelites into Canaan may be reckoned fo many Jubilies of years (viz. 52.) as are Days in the seventh part of a Solar year, one only excepted. The War having endured fix years, they rested on the seventh, wherein the Divifion was made, as in the Sabbatical year.

The Rife of

20. The Rife therefore, and Beginning of the Sabbatical year, and of Jubilies, some chuse rather to fetch from the first Entrance into Canaan, than from the Division of the Land. For though they began not to sow the Land on this side Tordan till after the Division; yet before this, had they taken Possession of the Country lying beyond the River, which was divided betwixt the two Tribes and the half; whereof, though it must be granted that those which were sit for War. accompanied their Brethren over Jordan, according to the Charge laid upon them by Moses, yet it is to be supposed that those which stayed behind were nourished by the Fruits of that Soil. For Manna had already ceased, and the Corn which the other reaped of the Enemies fowing being but gotten by Degrees, according as they conquered the Country, could scarce maintain them without fending for Supplies to those that stayed beyond the River. When they had ended the Division, the Children of Israel gave for an Inheritance to Joshua that which he asked, even Timneth Serab in Mount Ephraim, where he built a City, and dwelt therein. The Tabernacle of the Congregation was fet up at Shiloh 34h. 18. by the whole Affembly. As for the Levites they had no Inheritance affigned them, but (the Lord being their Inheritance) they were to live of Tythes and chap. 20. Offerings. Only 48 Cities on both fides of fordan, were fet apart for them to dwell in, which were also to be Cities of Refuge, whither those that were guilty of casual Homicide might fly from the Avenger of Blood, and there remain in Security till the Death of the High priest. Joshus being very old at the Division,

Some give to this Government 20 years, and some above; Chap.24. 2.29. but others think he died, not long after the Division. There is no Certainty thereof Judge 11. 8. from Scripture; but that he lived a hundred and ten years is expresly recorded. 21. After Joshua and that Generation were dead, which had seen the Wonders of the Lord, another arose after them, that knew not the Lord, nor the Works he had done; so that the Children of Ijrael followed other Gods, serving Baal and Albtaroth. For this Cause the Anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of Spoilers which spoiled them. He fold them into the hands of their Enemies round about, infomuch that they could not stand before them; but whithersoever they went out, the Hand of the Lord was against them for Evil, as he had said and sworn. Nevertheless he raised them up Judges to deliver them out of the hands of those that spoiled them; and yet they would not hearken to their Judges, but went a whoring after other Gods, and bowed themselves unto them. Hereupon the Lord resolved not to drive out thenceforth any Nations before them, which Joshua left when he died, that by them he might prove Ifrael whether they would keep his way, and to teach Sect. 2. them War. There were left five Lords of the Philistines with all the Canaanites, the Sidonians and Hivites that dwelt in Mount Lebanon, from Mount Baal Her. Chap. 3. mon, unto the entring of Hamath. The Children of Ifrael dwelt amongst the Canaunites, Hittites, Ammorites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites: They took their Daughters to be their Wives, gave their Daughters to their Sons, and served their Gods.

22. For this, the Anger of the Lord was hot against Ifrael, and he fold them part as to the hand of Cushan-rishathaim King of Mesopotamia. How long this was after the Division, the Scripture expresses not. We read that he oppressed them Lud.Cappel. eight years, but some think it should be read in the eighth year, viz. after the lus. Division, or eighth years, because this Servitude ended in the eight. But that it began not immediately after the Division, neither after the Death of Joshua, seemeth evident, because the Israelites served the Lord as long as that Generation lasted which had seen his Wonders; which cannot be conceived extinct at the same time with him. Others think a longer time than seven years to have pasfed betwixt the Division and this Oppression, affigning fourteen years to the Government of Joshua after the Division, then ten more to the Government of the Elders after his Death, who might very well live longer than fo; none that were Jacobus Capi twenty years old when they came out of Ægypt having entred Canaan, except for pellus. Shua and Caleb. After that, as many years they attribute to an Anarchy, in the fixth year of which they will have the Civil War to have broken out betwixt Benjamin and the rest of the Tribes, wherein all the Benjaminites, except six hun- Judg, 201 dred, were flain. Four years after this War, and at the end of the tenth, Cushan the King of Mesopotamia afflicted Israel for its Idolatry eight years. But concerning this there is no Certainty. 23. At the end of the eight years, God stirred up for a Deliverer, Othniel of Jude. Chap. 3. the Tribe of Judab, Nephew to Caleb by his younger Brother Kemaz, and his Son-in-law. Into his hands the Lord delivered Cufban, and the Land had rest forty years. After his Death (which is fet to the end of these forty years) Ifrael turned again to Idolatry, and the Lord delivered them up to Eglon, King of Mosh, for Eglos opprefeighteen years. At the end of this Term he ftirred up Ebnd a left-handed man of the Tribe of Benjamin, who under Colour of a Message stabbed Eglon into the Belly, and gathering the Ifraelites together on Mount Ephraim, flew 10000 of the Moabites, all men of War. After this, the Land is said to have rested eighty Delivered by years, the words being taken literally; but then some think none of the years of the Tyrants or Oppressors, are to be counted severally, and by themselves, but to be included herein as other years after mentioned; else the Account will swell much larger than the whole number of years which the Scripture seemeth to allow of. If we take in all the years ascribed to the Tyrants, then they will have it an Enallage (frequent in all Languages) and instead of 80, Ehud governed, or the Land rested under him only eight years; but others think they have as much reason to take them literally.

24. After Ehud, Shamgar the Son of Aneth judged Israel, but no mention is chip. 4:

made of any time. It followeth, when Ebud was dead, the Children of Israel did Evil again in the fight of the Lord, and he fold them into the hand of Jabin, King of Canaan, whose General was Sifera, and who had 900 Chariots of Iron: hemightily Jain oppress oppressed them twenty years. It is most probable that in this time the Government leth them. Of Shamgar, was included, (he flew with an Oxe-goad 600 of the Philiftimes, who at this time might also afflict Israel) or else it being but short might fall betwixt Ebud's Death, and the Oppression of Jabin; there being Probability enough that some time passed after his Death, before the Israelites so highly provoked the Lord as to be given up into Jahin's hands. At the end of these twenty years Deborah, the Wise of Lapidoth (judging Israel at this time in Mount Ephraim) moved by God, sent for Barak the Son of Abinoam from Kadesh-Naphtali, and made him Captain. He, with 10000 men of Zebulon and Naphtali, overthrew Sifera, who flying on his Feet to the Tent of Heber the Kenite (descended of Jethro, Father-inlaw to Moses) Jael his Wife killed him, by a Nail driven into his Temples as he lay alleep. So the Land rested under Deborah forty years, as we read it, another wher interpreting it in the fortieth year, viz. after the Rest restored to it by Ehnd.

25. This time expired, and the Ifraelites relapfing to Idolatry, God gave them Jud. 6: up into the hands of the Midianites, and other People of the East, which afflicted them seven years, destroying their Corn, driving away their Cattel, and making Havock of all things. This made them cry to the Lord, who first reproved them

But thus Midian being subdued, the Country was in Quietness under Gideon forty years, as most read it; but, as others, was quiet in the fourth year; viz. after Quietness restored to it by Deborah and

The Israelites, after Gideon's Death, had again turned after Idols, and therefore God not only subjected them to the Dominion of this most wicked of all Parricides, but to intestine Diffentions, by reason of him. For after he had tyrannized three years, Gaal with the Sichemites conspired against him, which having timely discovered, he destroyed them and their City (sowing it with Salt) and burnt the house of their God Berith, with a thousand Men and Women which had fled to it. Then went he against Thebez, and took it, the Inhabitants whereof retired for Defence into . ftronger Tower. Here, as he was about to set Fire to the Door, a Woman cast down a Piece of a Mill-stone upon his Head, and so brake his Skull, and he caused his Armour-bearer to kill him, lest it should be said, that he died by the hands of a Woman. After his Death, Chap, re-Tolah judgeth Tolah, the Son of Puah, the Son of Dodo, a man of Iffachar, that dwelt at Samir in Ephraim, arose to defend Israel, and judged it twenty three years. The Politifiers which God fold them into the hands of the Philiftines and Ammonites. It is writand Amositis ten, And that Year they oppressed the Children of Israel eighteen Years, all that were on oppressional, the other side Jordan, in the Land of the Amorites, which is in Gilead. Moreover, the Ammonites paffed over Jordan, to fight also against Judah and Benjamin, and the house of Ephraim; so that all Israel was fore distressed. Some will have this Oppresfion but to begin at the Death of Jair; others think, they had oppressed Israel eighteen years before, and now passed over the River, to afflict the other Tribes. The Israelites cried to God, and being reproved, put away their Idols: hereupon, the Ammonites being got together in Gilead, and the Ifraelites assembled in Mizpah in the same Country, Jepthah the Son of Gilead, begotten on an Harlot, was sent for by the Gileadites and made Captain, being a mighty man of Valour: Chap. 11. He first sent to expostulate with the King of Ammon, and to demand the Cause of the War. He answered, it was because Israel took away his Land, when they came out of Egipt, from Arnon unto Jabbock, and unto Jordan; of which herequired Restitution. Jepthab replyed, that in their Journey from Egypt, they sent to the Kings of Edom and Moab, to defire Passage through their Coasts; but this being denied, they turned aside through the Wilderness, and compassed about the Lands of Edom and Moab, not coming within the Borders of Moab, and so at length came and pitched on the other fide of Arnon, which was the Limit of Moab's Coasts; Then, that Sihon King of the Amorites denying them Passage, and fighting against them, the Lord God of Ifrael delivered him into their hands: and they possessed the Land of the Amorites from Arnon unto Jabbock, and from the Wilderness unto Jordan.

28. Seeing the God of Ifrael had dispossessed the Amorites, he demanded a Reafon, why he should possess that Country; and whether he was any thing better than Balack the Son of Zippor, King of Moab, who never strove nor fought against Israel. Lastly, he asked him, why he recovered not the Land all the 300 years which the Children of Ifrael had enjoyed it, and appealed to God for righteous Sect. 2. Judgment betwirt them. These 300 years, if they be reckoned exactly, the years of the Oppressions, and of the Judges, must all along be counted in Length, without including the one in the other; but if this be done, still many more than 300 will be found, and a hundred years more will arise in the Account of time, from the Coming out of Hgypt to the Building of the Temple, than the Scripture in another Place alloweth of. Some say, if so many years really passed, betwixt the last year of Moses, save one, and this time of Jepthah, as those Successions do make; 400 years was rather to have been mentioned, feeing the number exceeded that of 300; and therefore accounting the other way short of 300, they alledge, that it is usual, when a full or round Number is chosen rather to make Use of that which most favoureth their Cause; and therefore Jepthab meant by 300, about, or almost fo many. On the contrary, others believe, that the Scripture doth not fuffer them to omit the years of Servitude, and contain them under those of the Judges, which they suppose clearly appeareth out of those words before menti- Judg. 11. 18 oned, which in General describe the Condition of the Ifraelites, as faccofficely guilty of Idolatry, then punished, and delivered; after which, falling into an Anarchy at the Death of their Deliverer, they again relapted into the same Sin. They will have also the particular Accounts of these things in Scripture, by their Order

29. But the King of the Ammonites not hearkening to Jepthah, was overthrown with a very great Slaughter. Jepthah at his going forth, vowed, if the Lord would deliver the Enemy into his hands, that whatfoever came first out of his House to meet him at his Return, should surely be the Lord's, and he would offer it for a Burnt-offering. It hapned that his only Daughter came out to meet him with Timbrels and Dances; and after the had bewailed her Virginity, he is faid to have done to her according to his Vow. Some observe that for And in the place may be read Or, as if, he would offer the thing, if it were to be offered, or, however to confecrate it to the Lord. And their Opinion feem th most probable, who hold the was not offered up as a Burnt-offering, but conferrated by perpetual Virginity and Austerity of Life, being altogether separated from Humane Society, except four days in a year, for a little Refreshment; it being faid, that he executed his Vow upon her, for that he did not redeem her with Money, according to the Law mentioned in Exodus, but left her confe-cosp.uls. crated to God in an unmarried State, lest she should seem to be another's and not the Lord's. Jepthah, after this, warred against the Ephraimites, who Judg 124 spake against, and threatned him and his House. He cut off forty two thoufand Men, all being flain in their Paffage over Jordan, that could not pronounce Shiboleth. Having judged Israel fix years, he died, and was buried in these three are said to have delivered the Land, some think those forty years, to have included some of Their Government. There are that fetch the Beginning of them from the fourth year of Ibsan, and end them at the Death of Sampson, whom they will have the immediate Successor of Abdon. Of those that are for the lengthening out of the time, some think they are to be reckoned from the Death of Abdon, and end at the Beginning of Sampson's Government, which others again user. inferr, by good Arguments, to be included in them, or elfe twenty of them must fall in with the time of Eli; the seventy Interpreters accordingly, giving to Eli not forty years, as the Hebrew Copies, but only twenty. Still there are not wanting, who think Eli to have succeeded Abdon, and Sampson's 20 years (who was yet unborn) to have been included in his 40. They fetch the Rife of the forty years of the Oppression, from seventeen years before the Beginning of Eli, and end them so many after his Death. Sampson was a Nazarite from his Mothers Womb. no Razor coming on his Head, and keeping himfelf from Wine and strong Drink all his time. Hence, as his admirable Strength is faid to have lain in his Hair. so others have ascribed it to his Abstinency, as if it had not proceeded from the especial Providence and Power of God. He was the Hercules of the Israelites, really performing such things as the Greeks would scarce attribute to their's, on whom yet they heaped those things that were done by many. He afflicted the Philistines much in his Life, but much more at his Death, by throwing down the House of Dagon upon the chief of them, being therein assembled

Sect. 2. to make themselves Sport with so great an Adversary, whom having got into their Power, they had deprived of his Sight. 31. Had Eli preceded Sampson, he would have been reckoned amongst his Pre-deceffors; according to general Apprehension. The High-priest-hood which hitherto had continued in the Family of Eliazar for five Generations, (viz. in himfelf, Phimese, Abifna, Bukki, and Uzzi, according to Josephus) was in Eli translated to that of Ishamar, another of Aaron's Sons. The Sons of Eli being very lewd, 1 Sam. 2, 3,4. grievoully abused their Power, and he used not his Authority in Correcting them, Chap. whereby he so far incurred Gods Displeasure, that he threatned to destroy his house; as it came to pass. The Israelites, towards the end of his forty years, fought with the Philistines, but were worsted, and lost four thousand men. To better their Success, they then sent for the Ark of God from Shiloh, promising to themselves Victory in it's Presence; but of the next Battel the Issue was the same. Hophni and Phineas the Sons of Eli were flain, and the Ark taken. This News being brought to Eli, upon mention of the Captivity of the Ark, he fell backward from a Seat, and being 98 years old, his Neck brake. The Philistines placed the Ark in the house of their God Dagon, which Idol fell down twice before it; and the Multitude was so plagued with the Hæmorrhoides, that they were glad to return it back with Presents. 32. To Eli succeeded Samuel, both a Levite and a Prophet, to whose Government, from the Division of the Land, passed 450 years, according to St. Paul, as Samuel. * Kings, expressly seemeth to contradict, which maketh the Foundation of the *Chap.G.E. Temple to be laid in the 480th year after the Ifraelites Departure out of Agypt. This later number exceeded the other but by 30. although in it must be comprehended, besides what is in the former, the forty years of their Stay in the Wilderness, the fix years which passed before the Division, the time of Samuel's Government, the Reigns of Saul and David, with the three years of Solomon, that passed before the Building of the Temple; all which make up the number of 129; fo that the literal Senses of these two cannot stand together: Some go about to reconcile them by drawing down the Beginning of the 480 years, lower than the Text will bear; and by removing that of the 450, higher than is convenient: to whom others joyn, in attempting the Reconciliation both of those Numbers, and clearing up the matter concerning the 300 years ascribed by Jepthah, to the Possession of the Land of the Amorites before mentioned. But there are, who find a Necessity of confessing a Mistake, either in the one or other Copie of these Places. These are divided in their Opinions; one Party thinking they have bet-ruption (through the great Care of the Jews) as the Greek Text hath that, by From Triago Reason of the Similitude of Words, might well be changed from one to another, Transcribers. Another will have the 450 years to belong to the Division of the Land, and not to the Judges: all which have been mistaken through the wrong Reading of the words. 33. Others both of ancient and modern times, are very confident, that, all con-

ter Reason to stick to the Place of the Kings, which is not so liable to any Corfidered, the Fault must fall upon that Place of the Kings, which giveth but 480 years, to all that time that passed from the Departure out of Higher to the foundtherius Graning of the Temple; and that, instead of 480, 580 was anciently written. For mologia Szera, when any one Place disagreeth with the whole Series of History, clearly held out elsewhere, it is rather to be corrected in its number (which may easily be altered by a Mistake of one Word) than many Places wrested to a Compliance with it. Now all the times of the Anarchies, Liberty, War and Servitude, of the Israelites laid together, without Confusion of years (for which there is no ground at all,) clearly hold out a hundred years more than this Place of the Kings; and so exactly from the leveral Particulars make it up, that it feemeth to take away all Doubt. From the Departure out of Ægypt to Moses his Death, intervened 40 years; thence to the Beginning of Othniel 34. whereof 26 are given to the Government of Jofina and the Elders, and eight to the Servitude under Cushan. Then Othniel governed 40 years, the Oppression of the Moabites followed for eighteen. Ahud ruled 80. The Canaanites tyrannized 20. Deborah and Barak governed 40. the Madianites oppressed the Israelites 7. thence Gideon judged Israel 40. Abimelech reigned 3. Tolah 23. Jair 22. and then the Ammonites oppressed Ifrael 18. All which numbers amount to 385 years. After this, Jepthah judged Ifrael 6 years, Ibzan 7. Elon 10. Abdon 8. the Philistines vexed Israel 40. and Heli ruled 40. which make up the Sum of 111 years. Then Samuel and Saul governed 40 years (as will be or put off without a King. God therefore gave unto them Saul the Son of Kill Hoft 13: of the Tribe of Benjamin. 35. In the Book of Samuel no certain years are either given to his own Government, or to that of Saul, but it seemeth probable from Scripture that he governed about twenty years alone, from the Death of Eli to the Election of Saul. For it is faid, that the Ark of God abode in Kiriath-jearim twenty years; and that, 1 Sam. 7. 21 the time being long, all the house of Ifrael lamented before the Lord at Mizpel; which Passages are joyned unto the serious Exhortation of Samuel to move them to Repentance. So then the end of twenty years, the Exhortation, their Repentance hereupon, and their moving for a King, with good Reason seem to have been about the same time; so that 20 or 21 years and an half are to be given to his Government, which began at Eli's Death. Now Heli died when the Ark was taken; which staying seven Moneths in the Land of the Philistier was then sent away and came to Bethstemes, where the Inhabitants losing 50610 of their number, for their Curiosity of looking into it, sent Melsengers to those of Kiriath-jearim to setch it unto them, with whom it remained twenty years; and these years the Ifraelites counted along

But Saul, hearing of their Distress, got together an Army of 300000 of Ifrael, and 30000 of Judah, with which he eafily overthrew the Ammonites, and raifed the Siege. Yet, his heart not being upright before the Lord, God chose him out a man after his own David anoint heart, and rejected him and his Family. This man was David, the youngest Son of Jesse, of Bethlehem-Judah, whom Samuel was sent to anoint some years before his own Death, and more before that of Saul. a King, and God gave them Saul, the Son of Kis, a man of the Tribe of Benjamin, by the Space of forty years. Some take the words as giving to many years to his Reign alone; but by general Consent the Government of Samuel is to be included in them. Samuel seemeth to have died not long before Saul (two years it's suppo-o1 sam. 25. fed) at fuch time as David was provoked by the Churlishness of Nabal; and is North 550 faid to have judged Ijrael all the days of his Life. So the Service therein began in the eighth year of the twelfth Jubilie, or in the first year of the second week of the twelfth, which seemeth agreeable to the Ceremonial Law, wherein most things consist in the number of seven, and are reckoned by Sabbatical years and Jubilies And if we divide 3025 by feven, we shall find the Temple dedicated in the first year of the 442 Week from the Creation, almost twelve intire Jubilies after the Service thereof had been first appointed on Mount Sinai.

Solomon's Navy.

This furnishing with his own Subjects and the Tyrians (then, by reason of the Situation of their Country, the best Sailors in the World) fent to him by Hiram, he dispatched to Ophir, once in three years, for Gold and other Merchandize, whence they brought him 420 Talents. The Country of Edom David had formerly subdued, and thence Solomon his Son had the Privilege ofbuilding his Ships there. Æleth or Eloth, called by other Writers Ælana and Ælanum, was then a famous City, seated upon the Arabian Gulf, to part whereof, lying about it, it gave Appellation. As Eston-gaber was the ArPart I

But when the Edomites revolted (which happened after the Death of jehosaphat) the Course was altered from Jerufalem to Rhino colura, a City in Phemicia upon Heypt; and there continued long, till fuch time as the Prolomies with much ado, brought down the Trade to Alexandria. To effect this, they made two Ports upon the Borders, whereof the one bare the name of Berenice, and is miltaken by Josephus for Esongaber, that lying at a great Distance both from this and Elath, which seemeth to * Asych swinn. be the same Place, mentioned in (a) Strabo, by the name of * Albus Pagus.

Sailing out of the Arabian into the Persan Gulf, the name of Red Sea might upon this Occasion be given by them to both (which is usually to be expounded of both in ancient Writers) the word Edom, being changed into others of the same Signification in several Languages. As for Ophir, if we think this Country denominated from the Son of Sem, (or him from it) either immediately by his Habitation therein, or rather mediately by the Tyrians impoling that name upon it, which properly belonged to a place in Arabia; then need we not feek for it in America, and feign strange Circuits to have been made, from the Red Sea round about Africk to fail thither; as those, who place it in that part of the World, are forced to do.

45. Solomon after the Dedication of the Temple, fortified Jerusalem with a treble Wall, and repaired Hazron, the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites; so did he Gaza of the Philistines; he built Bethoron, Gerar, and the Millo, or Munition of Jerusalem. He also built Megiddo in Manasseh on this side Jordan, Balah in Dan, and Thadmor; which may be either Thameron, in the Defart of Judea, mentioned by Prolomy, or Palmyra, as Josephus thinketh, fituate in the Defart of Syria, on the Borders of his Dominions; which being many Ages after rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, was named after him Adrianopolis. He built for himfelf in thirteen years time a Palace, and an House for his Wife the Daughter of Pharaob. After this, he offered twenty Towns, bordering upon the Tribe of Asper, to Hiram King of Tyre, as a Reward for the Affiftance he offered him in his Buildings; but he refusing them, he placed Colonies therein. And from his Refusal the Country came to be called Cabul.

His Inconti-

46. In the latter part of his Reign, he fell into great Incontinency, and thence I Kings II. became acceffory to abominable Idolatry. He loved many strange Women, as (together with the Daughter of Pharaoh) Women of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Sidonians, and Hittites: of the Nations, wherewith the Children of If rael were forbidden to marry. He had 700 Wives, and 300 Concubines, which turned his Heart after other Gods fo that he went after Albtaroth the Goddess of the Sidonians, and Milcom the Ahomination of the Amorites: he built an high-place for Chemosh the Abomination of Mosh, in the hill before Jerusalem, for Molech the Abomination of the Children of Ammon; and so did he for all his strange Wives, which burnt Incense, and sacrificed to their Gods. This provoked the God of Ifrael, who had twice appeared to him; infomuch, that for his horrible Ingratitude, he determined Evil concerning his Kingdom, to be fulfilled in his Son. Yet have we ground to judge well of his eternal Condition, seeing he made a Recantation of his former Errors, and was used as a Pen-man of Scripture by the A. M. 3025.

SECT. III.

From the Death of Solomon and the Rent of the Kingdom, to the Destruction of the Kingdom of Judah.

Ten Tribes

OLOMON being dead, Rehoboam his Son, by Naama an Ammonitifb Woman, 1 Kings 125 reigned in his Stead. The Tribes, when they met at Sichem to make him King, petitioned for a Relaxation of their Burthens imposed by his Father: to which he answered so churlishly (despising the Counsel of the ancient and grave men,) that ten Tribes revolted from him, and made King over them Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, who had fled into Hgypt for fear of Solomon, after that Rod's Intentions came to be known of giving him part of the Kingdom. With Re-2 Chron. 11. hoboam yet remained the two Tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and the greateft part Por. 13, 14. of the Livines, who left their Possessions and settled themselves in Judah and Jerusa. lem, befault frobam and his Sons had caft them off from executing the Prieft's Office. With the Tribe of Judah is also to be reckoned that of Simeon, whose Posfessions were within the Inheritance of Judah, for which that part of the Division Josh 19.95 that fell to it was too much. Part also of the Danites had its Seat within that of Judah; for it appeareth that they had some Towns in the Division of the Land. which formerly had been affigned to the Children of Judah, who (as hath been obferved) had so large a Country at first assigned to them, rather to protect and defend, than folely to possess it. All these still remained the Subjects of Rehoboam, though ten Tribes are faid to have revolted, the Tribe of Dan being attributed to Jeroboam, for that Dan the chief City, was within his Dominions; and because the Tribe of Manasseh being separated and divided into two parts, might be reckoned for two Tribes. The Kingdom thus divided, the Northern parts fell off; but the Southern continued in Obedience to the Son of Solomon, whose Successors henceforth are called Kings of Judab, as those of Jeroboam, Kings of Israel, and yet this chron 31.0.
Distinction is not always observed, Jebosaphas being called Kings of Israel, and also $28.19.

gave over the Enterprize of Invading them with 180000 Men; although there was continual War betwixt the two Kings all their Days. The Priests and Levites that were driven into Judah, reteined it in the true Religion three years; but when Re-Subjects rebell hoboam had established himself, he forsook the Law of the Lord, and all Israel with him, committing Sins above all that their Fathers had done. They built them high-Places, Images, and Groves on every high hill, and under every green Tree: there were Sodomites in the Land, and they did according to the Abomination of those Nations, which the Lord cast out before the Children of Ifrael. Because of this, the fifth year of his Reign, Shishak King of Ægspt, (perhaps invited by Jeroboam, who had lived with him in Exile) came up against him with 1200 Chariots, 60000 Horsemen, and innumerous People, out of Hospt: the Lubims, Sukkiims, and Athiopi-Afflicted, they ans, with which he took Garrisons in Judah, and pierced as far as Jerusalem. In his 11th year, according to Josephu, came Zerach the R-thiopian against him, with 1000000 Men, of Casheanr (inhabiting Arabia, where also Zerach his Æthiopia is only to be found) and Labeanr, besides 300 Chariots. To those he opposed himself with 300000 of Judah, and 280000 of Benjamin; and calling upon his God, obtained the Victory, which he profecuted, and got much Booty. Returning to Jenjalem, he was so wrought upon by the words of Aza-riab the Propher, the Son of Obed, as together with his own Subjects and others, (that fell to him in Abundance out of Ifrael) he facrificed to, and made a Covenant with God. Then proceeding in the Reformation of his Kingdom, he removed Maaca his Grand-mother from her Dignity, because she was the Patroness of Idolatry. Bassa who now reigned in Israel, provoked with the Revolt of his Subjects, and jealous of the growing Power of Asa, came up against him, and built Ramab, in the 36th year from the Division, left any should go in or out to him. Asa to divert him, hired Ben-hadad the King of Syria, to invade Israel. This Ben-hadad was the Son of Tabrimmen, and Grandson to Hezrin, or Rezin, the first King of Damascus, and from him the Sirname of Hadad descended upon his Posterity. He smote Jion, Dan, Bethmach, all Civeroth, with the Land of Napthali, and constrained Baala to leave off building Ramah. Asa then destroyed Ramah, and with the Stones thereof built Seba and Mizpah; but was checked by God for not trusting in him, but putting his Confidence in the King of Syria; and War for this was denounced to be upon him all his Days. Hereat he grew angry with the Seer that brought the Message; and oppressed some of his People: and for this was punished with the Gout in his latter days, for a Remedy to which, he had Recourse to the Physitians, and not to God. So he died, in the 41 year of

5. Jehosaphat succeeded him, to a good Father a better Son. He married his Son Jehoram to Athaliah the Daughter of Ahab King of Ifrael, and in his eighteenth year made him Vice-King. This Affinity drew him down with Abab to fight against Ramoth-Gilead, where Ahab received his Death-Wound, and he escaped narrowly with his Life. For joyning himved nis Death-would, and in the appearance of the with this wicked King, he was forely chidden by Jebu the Prophet, the Son of Hanani; which so affected him, as he reformed his Subjects, travelling himself from 2 Chron. 19, Beersheba unto Mount Ephraim to accomplish it: he also constituted Judges, to whom 20, 21. Chaphe gave a pious and first Charge. After this the Moabites, Ammonites, and a great Multitude of others invaded him; against which he first strove by Prayer to God, and thereby obtained Victory, his Enemies being so stricken with Madness, that they fell upon, and flaughtered one another. Afterwards intending to fend ships for Goldto Ophir; because he joyned with wicked Abaziah King of Israel, the Lord spoiled the Works, and the Ships were broken at Escon-geber. Some think he made his Son Partner in the Kingdom it felf, having formerly been but his Vicegerent, a year or two before he died. He reigned 25 years, or rather 24, with some odd

They had heretofore been governed by a Vice-Roy, chosen either out of themselves or the Jews; but now they made themselves a King; the Prophecy of Isaac, the common Progenitor of both Nations, being now fulfilled, that though Efau should serve his younger Brother Jacob, yet the time should come, when Gen. 27. 40. he should break the Yoak from off his Neck. At the same time Libnah (a City of the Pricst's in the Tribe of Judah) revolted, because he had forsaken the God of his Fathers; for having married Ahab's Daughter, he followed the Example of his House, making high-places in the Mountains of Judah, and causing his Subjects to commit Idolatry therein. Because of this, there came a Writing to him from the Prophet Elijah, rebuking him for his Sin, and foretelling his Punishment. Elijah being before this taken up to Heaven, the Jews have believed that 2 Chron. 21. this Letter was sent down thence. The Prophets exclaimed against it in vain, especially Zacharias, the Son and Successor of Jehojada, against whom Joas was so far transported beyond the Bounds of Piety, and Gratitude to his Father's Memory, that he commanded him to be stoned, and that in the Court of the House of the Lord. But as he was about to begin his March, a Prophet dehorted him from joyning to himself the idolatrous Ifraelites, fo that he dismissed them, and they returned home in great Discontent. He prospered against the Idumeans, but the Souldiers (dismissed) fell upon his Cities, and fmiting 300 of them, took much Spoyl. Yet he at his Return, to amend the matter, having brought home the Gods of the Edomites, fet them up to be his Gods, bowed down before them, and burnt Incente to them. He reigned fixteen years, and was succeeded by Ahaz his Son, A. M. 3269. whose Reign if it be compared with that of Pekab and Hosea, Kings of Israel, it will Olymp. 9. an.2. 2 Kings 16. appear that he reigned seven or eight years with his Father. He did that which was 2 cbron. 28. evil in the fight of the Lord, walking in the ways of the Kings of Ifrael: he made molten Images for Baalam, burnt Incense in the Valley of the Son of Hinnom, burnt his Children in the Fire, facrificed and burnt Incense in the high Places, on the Hills, and under every green Tree. Because of this, God stirred up Pekah, King of Israel, and Rezin the Son of Remaliah, King of Syria against him, who invaded his Kingdom, and did much Hurt: Rezan got Elath, which Uzzias had recovered and built; the King of Ifrael gave him a grievous Overthrow: the Edomites also affilted him; and the Philiftines, whom Uzziah had brought under, made Inroads upon him. Suspecting his Estate because of these things, he sent to Tiglath-Pileser, King of Affiria, for help, presenting him with the Silver and Gold, which was found in

But Achaz, to procure those things, having made himself his Vaffal, was yet never the better, remained in great Fear of him, and still continued in his Wickedness. He made his Son Hezekiah for his three last years Partner with him in the Kingdom, and at the end thereof died, having reigned together with his Father, and by himself, 16 years. He shook off the Yoak of the King of Affy- 2 Chap. 12. king. 12. ria, refusing to pay Tribute; for which Cause in his fourteenth year, Senatherib. being to make War upon Egpt, led part of his Forces into Judea. Besieging La-chis, Hezekiah bargained with him to depart; but he brake his Promise, and sent Rabshakes with others to Jerusalem, who blaspheming God, and reproaching the King, laboured to draw the People from their Obedience. This being to no Purpose, Rabshakes returned to him, who had now departed from Lachish, and befieged Libnah, a stronge City of Judah; removing still nearer Jerusalem, that he might seem to pursue what he had given in Charge to Rabshakes to denounce against Hezekith.

13. But lying before Libnah, News came that Tirhakah, King of Ethiopia (who, as it seemeth, had entred into Conspiracy with the Ægyptian against him) was moving towards him; at which he was so terrified, that he brake up his Siege, and departed homewards. Yet having a greedy mind towards Judica he fent a blafphemous Letter, full of Threats to Hezekiah; but he loft in one night by the Stroak of an Angel 180000 men (as some think being on his way towards Jernsalem) and confounded hereat, returned to Niniveh, where he was flain by his two Sons, Adramelech and Sharezer, as he was worshipping in the houle of Mifrèch his God. In the E/sy 38.8. time of these Dangers, Hezekiah sell sick unto Death, the Sentence of which he received from Isaiab the Prophet. But by his Prayers and Tears he obtained a Prolongation of Life for fifteen years, and in Confirmation of the Promite, the shadow of the Degrees which was gone down in the Sun-dyal of Abaz was brought ten Degrees backward; and it followeth, So the Sun visitaried ten Degrees; by whith Degrees it was gone down. As for this Sun-dyal it's thought that in those ancient times the Knowledge of Dyals was fearce amongst the Hebrews. Yet it is possible that Achaz might have fomething of that Nature, though imperfect, from the Babylonians, who were of old much given to Astrology, he being otherwise too cu- Sect. rious an Admirer of foreign things, as appeareth, in that he must needs have such an Altar made, and erected at Jerusalem as he had seen at Damascus. That the Sun went Gregory back, hath been generally believed: but one of late hath gone about to prove that Oxford the Shadow was lyable to Reduction, without Retrocession of the great Luminary.

14. The Knowledge of this Miracle coming to the Babylonians (who by reason of 2 Chron. 32.31) their continual Observation of the Heavenly Bodies might have more Occasion to take notice of it) Merodach-Baladan their King sent to Hezekiah to congratulate his Recovery, defirous, it's likely, of his Friendship whom he had understood to be fo much in the Favour of God; especially bearing no Good Will to the Assyrians. He in a vain Ostentation of his Wealth shew'd the Ambassadours all his Treasures, and whatfoever was in his House; for which, Ijaiah the Prophet denounced the Carrying away all these things to Babylon. For the Pride of his Heart there was Wrath upon him and Judab; yet he humbled himself, both he and the Inhabitants of Judah, so that the Wrath of the Lord came not upon them in his days. He flourished in Abundance of Riches and Honour, stopped the upper water-course of Gihon, and brought it streight down to the West-side of the City of David. He reigned 29 years (three whereof were together with his Father:) being dead, they buried him in the chiefest Sepulchers of the Sons of David, and all Judah, with the Inhabitants of Terusalem, did him Honour at his Death.

He filled Jerusalem with innocent Bloud; amongst other Martyrs Isaiab the Prophet (as it's faid) being fawn afunder with a wooden Saw, because he was free with him in reproving his ungodly Life; although he was of the Blood Royal, as the Son of Amos, the Brother of King Amaziah, according to the Tradition of the Jews, who also have related him to have been Father-in-Law, nay (as some) Grandfather by the Mothers fide, to Manaffes himself. In such Wickedness continued he for several years, till fuch time as God fent upon him the Captains of the King of Afforia (Elarchaddon some think) who took him lying amongst the Thorns, and carried him bound with Fetters unto Babylon, which City (as it appeareth from this Place) was now again under the King of Affyria. Here having Leifure and Occasion to bethink himself, in his Affliction he repented, was humbled greatly, and befought the Lord, who heard his Prayer, and restored him to his Kingdom. After this, he knew that the Lord was God; and purged his Realm of Idolatry; which Reformation the Jews make to have been in the 33 year before his Death. He reigned 55 years.

pentance, worshipping and sacrificing to all the craved Images which his Father had Olymp 33-an-4, made, and going on to trespass more and more. After two years, his Servants conspired against him and slew him in his own house, all whom the People of the Land Chap. 34. put to Death, and made Josiah his Son (a Child of eight years old) King in his stead. He in the eighth year of his Reign began to seek after the God of his Fathers, and in his twelfth to cleanse his Kingdom, and all the Land of Israel, from Idolatry : although the greatest part of the latter, was now Subject to the King of Affyria. In the 2 Kings 23. eighteenth year of his Reign and of his Age the 26th, he commanded the Temple to 2 Chron. 36. be repaired, and the Worship of God therein restored: where also finding a Book Olymp.35.an.4. of the Law, he renewed the Covenant between God and the People, and celebrated fuch a folemn Paffeover, as had not been kept in Ifrael fince the time of the Judges. Now if the time of the Judges, and the Oppressions, be not confounded, but taken at their full Length; then this year being the 930th ending, or the 931ft Beginning, from the entering into Canaan, was the 7th of the 133 week, or the last of the 1916 Jubilie. Josiah in his 21th year ending, disguised himself that he might fight with Nech King of Heppt (who was going up against the Affgrians) and would not hearken to his words from the Mouth of God, labouring with him to refuse Fighting against the Lord, who had sent him, and commanded him to make Haste: Therefore joyning Battel with him in the Valley of Megiddo, he was fore wounded and being carried to Jerusalem, died there; all Judah and Jerusalem, mourning and making great Lamentation for him.

Sect. 2. Dignity. For Pharaoh having finished his work at Euphrates, and in Colosyria, came to Jerusalem, whence he led away into Hegypt this young King, and left his elder Brother Eliakim in his Place, whose name he changed into Jehoiakim, imposing a Tax of a hundred Talents of Silver and a Talent of Gold upon the Land. Though Jeoahaz be said to have reigned three years, yet some will have a year to have pasfed betwixt the 31 year of Jolias, and the first of Jehoiakim; partly for that Jolias feemeth to have reigned fomething more than 31 years, and some space would be taken up in so solemn a mourning for him, before the Instalment of Jeboahaz; and also to consult about this thing, seeing it was against Right and Custom to give this Honour to the younger Brother: lastly some time (perhaps some Moneths) was requisite for setting the Affairs of Judea, about the Instalment of Jehoiakim, and the Tribute. Ludovicus Cappellus moreover, giveth a whole year to Jehoahaz and Jehotakim (though the Scripture speaketh but of three Moneths apiece) that the last year of Zedekiah might fall into the 390th year from the Rent of the Kingdom; of which more, when we arrive at that time.

18. Jehoiakim thus advanced by Pharaoh Necho, was twenty five years old when he began to reign; which if so, he was born in the fifteenth year of his Father's Age; as, if Jehoahaz was twenty three when he began his Reign, he must also have been born in the fixteenth of Joliah. This maketh Joliah to have applied himself to Procreation of Children at least in the fourteenth year of his Life; which feeming too early, and not agreeable to the Piety of that Prince, there are that suspect for 25, ought to be read 15, and 13 for 23; fo that the one might be born in the 24 and the other in the 25 year of his Father. But there is no Necessity for such a Reading of the Text. The fourth year of Jehoiakim fell in with the first of Nebuchadnesar King Terem, 25. 16 of Babylon, and was the 23th from the 13th of the Reign of Jossas, wherein Je- & 3. remiab the Prophet first began to prophesie; and hence it also appeareth, that Josias reigned at least full 31 years, and that one passed between his Death and the Beginning of Jehoiakim, else 23 only had passed betwixt the 13th of the one, and the 4th of the other. In this year Pharaoh Necho fell upon the Babylonians with chap. 6. War, because, as it seemeth, they had sollicited Jehoiakim his Tributary to revolt, Phirash Nicho and sought against Nebuchadnesar at Carchemis near Euphrates, (by the Greek A.M. 3396. and Latin Writers called Cercusium;) in which Battel he was overthrown and olymp.42.an.4.

19. After this Victory, came Nebuchadnesar to Jerusalem, where he either took Jehoiakim Captive to lead him to Babylon, or at least made him his tributary Vassal. Some account this year, as the Beginning of the Reign of Nebuchadnesar, so of the Captivity of Judab, and the Desolation of that Country, because that Jeremiah, having spoken first of the 13 years, in which he and the other Prophets had warned the People to no Purpose, afterwards addeth, that God would send Nebuchad- chap. 25. 9. nesar his Servant against the Land, which should be a Desolation and an Astonish. & 11. ment, and that these Nations should serve the King of Babylon 70 years. But the Prophecy of Daniel beginneth thus: In the third year of the Reign of Jehoiakim King of Judah, came Nebuchadnesar King of Babylon to Jerusalem, and beseeged it: and the Lord gave Jehoiakim King of Judah into his hand, with part of the Vessels of the House of God, which he carried into the Land of Shinar, to the House of his God. This Place seemeth to contradict the other; some have chosen to close with the literal Sense of it, and to hold, that in the third year of Jehorakim, began the Captivity of the Jew. Others see more Reason to stick to the other Place, and to take away all Difference, interpret this third year of the third of the Sabbatical year, or the Weck of Years, and thus would read it, In the third year, Jehoiakim the King of Judah reigned, came Nebuchadnesar King of Babylon unto Jerusalem, &c. But the Tems with some modern Writers understand by this third year, the third of the Rebellion of Jehoiakim, against whom Nebuchadnefar coming, about the end of the fifth year of his Reign, made him his Tributary, and so he continued three years; viz. or the terenty ginning of his ninth year, and so continued for three years in Rebellion, which between the property of the continued for three years in Rebellion, which between the property of the continued for three years in Rebellion, which between the property of the Him Captive to Babylon, with part of the holy Vessels, and others of the Royal and Princely Race, amongst whom was Daniel; and so the Captivity of 70 years began

20. That this third year cannot be understood of the third of Jehoiakim's Reign, is clear from Jerêmiah, who joyneth his fourth with the first of Nebuchadnesar; and because elsewhere is made Mention of his fifth: whence is apparent, that he could not be led Captive in his third year. The second Opinion indeed is not amiss; for this was really the third year of the Week or the third from the Sabbatical year. Sect. 3 For, the 18th of Josiah, in which the Passeover was celebrated, being the last year of the 19th Jubilie, and so the Sabbatical year; from that to the 11th ending of Jeboishim, or the 12th Beginning, are counted 31 years: viz. four weeks and three odd years; this being usual with the Pen-men of holy Story, to count their times by Sabbatical Years or Jubilies. Jacobus Cappellus would have Nebuchadnesar, at AdA.M. 3391, the Command of Nabopolasser his Father, to have come into Judea in the second & 3392. year of the Reign of Jeboiakim, who then sware Fealty to him; but in the third year rebelled: whence Nebuchadnesar came down again in his fifth year, and took him Captive. Then will he have him to have fet Shallum over the Kingdom, till Jeconias his Son, an Infant of a year old, should come to Age; but Jehoiakim himfelf there lived miferably in Captivity, till the 11th year, reckoned from his first being made King by Necho. He being then dead, and News of it brought to Jerusalem, they there made his Son Jehoiakim King in his stead. And he beginneth the feventy years of the Captivity in his fifth year, when he will have him carried to

21. But Ludovicus Cappellus his Brother replyeth, that in no Place is there any Mention made of Nebuchadnesar's coming up against him in the second year of his Reign, the place thought to make for the Purpole, having as much Respect to the 2 Rings 24. 1. fifth, as the second year. And as little Mention is there any where made of Jehoiakim's fix years of Captivity, who if he had died at Babylon, the Scripture would never have attributed to him the Reign of eleven years, but only so many as he really reigned, viz. 5. The rest, it would either have given to Shallum the pretended Vice-roy, or to Jehoiakim his Son; it being a thing improbable, that the Name should be preserved for Jehoiakim, whilst Sallum indeed reigned. Besides, the Babylonian King observed no such matter afterward in Jehoiakim, whom taking away he really made King Zedekiah, without the Title of Vice-roy or Lieutenant. Nay, though Jehoiakim lived long at Babylon, and after the Death of Nebuchadnesar, being loofed out of Bonds, was honoured and esteemed by Evilmerodach above any of his Condition (and therein excelled Jehoiakim, if he lived there so long;) yet is there no more time given to his Reign, than that wherein he only continued in his Principality. As for the Regency of Shallum, it is a meer Invention, there being no other, according to the Jews, than Jehoahaz, who was also called by that name. no other, according to the Jews, that jet in they are bidden not to weep for the Jerem, 22.1f. for in the place thought to make this out, they are bidden not to weep for the Jerem, 22.1f. dead (viz. his Rebellion, and the eleventh of his Reign, died e're he went (as we may suppose) and was cast out or buried, according to the Prophecy of Jeremiah, who had fore-Chap. 22. 18, told he should be buried with the Burial of an Asse; being cast forth beyond the 19.3 36.30 Gates of Jerusalem, in the Day to the Heat, and in the Night to the Frost, which could be done by none, except the barbarous Babylonians. After his Death, the Conquerour placed in his stead Jehoiakim his Son, called also Conias and Jechonias, 2 Chron. 36. who did evil in the Sight of the Lord, as his Father before him, and Nebuchadnesar 2 Kings 23. it seemeth, repenting of what he had done, lest he should be drawn from his Obc-0/my4.em. dience, by the Example of his Father, and the Perswasions of those about him, Nebachad. 8: fent his Army before him, (about a year after his former Expedition) to befiege Jerusalem. When he himself came to the Siege, Jehoiakim came out to him with his Mother and Servants, and yielded his Person in the eighth year of Nebuchadnesar ending. Then the Babylonian entring Jerusalem, took away the Treasures found in the House of the Lord, and the Kings House, brake all the golden Instruments which Solomon had made for the Temple, and so carried Jehoiakim with his Mother, Wives, and Servants unto Babylon. Besides those, he transported all the best sort of the People from Jerusalem, with the ablest and strongest for War from other Places, in which number was Ezekiel the Priest, the Son of Buzzi. The year 2 Kings 25; following Pharaob came with an Army to his Affiftance, which Nebuchadnefar understanding went to meet him, and he thereupon afraid to ingage, retreated into his own Land. Nebuchadnesar then returning sate down again before Jerusalem, wherein Famine at length prevailing, and Zedekiah still resusing to yield, though Jeremiah constantly advised him to do it, in the end of his 11th year, and the first day of the Moneth it was broken into by the Chaldeans. SECT. IV.

The Kingdom of Ifrael

From the Revolt of the Tribes, to their final Captivity under Salmanasser.

HE ten Tribes, falling off from Rehoboam upon his churlilh Answer, chose Teroboam the Son of Nebat, of the Tribe of Ephraim to reign over them. He, being industrious in the Work of Fortifications, had been , Kings 11. made by Salamon Ruler over all the Charge of the house of Joseph; but 13, 13, 14, the Lord, after he was provoked by the Idolatry of Salamon, sent Ahijah the Prophet 2 Chron. 116 to him, to promise him ten Tribes; which coming to the Ears of the King he fought 12to flay him; whereupon Jeroboam fled for his Life to Shifhak, King of Reppt, with whom he fojourned till Solomon's Death. Then he was fent for out of Haypt, and accompanied all Ifrael as their Speaker in their Address made to Rehoboam; whom after they had rejected, they made him King, that the Lord might perform what he A. M. 3026.

had promifed by the Prophet.

2. In the beginning of his Reign he built up Shechem, which had lyen Waste well nigh 260 years, from the time that Abimelech destroyed it. This place being situated in Mount Estrains he first made his Habitation, till he went over Jordan, and built Pennel, whence afterwards he also removed his Seat to Tirza. He forfook the Lord, who promised him Establishment, if he would keep his Statutes and Commandments, going about by carnal and wicked Policy to fecure his Interest. For left his Subjects by going up to Jerujalem to worthip, should be turned again from their Obedience to him, he fet up two Goldlen Calves, he one at Dah, and the other at Bethel, having learnt Idolatry towards this fort of Cattel in Heypt. To that in Bethel he facrificed, inftituting a Feast like to that of Tabernacles: and, though rebuked by a Prophet, he was stricken with Leprosie, and might have been convinced by other Miracles; yet neither these things nor the many Judgments of God against him and his Successors, could reclaim either him or them. Rejecting the Priests of the Sons of Aaron, and the Levites, he made of the lowest of the People Priefts for the high Places: He had War with Rehoboam continually, and with Abiab his Son, who overthrew him in a great Battel, and flew 500000 of his men, although he added a Stratagem to the Force of his numbers (which doubled those of his Enemy) compassing in Abiab's Army whilst he was speaking to it. Some A. M. 3047. years after, he died, having reigned 22. Nadab his Son succeeding him, walked in the ways of his Father, and in his Sin wherewith he made Ifrael to fin; but in his a Kings 15. fecond year, he and all Ifrael befieged Gibbethon of the Philiftines, Baafa the Son of Abijab, of the Hone of Issued reconspired against him, and slew him there.

3. Nadab is said to have began his Reign in the second year of Asa, and to have reigned two years: yet Baasa to have began to reign in the third year of Asa. To this, either must be said, that Jerobouse made his Son King whil's he himself yet lived, or else not reigning twenty two years compleat, but some part only of the twenty second year (so that the far greater part of the first year of Nadab must fall in with the greater part of the second of Asa) neither did Nadab reign two whole years, but one with a piece of another, and so the first year of Baasa will fall in with the greater part of the third of Afa. For in this comparing of the times of the Kings of Judah and Ifrael, is to be taken notice; That, 1. A year only begnn is taken for a compleat one. 2. The fathers often, yet living, communicated the Royal Dignity to their Sons. 3. Some were twice inaugurated, as Jorana iti the Tribe of Indab, and Holbea in that of Ephraim. 4. That there were many Vacancies, especially in the Kingdom of Ifrael. Baasa cut off all the Posterity of Jeroreficity us boams, not leaving one to pifs against the Wall, according as Abijab had tore-telly delivor told; so that here Jeroboam's Policy sailed him, the Golden Calves having pushed down his Family. When Badfa faw that Afa had restored Religion, and for that Cause many of his Subjects revolted to him, he had War with him all his days, and in his fourteenth year built Ramab to restrain Fugitives. As to divert 2 Chron. 16.

of Baafa, that it should be made like to that of Jeroband all of it being destroyed in like manner by Zimri, But Zimri himself reigned only seven days; for the People then besieged Gibbethon, and understanding how things had paffor the People then belieged Gibbethon, and understanding how things had pal-fed at Tirzah, made Omri, the General of the Army, King. He presently led them against Tirzah, and took it; Whereupon Libert withdrew himself into the Palace, and fetting it on Fire perished therein, because he wish walked in the Steps of Jerobeam. A Schism now followed, for one, half of the People chook Tibui, the Son of Gineth, and he reigned four years (imperfed) as the Tory have it the Divi-sion continued, till at Length Tibui dying, Gent seigned alone, He is also fail to A.M. 3016, have began his Reign in the 31th year of Ass. which mult be understood offinis Messi-erating alone having dain Zimri in the twentwe wishth year (hearing) alone having the them. reigning alone, having flain Zimri in the twenty eighth year (beginning) of that King. After he had reigned fix years at Tirzab, he translated the Scat of the Kingdom to Samaria, which City he had built on a Hill, bought of one Shewer. from whom it took the name. Having done worfe than any that were before him, he died after he had reigned twelve years. Which if they be accounted from the Death of Zinari, and 60 contain his whole Reign, then reigned Abab his son, and Pide Lad, Cap. Successor but two years with him, his 11th year falling into the 18 of Ala 3-Dut; if pellum then, be reckoned from the Death of Tibni, then must Abab have reigned about five years together with him.

5. Abd exceeded in Wickedness all his Predecessors, not only living in the Sins A. M. 2083; of Jeroboam, but marrying Jezebel the Daughter of Ethbaal, King of Siden, whose 46 30. god Baal he served and worshipped. For this, through the Prayer of the Prophet 1 Kings 18: Elijab, it rained not upon the Land for three years; but at the end thereof he prayed again, and the Heavens gave Rain. He took Occasion to thew the Vanity of the Idol Baal, and then flew his Priests; for which being threatned by Jecshel, he fled into the Defart to Mount Horeb. Against Abab came up twice Banbadad, King Cha. 15:

Syria for three years. In this space Ahab fell sick for Naboth's Vineyard, who being by Jezebel's Procurement accused of Blasphemy, was stoned to Death, and so Ahab enjoyed the Vineyard by way of Confiscation. For this so wicked a Fact severe Judgment was pronounced against him and Jezebel, by Elijab; the Execution where-of by a temporary Repentance they caused to be prorogued. But the three years of the Peace being expired, he renewed the War with Syria; for that Benhadad having engaged to restore such Cities as he had taken, refused to surrender Ra-moth-Gilead. Four hundred false Prophets perswaded him to undertake the Expedition; only Micajah sent from God disswaded him from it. With him joyned Tehosaphat King of Judah, whose Son Jeheram had married Athaliah his Daughter.

But going down both together, Ahab received a Wound by an Arrow, and thereof died, that day, in the 22th year of his Reign.

Hereat Abaziah being angry, sent two Caprains with their Fittes, one after another, to fetch him to him; but he called for Fire down from Heaven, which confirmed them: then being intreated by the third, he went with him to the King, where denouncing the same to his Face, Abaziah accordingly died, not long after him his Brother Joram followed, in the eighteenth year of Jshofaphal

King of Judah ending, who wrought Evil in the fight of the Lord, but not like his Sect. A. Father and Brother; for he put away the Image of Baal, erected by his Father, yet cleaved to the Sin of Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, who made Ifrael to fin, because of Chap.3. his carnal Interest; all the Kings of Ifrael accounting it an especial piece of Policy, to busie the People in the Worship of the golden Calves.

7. Joran made War upon the Moabites which had revolted, in Conjunction with Jebolapha King of Judah, and the King of Edom his Tributary, Elifba the Prophet miraculoully providing the Armies of Water, and promiting them Victory. When the Sun arose and shone upon the Pits full of Water, it appeared, to the Moabites, Blood; so that they concluding their Enemies to have fallen one upon another, came out to take the Plunder of the Field; but finding other Entertainment, were repelled with great Consternation and Loss. The Ifraelites then falling upon the Country, made Havock of all things, and belieged Melba King of the Moabites, in Kirhazereth, who being streightened, attempted with 700 Men to break through to the King of Edom, but could not; whereupon taking his Son, (his own some think, others the King of Edom's) which should have reigned in his Stead, he offered him for a Burnt-offering upon the Wall. This Spectacle seemed so horrible, as raised Indignation against Israel, and such Pity towards the Man driven by extreme Neceffity, (as Josophus telleth it,) that being mindful of the Mutability of humane Affairs, they raifed the Siege and departed.

8. Benbadad King of Syria made several Attempts upon Ifrael, and besseging Samaria, reduced it unto extreme Necessity'by Famine. Him Hazael his Servant flew, and possessed himself of his Kingdom; but having received, together with it, the Succession of the War, Jeboram went up against him, and was accompanied by A. Chap. 8. bazaah King of Judah, to Ramoth Gilead. Here receiving a Wound, he returned to Jezreel, to be cured; but the Army was left under several Captains, amongst This anointed which was Jehn the Son of Jehofaphat; to whom Elisha sent one of the Sons of the

he had reigned twelve years. He caused Jejabel to be thrown down out of a Window, designed to the control of the Company of the Comp where her Carkeise was eaten by the Dogs; after which, writing Letters to Samaria, he procured seventy Sons of Abab to be slain, and their Heads sent to him. Then going thither, he flew 42 persons in his way, of the Kindred of Abaziah King of Judah, who were going to visit Jehoram and Jesabel: at Samaria he put to Death

all the Priests of Baal, and burnt the Temple with the Images. Yet took he no Heed to walk in the Law of the Lord God of Ifrael, with all his Heart, departing not from the Sin of Jeroboam. For his executing of Justice upon the House of Akab, the Lord promised that his Seed of the fourth Generation should fit upon his Throne; yet because of the Rottenness of his Heart, he began to cut Israel short in his days, by the means of Hazael, who now subdued not only the Gileadites, but also whatsoever the Israelites possessed beyond Jordan, raging with Cruelty against Man, Woman, and Child, as Elisha had foretold him. Jehn coming to the Kingdom at the same time as Athaliah began her Usurpation in Judah, reigned full 28 years, and then died.

9. Jehoahaz his Son succeeded him, in the 23th year of Joash the Son of Ahaziah King of Judah, who did Evil in the Sight of the Lord, in the Sin of Jeroboam; a chap. 13. Grove being also in Samaria. Hazael mightily oppressed Israel also in his days, so that to him were left but 50 Horsemen, 10 Chariots, and 10000 Foot-men. Yet the A.M. 3145. Lord was intreated by him, and fent Ifrael a Deliverer; notwithstanding which, Joali 23. yet Prince and People remained incorrigible. After he had reigned feventeen years he died, and left his Kingdom to his Son Joafh, who also reigned with him about three years, for that he began his Reign in the 37th year of Joash King of Judah, A.M. 3159. and is held by the Jews to be that Deliverer, mentioned to have been fent by God. Josh 37. He overcame the Syrians thrice, as dying Elifha foretold him (whom he visited. and confulted about the Affairs of his Kingdom;) and thereby recovered the Cities loft to Hazael by his Father. Upon the Occasion formerly mentioned, he took Jernsalem, with Abaziah the King of Judah, and, breaking down the Wall of the City 400 Cubits, plundred the House of the Lord and the Kings House. He also was guilty of Jeroboam's Sin, and died after he had reigned together with his Father, and by himfelf fixteen years.

10. His Son came after him, Jeroboam by name, whom God made instrumental chap. 14: to preserve Israel; nay to raise it to the highest Top of Greatness it arrived at. For he recovered Damaseus and Hamath, which had by Right belonged to the A. M. 3175.

Sect. 4. Tribe of Judah, with whatfoever the Syrians had taken from his Predecessors, from the ancient Border of the Entrance of Hamath, to the Sea of the Plains, or the Lake Apphalittes, as Jonas the Prophet the Son of Amitthai had foretold, the same with him that prophefied against Ninive, being of Gath-Hepher, a Town of the Tribe of (a) Zebulon, in (b) Galilee of the Gentiles; out of which therefore arose a Prophet, (a) Josh, 19. though the learned Pharifees so earnestly urged the contrary to Nicodemus. In the 13. King's days also prophesied Hosea, and Amos, called from the Herd in Judea, to 6 lia. 9.1. prophetie to the People of Ifrael. Notwithstanding all that God did for Jeroboam, he did Evil also in his Sight, accompanying his Ancestors in the Sin of Jeroboam the Son of Nebat. He reigned 41 years, and after his Death the Affairs of his Kingdom 2 Kings 15. fell to decay; way being made for the Ruine of his House, and an Anarchy ensuing for 24 years. For so it must be, if Zacharias his Son began not his Reign till the A. M. 3238. 38th of Uzziah King of Judah, the last of Jeroboam falling in with the 14th of this Hazaria 38. King, feeing Uzziah is said to have begun his Reign in the 27th of his, and he reigned 41 years. This may well feem strange in this Kingdom, where Princes were often made away by Ufurpers; but God had promifed Jehn, that his Children should reign to the fourth Generation; and this Zacharias might be a Posthumus, or however very young, and therefore not admitted by the Nobility to govern, till he had attained to fuch Ripeness, as was convenient for so great a Charge. 11. Zachariah, doing Evil in the Sight of the Lord, as did his Ancestors, reigned but fix Moneths, being then flain by Shallum the Son of Jabesh, who reigned in his stead in the 39th year of Azariah King of Judah. He enjoyed his usured Rovalty but a short space, being after two Moneths served so himself by Menahem the Son of Gadi, who also reigned in his Stead. Menahem smote Tiphjah and all that were therein, with the Coasts thereof from Tirzah, because they opened not to him; and ripped up the Women with Child. He did Evil in the fight of the Lord, not departing from the Sin of Jeroboam all his days; wherefore God stirred up the Spirit of Pul King of Affyria, who invaded the Land; but he gave him 1000 Ta-Pal Line of lents of Silver, which he wrested from the richest of his Subjects, to confirm the Kingdom in his hand. After he had held it ten years he died, and his Son Pekahiah reigned in his Stead, in the 50th year of Azariah; fo that Menahem having begun his Reign in the 39th of that King, and reigned but ten years, here feemeth an Inter-regnum of a year or more to have happened after his Death, except that be admitted which some think, viz. that Menahem did not peaceably enjoy the Kingdom till about a year after Shallum's Death, purchasing it then of Pul; so that beginning his Keign in the 29th of Azariah, or Uzziah, must be understood peaceably, and in that year ending. Then must Pekahiah have begun his Reign in the very A. M. 3250. beginning of the 5cth years and fo a few Moneths being added to the ten years of Hazarie 50. Menahem, at the furthest, there will be no need of an Inter-regnum. Pekahiah treading in the wicked Steps of his Predecessors, reigned two years, and then was slain by Pekah the Son of Remaliah, one of his Captains, who possessed himself of his

12. Pekab joyned with the King of Syria against Ahaz King of Judah, slew in Judab 120000 in one day, all valiant men, because they had forsaken the Lord God 2 Chron, 28, of their Fathers. Zichri, a mighty man of Ephraim, flew Maaseiah the Kings Son, Azrikam the Governour of the house, and Elkanah that was next the King. Two hundred thousand were also carried Captive, with much Spoil, all which Obed the Prophet, when they came to Samaria, procured to be fent back. This made Ahab purchase the Help of Tiglath-Pilefer King of Affyria, who first destroyed the King 1 Chron. 5.26. and Kingdom of Damascus, carried the Inhabitants thereof into Captivity; and then nites, Gadites, came against Pekah, and transported the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half Tribe of and the half Tribe of Ma. Manaffes into Halah, Habor, Hara, and to the River Gozan: then croffing Jordan, raffis, carried he fet upon Galilee, and carried away the Inhabitants thereof with all the Naphalites Captives into (which remained of those that were left by Benhadad) into Affria. Pekah doing Evil in the fight of the Lord, after he had reigned twenty years, was flain by Hofea the Son of Elab who usurped the Kingdom. 13. Hofbea the 19th King of Ifrael began his Reign in the 12th year of Ahaz King 2Kings 17.18.

Hofber did Evil in the Sight of the Lord, but not as the Kings of Ifrael which were before him. Against him came up Salmanasser King of Assyria, and made him his Sect. A tributary Vasial, which he continued for some time, till weary of this Bondage, he conspired with So King of Ægypt, and refused to pay his Tribute: Hereupon, Salmanaffer subdued first the Moabites, lest he should have an Enemy at his Back, then invaded Ifrael and befieged Samaria, in the fourth year of Hezekiah King of Judah, and the 7th of Holbea. At the end of 3 years (in the 6 of Hezekiah, and the 9 of Holea) he Excelsion, took the City, and carried the Israelites Captive into Asyria, where he placed them in Chalach, Chaber, by the River of Gosan, and in the Cities of Media, because they had not obeyed the Voice of the Lord, but transgressed the Covenant. In their Seat he placed certain Persians that inhabited by the River Chuthus, and afterwards, in Distinction from the Jews, were called Samaritans. This hapned to Israel, for their abominable Idolatry, 255 years after the Rent of the Kingdom; so that this Schism lasted sive Jubilies and ten years; in the 832 after the Entrance into Canaan, according to Ludovicus Cappellus, and therefore in the end of the seventeenth Jubilie Original. It is not probable that these names should be only given to it upon this Account, that part of his Posterity here fixed themselves, for then the like might have been expected concerning many other places. The Scripture calleth Egypt (a) often by the name of Mufor, (b) a Kings which sceneth the singular of Mifraiim contracted from Meforaiim, and signifiest a science of fortified Place; no Country in the World being more seneed by its natural Situation. on. The Arabians at this day know the Metropolis Alcairo by the name of Mefre, and the Egyptians anciently called their first Moneth Mesori. The dual word Misand the Egyptian alection, and the Distinction of Egypt into Upper and Lower; whereof orosins is it the former, watered by the River Nile, running in one Channel, was divided into 6.2. Thebais and Heptanomus. (Thebais being called the Land of Pathros, and diffinguished from Ægypt by Isaiah and Jeremiah) and the lower part was by the Greeks called Delta, from the Triangular Figure thereof; the River being herein divided into many Branches.

2. This Misraim is thought to be the same with Osiris, so much spoken of by the The fame with Repptians, and accounted the Son of Saturn, the eldelt of the Gods, and also the Diodorn Si Son of Jupiter Hammon. For Ofiris being by the Greeks named Dionysus, one tel-culus iib. t. leth us that he had this Appellation both from his Father and Country, the former pag. 1. part of the word noting the one, and the latter the other, viz. Nyla a City of Arabia Fælix, built by Cham, in which he seemeth to have been born. From the Reign of Ofiris, to the Coming down of Alexander the Great into Ægypt, the Priests reckoned, some above 10000 years, others little less than 23000. But several Forms of years being used in several Nations we are to suppose theirs to have been measured rather by the Course of the Moon through the Zodiack, than that of the Sun. Jacobus Cappellus therefore thinketh 1889 years to have passed from the Reign of this Oficis to Alexander his Going down into Higgst, the beginning whereof he fixed at the 1778th year of the World; 100 and odd years after the Flood, about the same

Oficis, and Ifis time that Nimrod his Nephew began his Principality at Babylon. This Oficis is feigntheir Renown ed by the Ægyptians to have married his Sister Isis, and they make them the true Bacchus and Ceres. Much they are both reported to have done for the Benefit of Mankind, by bringing it to Civility; to Him they ascribe the finding out of Agriculture, and to Her the Invention of Corn and Laws. He built Thebes the ancient Seat of the Kings, with 100 Gates; travelled into the greatest part of the World to teach men Civility with the Use of Corn and Wine, taking Pan along with thim, who being had in great Reverence amongst the Hegyptians, dedicated a City to him by the name of Chemmis. In his time lived Hermes, or Mercurius; and Fiercules, who being otherwise called Gygon, or Gygnon, is said to have helped the Gods against the Gyants. Ofiris, when he returned, was killed by his wicked Brother 3. Typhon, seizing upon the Kingdom, was by Isis, through the Help of her Son Dioderus.

Several things were confecrated in feveral Places, yet by a general Confent the Sacred Bull, called Apis or Mnevis, was most valued, and chiefly adored, because of the special Help that kind of Creature afforded to Tillage. This Bull was black all over, having only a square white spot in his Forehead, faith Herodotus, on his right side faith. Pliny, like to a Crescent, being also facred to the Moon, as Marcellinus will have it. On the back he had the Image of an Eagle, a knot on the Tongue like to a Crab, and on his Tail double hairs. This kind of Beast did the Ægyptians worship as the greatest God, with astonishing Veneration, as Macrobius termeth it, till it had lived several years; but not being suffered to pass a certain Term, it was then drowned by the Priests. Being dead, a great and folemn Mourning there was, untill another could be found with the same Marks. Now some make this Beast to be worshipped in Honour of Apis, King of the Argives, who going down into He- August. de Cigipt, was there Deified after his Death, and called Serapis. But there having cit. been several Kings in divers places, of that name, they are confounded one with

4. Nothing, indeed, but Uncertainties attend the most ancient History of that Nation; no two Authors agreeing betwixt themselves, concerning the Succession of the Agyptian Kings. This is not only to be attributed to the Force of time, but the Unfaithfulness of their Priests, who having it committed to their Charge, to record the Memorables of their Country, foifted things of their own heads into the Story, concealed from the Natives whatfoever made against their own Profit, and from Strangers all things that tended to the Dishonour of their Country. Out of fuch a kind of Design they related not the same things to such as travelled thither with a Desire to be informed; so that from the corrupt Fountains of their Records have proceeded the Histories of several, who pretending to have taken them out of the very Archives, are no less dissonant amongst themselves than from the Truth. The Catalogues of their Kings are full of inextricable Labyrinths; Manetho being of no Credit, because of his notable Lying, and all those who profess to follow him, as Josephus, Africanus, Eusebius, Syncellus, Scaliger, Usber, and others not agreeing in their ranking and ordering of them.

5. Several Dynasties are made to have preceded the time of Abraham, with whose Eusth. of the denti- Birth (as it is placed in the 43th year of Ninus) the beginning of the 16th is joyned. Much Labour is spent by some, in an Endeavour to clear the order of these Dinasties, and to expound them. But, if they should be allowed of, little more than 200 years are to be affigned to the Continuance of all the first 15. because the Passage of Cham, and his Posterity from the Mountains of Ararat into Egypt, and the Establishment of a formal Government there, could scarce be performed within one Century after the Flood; time for the Increase of mankind, and the unpassableness of the Earth duely considered; except we cast the Beginning of the first Dynastie back beyond the Flood. It hath been thought therefore that these were not several Successions of Kings, which continued for so small a time, but rather certain Ranks and Orders of Governours under the Kings; who might be content to enjoy their Ease and Quiet, together with the Dignity (as the Kings did which Joseph served) whil'st the Management of publick Affairs was wholly committed to these Regents, or Lieutenants, of fundry Lineages or forts of men, who by their Actions might leave greater Impressions upon Posterity than the Kings themselves, and so give Occasion to the Egyptians of vaunting them for so many Sovereign Princes indeed. That Enfebriso might accommodate the times and Orders of these Dynasties to the Hiltories of other parts of the World, he is not afraid to transpose them as he findeth them in several Authors. Upon this Account Jacobus Cappellus thinketh it a vain thing to recite in his Chronicle the Series of the Kings, capting timeter, van uning to reste in ins caponicie me series of the anga, feeing Manethe, by whom Scaliger would amend Bulbins, is most worthy of Credit.

But it being requisite to give Beginners fome limight into the Story, such things must be briefly related, as out of such Uncertainties carry the greatest Shew of Pro-

out the last 6. After Tiphons Death, Isi, as Diddorus Wiffeth, for some time governed the Lik 1.6.13 as Gods. Ringdom; but so joyntly with her Son Orus, of Horus, that he is also faid to have fucceeded after the Death of his Father, and is moreover accounted the laft of the gods. He inflituted a year confifting of three Moneths, and therice a year, was confirmed after him Horar. The Rephilar Tear, properly 6 called, confifted of 365 occasions, but befides this, they had allo monethly years of thirty dayes, and others of our Moneths apiece, or 120 days, that by this various, and entirely and others of Cappellar thinketh, they might delined the Greek. "Of this latter way few Examples we meet with: but Diodorus maketh mention of it, affigning the Caufe to have been, for that they divided their Solar year; not into Both, but only three parts; and Cappellus maketh this following account to conflit of fileh kind of years. After the gods, came men to the Government, and the Exprision beafted that they had Kings of their own Country, and home both for the high part, during the Term of 4700 years; after Cambyses Strangers, as Perstans and Macedonians, having governed them. years; areer campyer orangers, as response our control of four Monettis appearance, and to control capped. Now these 4700 years he guestieth to confist of four Monettis appearance of the World of the tain 1544 Julian years, which being deducted out of the years of the World, at home at M. the Period whereof Cambyle came down into Hight, 1931 will remain; at what 1531 continue Ofice, or Orac his Son might perhaps die, who being the last of the gods, Kings 1941.

7. The first King that reigned after these gods was Menas, or Mens, which name Herodoms of by some is thought to have been only of Dignity, and that Ofirm was so called Diodoms. by tome is thought to nave over only or Dignry, and that Open was to caned. Others think Mercurius Trimegiffus meant thereby, for that the Hebrew Word Meni fignifieth an Arithmetician, and that Office might well be termed Trifmegiffus, being a great Conquerous, Philosopher, and Benefation to Mankind, in giving good Laws, and teaching profitable Arts! Another would have Seforts, whom he fup-Laws, and teaching promator Arts. Another would have opposed, whom ne supposed to have succeeded Offits, to be meant by Menss, as nothing inferiour to Offits in Prowess and great Undertakings. But Sefestis the Great reigned not till many years after, and nothing hindreth but Menss in the Respitan Language (to fay nothing of the Greek) might be a proper name as well as a Title of Dignity. But, who fucceded him is not known; the Priefts feigning 52 Princes to have followed him in order for the space of 1400 years, unto Bustra, multiplying Kings, Years, Lies (or Fallacies) to make their Story the more admirable. We must there fore in this unknown Path, take the blind Conduct of the Dynasties again, of which omitting the first seventeen, to which almost 4000 years are ascribed, the 18th is by Cappellus made to begin nine years before the time whereunto Englisus fets it, by Cappenine mane to begin the Patriarch Jucob; the Hift in order of it being Amos, A.M. 2274.

8. To his reign are given 25 years; for that, according to this Account, he it was who honoured Joseph and let him over the Land. He dying in the second year 2016. of the Famine, Chebros fucceeded him, who reigned thirteen years, and him Amenophis, who reigned 21, under whom Jacob died. To him succeeded Mephres, according to Eusebius, but Manethon after him placeth his Sifter Amesses, or Amerses, to which he giveth 21 years and 9 Moneths. After this reigned Mebres twelve years, Mebramuthofis 26, and Thuthmofis (or Thomfit) 9. After him followed Aminables (otherwise called Palmanothis and Phamenophis) who reigned 31 years, and by some is accounted that Memnon whose Image of Stone, at Theber in Higher, founded like an Harp, when the Sun-Beams, first in the Morning beat upon it; which is witnessed by many Authors of good Credit. To him succeeded Orus, or Horus, who reigned 38 years, and to him Acenthres, who reigned 12: Manetho maketh Acenchres the Daughter of Orns, and giveth to her 12 years and one Moneth; after her, he bringeth in Rathotis her Brother, to whom he giveth nine years. But after Acenchres, Eufebric placeth Achoris, and giveth to him but feven years, to whom succeeded Cenchris the twelfth king: who, being more wicked than his Predeceffors, oppressed the Israelites most grievously, and continued eighteen years in A. M. 2503, his Tyranny, till an end was put to it in the Red Sea.

9. Above eight years had they vexed the Israelites with insupportable Burthens, notwithftanding which, they grew and increased exceedingly; nay, although Order was given to drown all the Male Children, left growing too numerous, they might in time of War joyn with their Enemies; else get them out of the Land with an high hand; or because of a Prediction mentioned by Josephus, that an Hebrew should be born, who was to afflict and overthrow the Hayptians. That the Jews lived amongst them, is ever acknowledged by their Historians, accounting it an Honour, as all Nations do, to have set forth Colonies. But to take away Disgrace, and to fave the Honour of their Country, (which to the Priests was ever most folemn) abominable Lies have been made, and strange Stories devised, concerning their first Coming into Egypt, and especially about their Departure: which briefly to relate seemeth agreeable enough to the Nature of our Design.

10. Martho, an Hegptian Prieft and Hiltorian, pretending to describe the Orie figure and spinal of the Jews, relateth, That in the days of one of their Kings, Timaus by name, Jophanilla. Less concerning the original of the Jews, relateth, That in the days of one of their Kings, Timaus by name, Jophanilla. Less concerning the original of the Jews, relateth, That in the days of one of their Kings, Timaus by name, Jophanilla. Less concerning the original of the Jews, as he himself interpreteth it) from the Eastern parts, with great Confidence interpreted in the Jews of the Jews vaded Egypt, which ealily obtaining without any Force of Arms, they burnt the City and Temple, and raged against the Natives with Sword and Servitude. At length they made them a King of their own Stock, named Saltis, who, coming down into the Country about Memphis, imposed a Tribute upon the upper and neather Province, and put Garrisons in convenient Places. Especially he took neather Province, and put Garrilons in convenient Places. Especially he took Care of the Eastern Coatts, being jealous of the Power of the Affyrians; 50 that in the Principality of Sais, Eastward from the River Bubasis, he built up a City called anciently Amaris, which fortifying with most throng Walls, he therein placed a Garrison of 240000 Men. When he had reigned nineteen years, he gave place to Beon, who governed 44, after him Apachus 36 with seven Moneths, then Apachus 61, Janiss 50, and one Moneth; then Assistance of the first Kings, they for oppressed, and endeavoured utterly to dedroy Reppt, and 51 years had they Power over it. Afterwards the Kings of the Province of Thebes, and the remaining part of Rivers fell on them with a great and lasting War and by a King named Alice. of Higgs fell on them with a great and lafting War, and by a King named Alisfragmuthofis, were they overcome, and driven up into a place containing the Quantity of 10000 Acres of Ground, called Avaris. The Son of this King, Themolis by niy of 10000 heres of Ground, caused Avarse. In es son of this king, Libersoft by Name, attempted the taking of this Place, befieged it with 480000 thousand Menjatut, delparing of Success, agreed with him, that leaving Aegys, they should go whither else they pleased; so that, departing with all their Goods, to the number of 240000 Persons, they travelled through the Desart into Syria, (for that they feared the Assignment, who then obtained the Empire of Assign and built them a City in the Country, afterwards called Judea, which might suffice for so many thousands, and canned in Tarablas. and named it Terufalem.

11. To this Hiltory taken out of the ancient Records, Manetho addeth, as he confesseth, fabulous Reports rise amongst the Vulgar, mixing with the Israelites a Multitude of Higyptians languishing with Leprosie and other Diseases; which he relateth, as having forgotten, that the Shepherds left Egypt 518 years before, as may be gathered from the Series of the Kings, and the Distance of time betwixt Themusis, who reigned when the Shepherds departed, and Amenophis, under whom the Lepers went out, the time of whose Reign neither dareth he to define; though he be exact, in the years of other Princes, as Josephus noteth. Now this Amerophis, forfooth, was told by a Priest of the same name. That he might see the Gods, if he would cleanse his Kingdom from Lepers, and other unclean Persons. He, being a very religious man, gathered all the infirm out of the Land, to the number of 80000, whom he fent with others to cut stones on the East of the River Nile; there being amongst them also some of the learned Priests infected with Leprosie. Because Favour was shewed towards them, the Priest, who would have had them destroyed, feared much the Displeasure of the gods, as well against himself as the king, and foreseeing they should have Power over Higgs for thirteen years, he durst not tell the King so much, but wrote a Book concerning the matter, and then killed himfelf; which caft the King (you must know) into a great Melancholy.

12. But being still desired to do something for the Security of the diseased People, he gave them Avaris, the City of the Shepherds, now not inhabited : whither being entred, and perceiving the place to be very advantagious for Rebellion, they made Choice of Ofarliphus, one of the Priests of Heliopolis, for their Captain, swearing to obey him in all things. He presently established for Law, that they should not worship the gods, nor abstain from such Creatures as were most sacred to the Hayptians; to marry with none but those that were tied to them by the same League and commanding many other things (especially such as he knew contrary to A. gyptian Cultoms) he prepared for War. Then fent he to the Shepherds at Jerufalem, formerly expelled by Themiss, to open their Condition to them, and to inwite them to give their Affiltance against Ægipt. The Shepherds readily closed, with the Motion, and all, to the number of 200000, marched down to Avaris. Amenophis much startled hereat, especially because of the Prediction of the Priest, committed his Son, but five years old, to a Friend; and, together with Apis and his other gods, went into Bithiopia, where he was received with all his Multitudes of Subjects, and was kindly entertained by the King, who made Provision for them for these thirteen years. The Solymitans, or Shepherds, with the unclean Multitude, made now great Havock of all things in Ægypt, burning Villages and Cities, and raging against the facred Animals with their Priests, whom they compelled to be their Butchers, and drave away naked; the forementioned Priest still giving Laws; and framing their Policy; who being from Ofiris the Heliopolitan-god called Ofarfiphus, now changed his Name into Moses. But at the end of the thirteen years. Amenophis returned with great Power out of Historia, and with the Affiltance of his Son Ramples, fell upon the Shepherds and unclean Multitude, whereof killing many; they purfued the rest as far as the Borders of Syria.

13. These ridiculous Lyes are much more augmented by others. Cheremon, who professed to write the History of Egypt, giveth the same name Amenophis to the King, and of Rhamesses to his Son; but addeth, that the Goddess Iss appeared to the former, complaining that her Temple was destroyed by War. That Phritipkanites a sacred Scribe, told the King, that if he would be freed from Terrours in the Night, he must purge Hegypt from polluted Men: he therefore gathered out 25000 diseased Persons, cast them out of his Borders: That the two Scribes Moses and Jo-Seph (the Highest Name of the former being Tilithes, and of the latter Petelephis) became their Leaders, and, coming to Pelnsium, found there 380000, which Amenophis having left behind would not convey into Ægypt: with those they struck up a League, and undertook an Expedition against the Land. Amenophis not expecting the Islue of their Attempt, fled into Athiopia, leaving his Wife big with Child, which lying hid in a Cave, brought forth a Son called Meffenes. He, when he came to age expelled the Jews, to the number of 200000 into Syria, and received back his Father Amenophis out of Ethiopia.

represent his 14. Lyfimachus an Historian, going beyond the other two in the malicious fee of his Lyes, wrote, that when Bocchoris reigned in Higgspt, the People of the Jews, infected with Leprofie, Scab, and other Diseases, resorted to the Temple to beg for their Living, and many being infected with this Difafe, Barrenness fell upon the Land. Bocchoris, sending to the Oracle of Ammon about it, received this Auswer, That the Temples were to be cleanfed from impure and prophane Persons, who were to be cast out into the Desart; but the Scabby and Leprous should be drowned; the Sun not enduring they should live; which being done, and the Temples purified, fruitfulness would be restored to the Earth. Bocchoris accordingly ordered the Priests to gather all the prophane out of the Temples, and give them up to Souldiers, who were to carry them into the Wilderness; and the Leprous and Scabby to be wrapped in Lead, and cast into the Sea; which being drowned accordingly, the other were exposed to perish in the Desart. But those, consulting for their own Safety, kept Fires that Night, and strict Watch; then, the day following, a solemn Fast to God for their Preservation. On the next, Counsel was given them by a certain Man named Moses, that they should march on in one Body, till they arrived at some good Soil. Then commanded he them to be kind to no man, to give bad Counsel rather than good, and overthrow the Temples of the Gods, as many as they should find; which being approved of, they travelled through the Defart, and after much Trouble, came to a fruitful Soil, where using the Inhabitants very injuriously, and rifling and burning the Temples, they arrived at length in that Country, fince called Judea, and building a City feated themselves there. This City was at first called Hierofyla, from the spoiling of the Temples; but afterwards, to shun the Disgrace of the Occasion, they changed it into Hierosolame. and took the name of Hierosolymitans.

15. Further than this; Apion a Grammarian of Alexandria, as he counterfeited Josephin lika. himself, but born in Oasis, a Town of Higgst, amongst several other Lyes against the counterfeited. Jews, wrote, that he had received from the eldelt of the Egyptians, how Mofes nem. was a Heliopolitan, and, being brought up according to the Cultoms of his Country, changed the Rites thereof at his own Pleasure: That he led the Leprous, Blind, and Lame, out of Ægypt; but fairly faith, it was in the first year of the seventh Olympiad, the same wherein Carthage was built by the Tyrians, which happened about 150 years after Hiram the King of Tyre (as appeareth out of the Phenician Annals) with whom Solomon was contemporary. He mentioned the same number of infirm Persons as Lysimachus, but addeth a Reason why the Sabbath was so called. Travelling six days together, saith he, on the seventh day they rested in Judea, for that they were forely plagued with Ulcers in their privy parts, and named it Sabboth, from the Ægyptian Word Sabbatofis, which fignifieth that Disease. Notwithstanding that he saith they finished their Journey in fix days, yet he further writeth, that Mofes hid himself for forty days upon the Mount Sinai (which lyeth betwixt Hegypt and Arabia) whence coming down, he gave Laws unto the Jews. As for the Temile Religion, he was not ashamed to write, that in their Temple was fet the head of an Asse made of Gold, and of great Value, which being there worshipped, was taken thence when Antiochus Epiphanes spoiled the Place.

16. Such Absurdities were delivered by the Egyptians, and those who out of desire to gratise them, have, after their Example, endeavoured to conceal the Truth; to which Josephus in his two Books against Apion, hath abundantly answered. Several Reasons have moved them to corrupt their Original Records. The Israelites growing great in that Country, out of it they returned to the promised Land by the stretched out Arm of God, to the great Reproach of their cruel and imperious Lords. The Difference of Religion railed also betwixt the two Nations (as betwixt the Jews and the whole World) mortal Enmity, whilft the one worthipped the only true God, and the base and degenerate Spirit of the other fell (4) As Diddidown to things far inferiour to themselves; which Difference some (though but rus siculus is few) Persons discerning, were ambitious to become Proselytes to the Jewish Do- Eclog. Ilb. 34ctrine: Hence again arole such Envy, that some descended to that Indiscretion and Tacing His. Weakness, as to contradict their own most ancient and authentick Writers. The lib. 5 ad inition-bred Blindness of men's Minds, increased by Education, hath so far prevailed, and Julia lib. that the (a) greatest part of Heathen Writers have in this Contention sided with the (b) Strabolik. Heyptians, (otherwise contemptible enough in their Eyes) and subscribed to what 16.p. 761. they have faid concerning the Original of the Jewish Nation; though some (b) have lib. 371 not given Credit to fuch Reports.

17. As Manetho erreth in the Cause of the Departure of the Jews out of Egipt. so also in the time thereof, though not so groffely as his Friend Apion. Manetho nameth the King Themuss, by whom they were expelled: Who, if the same with Amosis, he lived 230 years before their true Departure; and that he is the same appeareth by Manetho's Catalogue, taken out of Josephus. But (to go on with the Story of the Kings) Themulis reigned, according to Manetho, 25 years and four Moneths after their Expulsion. Chebron his Son succeeded him, and reigned thirteen years; next him, Amenophis 20 with feven Moneths; his Sifter Amesses two, and nine Moneths. Mephres followed her, and continued twelve years and nine Moneths; him Mephramutholis, who reigned 25, and ten Moneths; then Themolis nine, and eight Moneths, Amenophis thirty, and ten Moneths; Orus 36, and five Moneths. His Daughter Acencheres reigned ten years and one Moneth, Rathotis her Brother nine years; Acencheres twelve, and five Moneths; another of that Name twelve, and three Moneths; Armais four, and one Moneth; Armesis one, and four Moneths; Armesses Miamun fixty fix, and two Moneths; and lastly Amenophis nineteen, and fix Moneths. In whose time one who, forsaking Ensebius, followeth Manetho, in ranking those Kings holdeth the Israelites to have departed Ægypt, and confequently will have this King drowned in the Sea. That Ramefes Miamun was he who first began to afflict the * Ufferius At-Israelites, the length of his Reign (as * one supposeth) maketh probable; whose ad A.M. 2427. Name also seemeth to him to have given Appellation to one of the Cities, in build 2494. ing of which they were employed.

18. After Amenophis reigned Setholis, who having great Forces both by Land Manetho apad and Sea, left his Brother Armais Deputy of Egypt, and forbidding him the Diadem Josephum I. I. Strholis or A. and medling with his Wife or Concubines, undertook an Expedition against Cyprus nem. and Phanicia, and then against the Affyrians and Medes, all which he brought un- A. M. 24221 der, either by the Sword or the Terror of his name, whereby, elevated in his mind, he confidently marched up and down the East Countries, overrunning the Cities and States thereof at his Pleasure. Much time being herein spent, his Brother in the mean while acted all things in Ægypt contrary to his Injunctions, by the Advice of his Friends, affuming the Diadem and rebelling. Of this the Chief-Priest secretly gave him Intelligence, so that hasting back to Pelnsum, he recovered his Kingdom. Manetho addeth, that this Sethosis was also called Egyptus, (from whence the Country took the Name of Egypt) and this his Brother Armais had also the Appellation of Danaus. If so; then Amenophis, who was swllowed up of the Sea, must be taken for Belus, the Father of Higyptus and Danaus according to the Greeks, who not being confounded with the Father of Ninus (as by Mythologists he is wont to be) is faid to have lived 322 years before the Destruction of Troy, which account Learned User judgeth fitly to agree with the time of Amenophis. He also thinketh Ramesses Miamun to be Neptune, Mia coming hear to, and therefore seemeth to be derived from, Moy; which in the ancient Egyptian Language, according to Josephus, fignifieth Water. Neptune is faid also to be Father of Bulleris. who at this time tyrannizing about the River Nile, cruelly flew fuch Strangers as came near him. Such a Son indeed was worthy of so cruel a Father as Ramesses Miamun; and it seemeth likely enough, that the Story of Bushris might be taken from his and his Sons Cruelty to the Ifraelites, and so the thing may well enough Amenophis his be applied to Amenophis. Further, if we observe what * another tellethus, that the * A. 19. Now, to joyn this Story of the Egyptians with that of the Greeks, (whom yet the other complain of, as corrupting their Antiquities) Apollodorus writeth, how Lib. 2. Neptune, on Lybia the Daughter of Epaphas (who being the Son of Telegomus, and What the form to the fecond Daughter to Jass King of Argos, built Memphis, as some say, and concerning so reigned in the lower part of Egypt) begat two Sons Belus and Agenor, whereof the latter went into Phenicia, and there reigned. Belus obtained Ægypt, and of Anchinoe the Daughter of Nilus begot Mgppus and Danaus. He fent Danaus to inhabit Africk or Lybia (so called from his Mother; and after Mgppus had subdued the Country of the Melampodi, or Black-feet, named it Ægypt after himself, which according to Eusebius, was formerly called Aeria, and, according to others, Petamitis. But he whom Maneth, in Josephus, calleth Sesothis, seemeth to be the same with Diodorus his Sejoofus, and Sejofiris of Herodorus, concerning whom both of them record (as Manetho hath done) very admirable things. Agreeable to what Manetho delivereth of Sesothis, Herodotus writeth, that Sesostris subdued many Lib. 2.

His Conquells. Nations. (a) Diodorus faith, that Sesossis conquered Arabia and Libia before his 6 102, &c. Father's Death, and afterwards, having a great Ambition to do as much by all the 1,24,8c. World, first secured the Affections of his Subjects at home (to keep him in Obedience) by his Clemency and Bounty. Then with an Army of 600000 Foot, 24000 Horfe, and 27000 Chariots, he fet upon the Æthiopians, towards the South, whom having conquered, he compelled to pay a Tribute of Ebonie, Ivory, and Gold. With a Navy of 400 Ships sent into the Red Sea, he subdued all the maritime Coasts, as far as India; he himself with a Land-Army overrunning not only these parts of Asia which afterwards Alexander Subdued, but beyond Ganges all as far as the Ocean it self.

20. After this, he conquered the Nations of Scothia as far as the River Tanais (which severeth Asia from Europe) and left some of his Ægyptians to make a Plantation by the Lake Maotis, that gave original to the Nation of the Colchi, which the Egyptians supposed they sufficiently proved to be their Colonie from the Use of Circumcision, imagining that the Jews had also this Rite from Them. Finally all Asia he subdued, with most of the Islands Cyclades; but then passing over into Enrope, was in danger of lofing his Army for want of Provisions, and by the Difficulty of Places: therefore in Thrace he put Bounds to his Expedition, having in all Places erected Pillars, wherein was written his Success; and where he found Courage, he caused a Member of a Man to be ingraven, but where he met with Cowardife that of a Woman. At Length, after nine years, he returned home with much Spoil, where he refreshed, and rewarded his victorious Army. Here he was not idle, but set himself to such Works as he thought might eternize his Name; wherein he employed none of his natural Subjects, but the Cap tives he had brought with him. This the Babylonians not enduring, brake out into Rebellion, and, for-tifying a place near the River, held it out in Defpight of him, till at last by Com-position they enjoyed a Seat, which they called Babylon, in Remembrance of their own Country. He raised up great heaps of Stones and Earth, and to them removed fuch Cities, as by Reason of the Lowness of their Situation, were obnoxious to Inundations from the River: yet, lest there should be want of Water, and for Convenience of Trade, he caused Rivolets to be digg ed troughout the Land; he also fortified the Country by a Wall on the East, and otherwise provided against InvaHis Pride.

21. For an Ostentation of his Greatness, he caused such, as being subdued held their Kingdoms of him, or had received new Principalities at his hand, at certain times to come down with their Presents, whom he otherwise used with much Respect: but being to go to the Temple, or enter the City, he would loose his Horfes out of his Chariot, and be drawn by four of these Princes. At Length, having excelled all men in Conquests, and other Royal Atchievements, he fell blind, and killed himself when he had reigned 33 years; for which Act he was the more admired by the Ægyptians. These amongst other things are reported of Sesostris, before whole Statue many years after Darius, the Son of Hyflaper cauling his own to be erected, the chief Priest contradicted it, alleadging that Darius had not yet excelled Sefostris in honourable Actions; with which Freedom the King was well pleased, Satisfit, or St. and faid, if he lived, he would labour to come no whit short of him. His Son succceded him, of the same Name and Missortune in the Loss of his Sight, which to recover, he was bid by an Oracle to wash his Eyes in the Urine of some Woman which never knew any other man than her own Hulband. Beginning with that of his own Wife, he proceeded to make Tryal of the Honesty of many others, but found none effectual to the Cure, but the Wife of a certain Gardiner, which Woman he then married, and burnt all the reft. Many after him followed in Order till one Attilants Hing Arnelis came to the Government, who by his Tyranny made way for Attilanes, the King of Æthiopia. He using his Power with Moderation, put no Malesactor to Death, but, cutting off their Nofes, fent them away into the Confines of Ægypt and Spria, where he built them a City, called from the Maimedness of the Inhabitants Rhinocolura, which was destitute of all forts of Provisions through the Barrenness, and Unhealthfulness of the Place. The Soil he chose on Purpose, that they might be diverted from idle, and vitious Courses, by anxious and effectual Care for a Livelyhood, which they got by a Trade of Fishing in the adjoyning Sea. 22. After his Death the High prians recovered the Sovereignty, and created a King of their own Nation, called Mendes. He spent his Life in making Provision for Mendes.

Death by a Sepulchre inimitable for Art, which he made under the Notion of a Labyrinth; according to which Pattern they believed Dedalus to have framed that he made for Minos King of Crete, wherein to keep the Minotaure. After Mendes an Anarchy followed for a long time, till one of ignoble Extraction was made King; by the Algorians named Cetes, but by the Greeks Protens, who living in the time of the Trojan War, had great Skill in Aftrology, and the Knowledge of Winds; whence, and because the Kings of Ægypt were wont to have several kinds of living Creatures, Trees, Fire, and other things painted, and worn about their Heads, the Greeks took Occasion to invent that Fable of his Turning himself into all manner of Shapes. Remphis his Son, and Successor, spent his time in the Improvement of his Revenue and Customes, infomuch that he died far richer than any of his Predecellors, having got together 400000 Talents of Gold and Silver. The next who was any thing confiderable, was Nileus, who because he took great Care about bringing Water from the River to furnish the Country, changed the name of it from Remphis.

Nileus, from whom the Nileans named.

C'ammis first

Ægypt into Nile. 23. The 8th from Nileus was Chemmis, who being born at Memphis reigned fifty Diodorus. years, and built the greatest of the three Pyramids, counted amongst the seven Wonders of the World. Herodotus writeth that the first King who gave his Mind to this Work was Cheops, and that he profittuted his Daughter to raise Money for this Purpose: That the biggest was twenty years in building by no sewer than 100000 Work-men, towards the Diet of whom the Price of Onions and Garlick only, amounted to 1600 Talents of Silver: That his Daughter, of every one who had to do with her begged a Stone, and therewith built a little Pyramid near adjoyning. Diodorus writeth that the Basis of the greatest, was on each side 700 Foot vide Phocium broad, the height above 600 Foot, and at the Top it was fix Cubits broad, all lib. 36.6.22. of folid Stone very hard, and of an everlasting Substance, which he proveth, for that the whole Structure in his time remained unchanged and uncorrupted, though raifed 1000 years before. But others which within this hundred years have travelled into Heypt relate how those monstrous Buildings which stand 13 Miles off from Memphis, and look like Mountains at a Distance, are on the North-side much eaten, and confumed with that Wind; the Etesian Winds being there as much putrifying as the Southern in other Parts. These Piles of Stone stand in a fandy Place which affordeth not any Quarries of Stone, some five Miles distant from the Nile, so that the Work may well seem right miraculous, though the Ægyptians raised many Fables thereupon. But so many thousands of men were to be killed with this Toil that one might be stately buried; which yet they say happed not to him: For the People

People were fo enraged hereat, that his Son durst not there bury him, but laid him in another obscure and ignoble place. And yet he could not contain himself, but to his Power must also imitate his Father's Madness.

Cephren.

24. Cephren the Brother of Chemmis succeeded him, and reigned 56 years, though Herodoines. fome would have his Son Chabry's immediately to have followed him. He spent pioders. his time the same way, building another Pyramid in Workmanship like to the former, but much inferiour to it in Compass and Largeness; being also buried in an obscure place for Fear of the Rage of the Multitude. After Cephren followed Mycerinus (or Myckerinus) the Son of Chemnis, or Cheops, of whom the Agyptians made great Account, because he reformed much amis in his Father's and Uncle's Days. He also built a Pyramid less than the other, but in Excellency of Workmanship far excelling them. One Bocchoris succeeded next, according to Diodorus; in Body contemptible, but for Endowments of mind going beyond all his Predecessors. Then, after a long time came in Sabacon the Æthiopian, and reigned in Hegypt. But Herodotus writeth that Asychio succeeded Mycerinus, and built a Pyramid of Brick; then followed Anysis, who being blind, in his time Sabacus, or Sabacon, invaded Ægypt, and drove him into the Fens, where he hid himself: but Africanus relateth that Sabacon took Bocchoris alive, and burning him quick, reigned in his Stead eight years. This Cruelty is little agreeable to that Humanity which Herodotus ascribeth to him, viz. that he put no Malefactor to Death; but, according to the Degree of Guilt, imposed upon every one the Carriage of so much Earth to the Place where he dwelt; and hereby the Towns were made much higher, and less subject to Inundations at the time of the overflowing of the River. His Piety is much commended; for being told by one of the gods, that if he would reign quietly in Ægpt he must cut off all the Priests by the Middle, he made Choice rather to quit his Interest in the Kingdom, and the Possession thereof, than to hazard. the Quiet of it, or commit such an Act of Cruelty. He is thought by some to be the same with Soo, King of Higypt, who combined with Hoshea of Israel against Sal-

Sathon.

25. After his Departure Herodotus brings the blind man out of his lurking Hole, where he had now lien fifty years, and maketh him to have recovered the Kingdom. More likely it is that Sathon the Priest of Vulcan succeeded him, thought to be Senechus his Son, whom Africanus placeth after him; and it may feem probable enough that if he forfook the Kingdom himfelf, yet he might leave his Son in the Government. This Sathon (or Sethon) wholely devoted to his Superstition negle-cted Military men, and therefore, when Senacherib King of Assyria invaded Hegypt, was quite forfaken by them; yet he is faid, by his Importunity fo far to have prevailed with his god, that pitching his Tents at Pelusium, the Mice did eat the Thongs of the Affyrian Targets, and the Horse-Bridles, so that his Enemies were rendred incapable of fighting; and, confounded with Fear at fo strange an Accident, retreated. By placing his Egyptian Souldiers in the lest Wing of his Army, he gave them such Distaste, that disdaining Strangers should have the chief Place, 200000 forfook him, and do what he could, departing into Æthiopia, there feated themselves, He, first of all Egyptian Princes, invited the Greeks, and others to trade in his Dominions, from which they had been formerly discouraged, either by the feverity of his Predecessors, or by giving Credit to the Fable of Eufebing, and was fucceeded by his Son Pfammis or Pfammetichus, who after he had (c) Lac. 159. Pharob-Hopbra, reigned fix years made an Expedition into Athiopia and died. Him followed Apries 16. M. 3395. his Son, called in Scripture Pharoh Hophra and Vaphres, who invading Phænicia, v. c. 145. made War by Land upon Sidon. He fought a Battel at Sea with the Tyrians, whom Joahimi 4. overthrowing, and returning home with great Spoil, he was fo far puffed up, as to perswade himself that no God could deprive him of his Kingdom; so strongly did he think he had established it. But making War upon the Cyreneans, he received from them a great Overthrow, and the Souldiers thereupon mutined against him, as having wilfully exposed them unto Danger. To appeale them, he fent one Amasis, A. M. 3426. whom they prefently chose for their King, and he after some Pause accepted their Mbschad 30.

Allyagis 15. Offer. Apries fled, but after some time was taken, and by Amasis delivered up to his Subjects, who strangled him, having reigned fix years.

27. With this Report of Herodotus agreeth Diodorus Siculus his Story, relating how Apries vanquished the Csprians and Phanicians in a Sea-fight, took by Force and demolished Sidon, wan the other Towns of Phanicia, with the Isle of Cyprus, and finally perished, as is before rehearsed, when he had reigned 22 years. But others of late confidering the more fure Testimony of Scripture, and how Ægypt was promised to Nebuchadnesar * as Wages for the Service he had done against Tyre; how Extl. 29. 18, Pharob Hophra delivered into the hands of his Enemies as Zedekiah had been; re 44. folve that the Ægyptian Priests notably deluded those Historians, hiding the Disgrace and Bondage of their Nation. Therefore it is thought fit rather to believe the Report of Fosephus, that Nebuchadnesar in the 23th year of his Reign, and the fifth after the Destruction of Jerusalem conquered Ægspt; killed the King thereof, and appointed another in his Stead. Some think Amasis might be used as an Instrument by Nebuchadnesar, and for that was made Governour by him; others, that the Deputy, or Vice-Roy, which he had set over the Land was slain by Amafis. Agreeable to this latter Opinion, the Army of Ionians and Carians are held to have been none other than the Garrisons of Mercenaries left by the Assirian, for the Guard of his Viceroy, and Custody of this his new subdued Province: as likewise the Company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who, together with the Friends of fuch as were flain in that Expedition, deposed, and flue Apries, are conceived to have been the Ægyptian Fugitives, which then recovered their own Country, feeing that of the Prophet was verified: At the end of forty years will I gather the Ægyp-tians from the Poople where they were scattered, and I will bring again the Capiteity of Ægypt, and will cause them to return into the Land of Pathros, into the Land of their Habitation, and they shall be there a small Kingdom.

28. Amalis being a man of mean Extraction, and perceiving himself upon that Haradottes Account, despised of his People, took a Golden Vessel wherein he and his Guests had used to wash their Feet, and thereof made an Image of a God, which when the Higyptians worshipped with great Reverence, he called them together, and comparing his Original with the former Use of the Gold, convinced them of that equal Reverence which the Change of both ought to beget in them. Under him the Ægyptians boasted that their Country was most happy, no fewer than 1020 Towns of good Note flourishing therein, in his days. He made a Law that all men should yearly give Account how they lived, which if they could not prove to be by some honest Calling, they were to be punished with Death; and this, Solon is said to have translated to Athens. He being the first of all others that took Cyprus, reigned 54 or 55 years. It seemeth probable enough that he revolted from Cyrus, being before tributary to the Babylonian Empire (though the Priests hid this amongst other things from Herodotus and others;) and that this was the chief Cause, whatever is pretended, why Cambyles came down and conquered his Kingdom. This was not A. M. 3480accomplified in his time, he dying in Preparation for the War. But his Son Pfan. V. C. 229. menitus succeeding him lost all, and so Ægypt became a Province of the Persian Campis. 5. to the Tragedy of Cambyfes, are to be referred to a more proper Place.

29. The Ægyptians, accounting themselves the most ancient of all Nations, were The Kingdom not wanting indeed of many Reasons to witness their Antiquity, although their of Leppe very Pride transported them beyond the true Epoche of their Original. The Scripture it felf witnesseth Ægypt to have been a mighty Kingdom, every way better replenished than any other Country that we can read of, in so ancient times: in the days of Abraham it was a flourishing Kingdom, and the Ifraelites were not a People till such time as the Egyptians were one of the most flourishing Nations upon Earth. The Ethiopians concluded themselves more ancient, because Algypt, as they thought. was of old a Sea or Lake, ancient Writers being of Opinion, that it was the Gift Ephorus apad of the River Nile, which having once contained within it felf all the Compaß of Diodorum l. They urge, that in 65 mill between the yearly Inundations of the Nile much Mud is left and flicks Immoveable; that in 1.6.14 the Mountains of Egypt the Shells of Fishes are found; that the Springs and Wells Strabo. 1. 12. there digged, afford Water of a brackish Taste, as if the Reliques of Sea-water yet Photo in Side. remained in the Earth. And as for Pharm, in the Trojan times it was missiled, a distant from Canobis, where Menelass is thought to have arrived, but 120 Furlongs; 6.5 80. and therefore could not be a Day and Nights Sail from Ægypt, as Homer wrote by 1.4.6.24. Offers they arow to have biodoras l. i. been the true Backbu or Dionylus, in whose Mysteries Orpheus the Poet being ini - 14-8c. tiated whilst he sojourned in Egypt, when he was afterwards kindly entertained at Thebes in Beotia, to gratifie them of that Place; raised a Fable of his being born there, and begotten by Jupiter on Semele the Daughter of Cadmus, a certain Bastard having at that time been born of her, and fathered upon Jupiter. Isis the Sister and Wife of Ofiris, they affirm to be the true Ceres. Hercules was an Algyptian, not born immediately before the Trojan War, but in the most ancient time, even at the Beginning of Mankind, to which Season the Wearing of a Club and Lion's skin was most congruous, when Clothes were not as yet found out; as also his cleansing the Country of Monsters and wild Beasts, at that time, the Earth being but inhabited in a scattered manner. Apollo in like fort was no other than Orms, who was taught the Arts of Prophefying and Healing, by his Mother Is. As to this Controversie, is observable the Incertainty of the names of those heathenish Vanities, the same being to some Iss, to others Ceres, and to others Themophoris, (or, the In-The incertain ventor of Laws) to others Juno, to others the Moon, and to some all those Names ty of the Heater are one. Ofiris in like manner, is now taken for Serapis, then for Dionysus, otherwhiles for Pluto; sometimes for Ammon and Jupiter, and not seldome thought to be Pan, as Diodorus hath observed.

Danaus out of Hegypt peopled Argos the (almost) ancientest City of Greece. The Nation of the Colchi and the Jews they prove theirs by Original, from the Rite of Circumcisson. Cadmus and Phanix his Brother they report to have been Natives of their Egyptian Thebes, whence the former translated the name of that City into Greece : but Agenor his Father, as is believed, (being the Brother of Belus, and uncle to Egyptus and Danaus) came thence into Pienicia, then have they further Occasion to boast of a Colony led by him into that maritime Tract. The Athenians they prove to have been a Colony, led by Cecrops from Sais in Ægypt, for that they alone called their City Aftu, from a Place io named in their Country, and because the Members of their Common-wealth were distinguished into three Ranks; of Noblemen, who only were capable of Honours as the Ægyptian Priests; Country-men who bare Arms agreeable to that fort of People in Ægypt, who being called Husbandmen, afforded Souldiers for the Wars; lastly, Artificers, exercifing manual and common Arts, which fitly answereth to the Custom of that place. Besides Cecrops, Petes the Father of Mnestbeus and Erictbeus were of the Egyptian Extraction; of whom the latter carrying great Store of Corn out of Egypt to Athens, thereby obtained the Kingdom, and gave Occasion to the Story that Ceres at that time came into Greece.

They also used anigmatical Compositions or Mixtures of Images; as, by a Scepter with an Eye, and an Ear at the Top thereof, they signified the Sovereign and all-knowing Majesty of God. As for Astronomy, though the Babylonians, for the Antiquity of their Knowledge therein, had no Need to give them place, yet were the Egyptians furthered in the due Observation of the Stars, by the Plainness and Evenness of their Ground, and the Serenity of the Air; it never raining in Ægpt in ordinary Course of Nature, which Defect is supplyed by the yearly overflowing of the River. If the World be bounden to them for Geometry, it's to be ascribed also to their River, as another Fruit of its Inundation, whereby washing away the Marks, and removing the Fences of their particular Lands, they were forced every year to measure them over again, and thence, through Necessity, driven to Mathematical Speculations. 35. The most ancient Government of Egypt, though Monarchical, yet left not Princes to the Liberty of their own Wills, which were reftrained by the Laws and Customs that had such Authority over their private and domestick. Actions that they could not exceed the Bounds of Temperance and Moderation prescribed to then thereby. For no Slaves were they suffered to entertain, which might prove Instruments for Debauchery, but were attended by the Sons of the most noble Priests. excellently educated. Their Hours, both Night and Day, were deftined and fee over to particular Businesses. In the Morning when first awake, Letters were brought in to them; that, having perfect Intelligence, they might be better able to provide for the publick Safety. When washed and royally apparelled they sacrificed; during which Devotion the chief Priefts prayed for them, and their Subjects extolled their Virtues, curling at last their Sins of Ignorance, committed without their Faults, and reflecting upon their Advisors and Councellors. Then did the Priefts read out of the Records, famous Prefidents of Council, or Action performed by their most illustrious Predecessors, which were to them proposed as Copies to take out. Their time was prescribed, not only of speaking to the People, and diftributing Justice, but also of walking, washing, and other more secret Imployments. Their Diet was very moderate: usually Veal and Goose, with a moderate Quantity of Wine, as if ordered by an exact Physician. No Liberty was there of punishing any man in Passion, or choler, either of acting any otherwise unjustly; every Case being determined by the Laws. Yet neither did they hereby account themfelves straitned of true Liberty, but rather happy in that they indulged not their Appetites like other men. Hereby obtained they the Love of their Subjects, who held them more dear, alive, or dead, than their own Relations, and the Government continued for many Generations, as long as they submitted to those Rules and Orders.

The Divisions of the Land, and its Inha-bitants.

36. Sesossis, or Sesostris, divided Ægjpt into 36 Nonii, which word, whether Diodorus 118. Greek or Repptian, lignified several Cities with certain Villages and Grounds there- Strato l. 12. to belonging. Of these, 10 belonged to the Province of Thebes, or to Thebais, other ten to Delta, and the rest to the Midland Countries lying betwixt them; all arises occwhich had their feveral Nomarche, or Governours, who ruled them, and took Care of the Kings Tributes. The Lands were divided into three Portions, where Diodorus. of the first belonged to the Priests, who were in great Authority, and high Esteem with the People. Of their Revenues they maintained Sacrifices throughout the Land, and their own Families; being exempted from all Burthens and Impositions. They were chief Councellors to the Kings, always affilting with their Advice, judging of things out of their deep Skill in Aftrology, and suggesting us ful matter out of the Records; their Function hereditarily descended upon their Children. The fecond Portion of Land belonged to the Kings, by which they maintained their State. waged War, rewarded deferving Persons, and which affording them sufficient Treafure, they burthened not their Subjects by any Taxes. The third Portion belonged to the Souldiers, who were at all Occasions ready for the War; it seeming reafonable that fuch as ventured their Lives for the Safety of their Country should be well rewarded; and good Policy not to commit the Safeguard thereof to any that had nothing dear, or precious in it: and hereby they were encouraged to be careful in Behoof of their Posterity, which succeeded them in their Possessions. As for the rest of the People, they were divided into three Ranks, or Orders, viz. Shepheards, Husbandmen, (that farmed the Grounds,) and Artificers; who all attending their Bulinels, and not medling with State-Affairs, neither having any Right to Offices, thereby the more improved their Arts, and faved the Commonwealth harmless from fuch Distempers, as are bred by the Violence of an heady, and ignorant Multitude.

The Courts of 37. Their Courts of Justice were furnished with the most upright, and able men Justice. that could be procured. Thirty Judges were chosen from Heliopolis (or On.) Thebes and Memphis, each of them 10. Which Assembly would not give place, either to that of the Areopagues at Athens, or the Senate at Lacedemon. One of these thirty being chosen President, the City for which he served made choice of another to six in his Place. All had Maintenance from the King; but the President in larger Proportion: who also wore about his neck, in a Chain of Gold, an image of Truth made of precious ftones, as a badge of his Office. When they were fate, and the Codes, wherein the Laws were contained, laid before them; then the Plaintiff exhibited his Bill of the Crime, the Manner of it, and the Estimate of the dammage. The Defendant having a Copy of the Bill, answered particularly to it, either that he did not the thing, committed no Crime in doing it, or else had not deserved so great a Punishment. The Plaintiff had liberty to reply, and the other to rejoyn his Answer; but after this, the 30 proceeded to Judgment, and the President set the Image of Truth towards one of the Parties. No Lawyers were suffered to plead, as being thought rather to cast a mist upon the Cause, and darken the Evidence.

38. As for particular Laws; Perjury was punished with Death, as a great Offence, both against God and man. If one man suffered another to be murdered in the High-way, or undergo any other Violence, without giving his Affiltance, he was to dye for it; and if he could give him no help, he was bound to discover the Robber, and follow the Law against him, under pain of enduring a certain number of strokes, and being deprived of all sustenance for three dayes. False Accusers underwent the Punishment due to that Fault they accused of. Every one was bound to give in an account to the Magistrate how he lived, under pain of Death; which Law was made by Amass. Wilful Murder, either of Bond or Free, was Death; onely this Law took no hold on Parents; but fuch were constrained to continue three dayes embracing the Carkasses. Against Children who killed their Parents, most exquisite Punishment was devised: For, having first their Flesh all cut and flashed, and then being laid upon Thorns, they were burnt quick. Women condemned were not executed before their Delivery. For other Laws not-Capital, it was enacted that Souldiers running away from their Colours, or disobeying their Officers, should not dye, but be branded with Infamy, as a means to excite them to regain their former credit. If any held Intelligence with the Enemy, his Tongue was to be cut out of his head. They that imbafed the Coin, used new weights, counterfeited Seals; Clerks that fallified and forged Records, were to lose their hands. Ravishment of a Free-woman was punished with the loss of the Members. Adultery of the man, with a thousand strokes with a Rod 3 of the Woman, with the loss of her Nose.

39. Bocchoris enacted, that he who denied the borrowing of any money, should be absolved upon his Oath; which was accounted as a sufficient Purgation; a mans Credit being so much therein concerned. Usury upon Bond was not to exceed the double of the Principal; for which it was lawful to diffrain the Goods, but in no wife to meddle with the Person of the Debtor, that was owing to his Countrey, and not due to his Creditor; especially if a Souldier, the common Safety suffering in him. Upon this account, they were wont to fcoff at the Law-givers of Greece, who forbad the seizing upon Plows, Weapons, and other things, but suffered those that should use them to be carried away, and imprisoned. For stealing, they had a peculiar Law: Every Thief entred his name with the Chief of that Mystery; and when he had stoln any thing carried it streight to him, where, if any one could tell the time and place, and prove it by certain tokens to be his, he was to pay the fourth part of the value, and receive it again; the Law-giver thinking this the best remedy against what otherwise could not be prevented

40. The first man that gave Laws to the Ægyptians, was Mnevis, perswading the People to receive them, because they were communicated to him by Mercury. The fecond was Safyches, who, amongst other Laws, instituted those concerning Religion; and, being a man of great Learning, taught Geometry and Altronomy. 3. 41. As for particular Customs. The Ægyptians married as many Wives as they pleafed (Posterity being with them a thing of greatest consequence) except the Priests, who were allowed but one apiece. Children born of Bond-women, and Free, were alike respected, and equally legitimate, the Father by them being only accounted the Author of Generation, the Mother affording but Place and Nourishment to the Child; in which respect also, contrary to the Custom of other Nations, those Trees that bare Fruit they accounted Males, and the barren ones Females. Their Children they educated exceeding hardly, the Expence of bringing one up not exceeding twenty Drachms. Each Child forceeded his Father in his Trade, or Course of Life. All sorts had some kind of Learning, especially such as conduced to their Callings. Musick was neglected by them, as rendring men effeminate. Once a Moneth they used to purge, or use some medicinal Course for their Health. With them no Physician was found (as Herodotus writeth) who professed the Art of curing the whole Body; but one was for the Head alone, another for the Eyes, and to for the other Parts: all which yet, as Diodorus hath it, were maintained of the publick, and bound to observe Methods, and Medicines prescribed them in Books; which if they altered or changed, upon the Miscarriage of the Patient they forseited their Lives, together with their Credit.

HE most ancient common name of the Inhabitants of this Country is more agreeable to the Roman Appellations of Graii, Graci, and Graingene, than that whereby they have rather chosen to call themselves, viz. Hellenes. For, till * fuch time as Hellen, the Son of Dencalion reigned Helleres. For, this tuch time as rieuen, the son of Dencauon reigned in Theffaly, which happed some years after the Dencalionean Deluge, no such name the total. as the latter was known. But though in Homer's time the whole Nation might begin to be called Hellenes, and the Country Hellas; yet clear it is from many Witnesses, that these names came out of Thessalie, and were thence transferred to fignifie the whole Nation, and their Colonies placed elsewhere; insomuch, that priding themselves, as it were, in it, they wholly rejected the other of Greci (which, signifying ancient, as feemeth, they had also out of Theffalie from the same People) who were afterwards called Hellenes; though the Poets despise it not, as Callimachus, Sophocles, and others; and the Latins still retain it, taking no notice of the other in their Language, whence these words Greece and Gracians are derived.

The most anone upon a-nother.

2. Greece was not anciently inhabited in any fetled or established way, though Thursd. in after Ages it became so famous in it's flourishing Commonwealths. Seats and Hacient Gradeli- bitations were often changed, according to the Power and Strength of fuch as were not fatisfied with their own Fortune. No Commerce was there amongst them, being in continual Fear one of another: they lived only from Hand to Mouth, not regarding Money, or the Improvement of their Grounds, knowing not how long they should enjoy any thing in present Possessions; so that no considerable City was there, or any Fortifications of Value. Attica indeed was something privileged by its Barrenness, and secured from such violent Attempts as other parts were obnoxious to; whence such as were disturbed elsewhere, flocked thither, and it grew so populous, that not able to maintain the great Numbers, under which it groaned, it poured out Colonies into Afia the less, which made up the Body of Ionians. Before the Trojan War, nothing confiderable was done abroad by the Gracians; but at that time having got some Power at Sea, they were rendered capable of that Expedition. tiothing con- For Minos King of Crete, (whom Thucydides would make to have had the first and most A M. 2773.

And to increase his Customs he scoured the Seas of Pyrats; it being then the Trade of those that lived upon the Coasts to passover and make Prev one of another; which to the last could not be left by some, as the Ætolians and Acarnanians amongst others. 3. The Sea being cleared, Cities began to be built upon the Coast both for Trade and Security, whereas the most ancient Towns stood at a good Distance from Cities begin to the Sea, both in the Continent and Islands. Then came it to pass, that the weaker fubmitting themselves to the more powerful for matter of Profit, or the strong hand procuring it from them, some new and considerable Principalities were erected. which rendred them fit for the Expedition against Troy; wherein Agamemnon præfided, as the most powerful Prince then reigning, especially at Sea. Ten years being confumed in this War, great Alterations were thereby produced in Greece. For through their Absence so long abroad, Seditions and Tumults arose at Home; whence many at their Return, or afterwards, were forced to seek Great Changes out new Habitations. A long time it was, e're the Country returned to Quietness caused at home and Settlement; but at Length, it was enabled to send out Colonies, as the Athenilong Absence ans into Ionia and the Islands of the Greek Sea, the Peloponnesians, and some other Cities into Italy, and Sicily. The Nation now growing stronger and wealthier daily, Tyrannies or petty Kingdoms were erected in every place, there being now a Possibility of raising Revenues; and as any exceeded others in Power and Cunning, they invaded the Governments of others, which they made arbitrary; whereas before Kingdoms were hereditary, with a constant limited Power, that they sel-

Great Commodity all these obtained by the Power of their Navies, either in getting Money, or new Poffestions, for they subdued the Islands, such especially labouring herein, whose native Soils afforded least Advantage. By Land no War arose that gave any sufficient Advantage of inlarging their Dominions further, than to the Disturbance of their next Neighbours; they stirred not abroad nor gave their Minds to any new Conquests. Those that were Subjects, were patient under the Yoak, and Equalls in Power made no confiderable Quarrels, till all Greece come to be divided in the old War, betwixt the Inhabitants of Chalcie and Eretria. Then, to hinder them from growing great, the Affairs of the Persians were advanced; till having cast out their Tyrants, (who all this while contenting themselves with the private Power they had over particular Places, stirred not) they got Ground by little and little of the Eaftern Empire. Almost during this whole Period had they no written Laws, Josephannia, Applon. 1. 2. Homer being witness, who never useth the word Law throughout his Writings. They were not generally governed but by indefinite Sentences and Precepts of their Kings, remaining a long time without any written Precepts, and referring all to the Event, according to which Judgment infued. Such was the most ancient Condition of Greece in General. Now a particular Account is to be given of the feveral Kingdoms and States, that were most considerable and contemporary with the Buby-

From the Antiquity of Inachus came that Proverb of Inacho antiquior, concerning which Erasmus is to be consulted in his Adages. On Teacher. his Sister Meiissa he begat Phoroneus and a Daughter named Io, which must not be confounded with the Daughter of Jasus of a later Date, as she is wont to be by Mythologists. After fifty years Reign, he left his Kingdom to his Son Phoroneus, who by some was thought the first man, as the Son of a River in that Place, called Ina- Paulan. in Ate chus, and confequently the Father of Mortals, and Author of Mankind. Apis dying after he had reigned 34 years, left for his Successor Argus, his Sisters Son by Jupiter the King of Crete, who lived about this time. In that Island first reigned Cres, who gave name to it, and was one of those Curetes that were said to have hid Jupiter from his Father Saturn, who would have devoured his youngest Son after the other, and nourished him; as also to have built the City Cnoffes, and the Temple of Cybele. With this man, many others are confounded, according to the cultom of Poets, who have observed no distinction in ascribing to one what many did, and fathering things of their own Invention upon the com-

His Neknown to have phew Nimrod, the first King of Babylon and Asspria, was sirnamed Belue, and often called Jupiter Belus. In Crete lived (a) one very ancient, that hath gone under this (a) Hufth. name; although as many places have challenged him for their Native, as (b) con- (ar, is notifitended for the Birth of Homer. Some think, that he who is reported to have been nins, p. 143.7. preserved, and nourished by the Curetes, or the Idai Datyli, was more ancient than Niobe, and therefore make a second Jupiter to have lived in Crete about 150 years after; who because he was the first of this name known to have been extravagant arter; who because he was the first of this name known to have been extraogate towards Women; thence anole that saying, That Niobe was the first Woman beloved by Jupiter. mon name of Jupiter.

4. Each Nation of old had its Native Jupiter, who was either the Founder thereof, or, living in remote times, was by that Veneration, which attributeth immoderate things to Antiquity, elevated into a Deity. Here is to be confidered what Annius his Xenophon wrote in his Treatise of Æquivocals, as he calleth them. The most ancient King of any Great and Illustrious Family, was wont to be called Saturn, the eldest Son Jupiter, and the most Valiant amongst the Nephews, or Grand-sons, Hercules. Jupiter the ancient King of Crete, or some other, by his great Exploits, and well-deserving of that Age, might gain this credit to his Name; or the word Zent in the Greek Tongue fignifying what Ham doth import in the other Language, the Original of this name may better agree with the Name, Place, and Condition of the Son of Noah. As for Jupiter the younger, who is supposed to have begotten Hercules on Alemena, the Wife of Amphitrio, appeareth a meer Fiction; so Valiant a Person as that Child proved, inhancing the repute of his Generation: or if this Hercules was not the Son of Amphitrion, but begotten by some other man, then was the name of Jupiter given to his Father, to take away the Odium of Bastardy; it being an ordinary thing for such as were Base-begotten to be fathered upon Jupiter, Mars, or Apollo.

named Pelasgia, in Process of time called Lesbos. Pausanias maketh Jasus and Age-marginenias nor the Sons of Triopas, and Jasus to have reigned at Argos, though by Eusebius he A. be not reckoned amongst the Kings. His Daughter was the famous lo, which being got with Child by Jupiter, and thereupon, through the Displeasure of Juno turned out of her Wits, or into a Cow, as the Poets fing passed over the Straits of Thrace, to which, upon this Occasion of her Metamorphotis, was given the name of Bosphorus. Then went she down into Egypt, where, restored to humane Shape, she brought forth her Son Epaphus, the Builder of Memphis, and was afterwards taken for a Goddels, and called Iss. Heredotus leading us out of the Labyrinth of Lib. 1 ad his Fables, relateth that the Phanicians, after their Removal from the Red-Sea (where he thinketh them once to have inhabited) to the Mediterranean, applied themselves unto Sailing, and Traffick from Affria and Ægipt unto other places. On a time coming to Argos (which then excelled all Greek Cities,) on the fifth or fixth day after they had exposed their Merchandize to Sale, many Women came to their Ships to buy what liked them, and amongst the rest this Io, the Kings Daughter. The Planicians encouraging one another laid hands on those they could catch, and taking her with some others, carried them into Higgs. This by Herodotus is made one of the first Grounds of Envy, betwirt the Affaticks and Greeks; though he confoundeth her with the Daughter of Inachus, (which is usual;) and the Greeks, as

Pausanias hinteth, gave another Account of her Deportation.

7. As Pausanias reckoneth Jasus amongst the Kings of Argos (which after him was, without Doubt, called Jasos and the Citizens Jassis) so he nameth Crotopus, Suppanial his Brother Agenor's Son, for his Successor, whom Eusebius will have to have succeeded his Grand-father Triopas. His Daughter Pfamathe being with Child by Apollo, after her Delivery exposed the Infant, which she named Linus. It chanced to be devoured by wild Beafts; whereat the was to troubled, that her Father perceiving it, got out the matter, and put her to Death, for which Apollo brought a Plague upon the Argives, who, to pacifie him, made great and folemn Lamentation for the Child, which is not to be confounded with the Poet Linus, as some so order the matter. Crotopus having reigned 21 years was followed by Sthenelas his Son, who held the Kingdom for 11. and then left it to his Son Galenor. In his time, Danaus, the Brother of Ægyptus, King of that Country, having 50 Daughters, refused to marry them to his Brother's 50 Sons, because he was bidden by an Oracle Apollodorus to beware of a Son in Law, and therefore taking them away with him, failed to lib. 2. Rhodes, wherein he built a Temple to Minerva Lindia; and thence came to Argos, where Diodous L. s.

he moved a Contest with Galenor for the Kingdom, as descended of Epaphus, the p. 227. D. Son of Io. Both pleading hard before the People, the Cause, as doubtful, was put A. M. 2531. off till the day following; at what time there came a Wolf and killed an Ox, which was feeding by the Walls. The People took the Wolf to fignific Danaus, because & Pausin. Is a Stranger; and, making this Contest of the Beasts a leading Case, decreed the Argolicispas. Kingdom to the Ægyptian.

8. Danaus having obtained the Kingdom, his Brother Ægyptus feared lest by the Marriage of his Daughters he might get too great Alliance and Strength, and therefore fent down his 50 Sons to Argos with an Army, and command, either to marry them, or destroy him. They perswaded their Uncle by fair Means to receive them as Sons in Law; but he commanded his Daughters that each of them should the first Night kill her Bridegroom, and gave them Poniards for that Purpole. They all obeyed him, except Hypemnestra, (and some add Bebrico;) which dismissing Lyncaas, with advice to shift for himself, was by her Father accused, and brought to Judgment; but acquitted by the Argives, and afterwards had Leave from him, to receive again Lynceus, now reconciled to him. As for the rest of the Sisters, they were bestowed upon such, as in tryal of Masteries got the better; and became so Infamous, that it was believed they were condemned in Hell, to fill with Water a Barrel, which having an hole in it, let out as much as it received in.

9. From Danaus, those who had formerly had the name of Pelasgiota, were called Danai. He built the Castle, and his Daughters are said to have supplied the City with Water, by digging of Wells; although (a) Strabo proveth, that by reason (a) Pide lib. 8. of its Situation, it could never want the commodity of that Element. Having p. 376, 317. reigned (b) 50 years, he died, and was succeeded by Lyncoms, who governed 41, (b) Euleb. and on Hypermnestra begat Abas his Successor. Abas ruled 23 years, and begat on his Wife Ocalea, the Daughter of Mantineus, Acrisias and Pratus, Twins. They

Pretus first obtained, and held it seventeen years, but then was driven papers, in Arfrom Argos by Acrisius, and forced to fly into Lycia, to lobas his Father-in-law, Kinggolicis. of that Countrey. From him he returned with armed hand, seized upon Tyrinthe, and afterwards joyned Battel with his Brother, wherein they two are reported, first of all others, to have used Targets. The Battel ending with equal success, they came to an accommodation, and divided the Kingdom. Acrifius was to stay at Argos, and Pretus to enjoy Hereus, Midea, Trynthe, and the Maritime Parts. Pretus had by his Wife Sthenohea, a Son named Megapenthes, and three Daughters, which being taken with the Fury of Bacchus, Melampus the Poet is said to have cured. Acrifius on Euridice begat a Daughter named Danae, and confulting the Oracle about Issue Male, was answered, that he should have no Son, but a Nephew, by his Daughter, that should procure his Death. Hereupon, he shut up Danae with her Nurse in Both Mother and Son were put into an Ark, and cast into the Sea, which drave them ashore on the Island Seriphus, where Didys, Brother to Polydeller the King, educated the Boy. Being grown up, he made an Expedition into Africk, where he slew the Gorgon Meduja, being sent, as the Fable goeth, by Poljdetter, who fought to be revinged on him, for hindering him from the Marriage of his Mother; but Paufanias, not at all regarding the Fable, writeth, that this Medufa was the Daughter of Phorebus, and succeeded him in his Kingdom, which lay upon the Lake Iritonis; that she was wont to go out and fight with the Africans, over which the reigned; but Perseus coming against her with choice Forces out of Peloponnesus (so that this Voyage must have been after his Return thither, and his Grand-Father's death) the was entrapped by him, and flain in the Night. He admiring her Beauty, cut off her Head, and carried it into Greece for a Spectacle.

10. Perseus, after this, married Andromeda, (Daughter to Cepheus, by Cassiopeia, who reigned at Toppe, a Maritime Town of Phanicia) having first faved her from be- conon, apud ing devoured by a Whale. Whale, Perfeus failing that way, and hearing her Lamentations, boarded the Ship, and delivering her out of his hands, married her. After this, he returned to Siftphus, where he revenged upon Polydedes, the Violence offered to his Mother; and then, with her and his Wife, went to Argos to fee his Grand-Father, who being afraid because of the Oracle, departed into Pelasgia (or Thessalp) so called from the Apostod tib. a Pelassi, who were now removed thither out of Peloponnesus, being a vagabond People, and staying in no place:) where, when Teutamias, King of the Lariffeans, made

The authority thereof was very great; infomuch as its Decrees have sometimes been executed by the Sword, with the great Motions of several States, some or other scarce ever being wanting to undertake the work. It used to meet twice a year, (and oftener if necessity required) in the beginning of Spring and Autumn; the Cities sending their Deputies, three, two, or one, according to their bigness. These were called Pylagora, because they met at Pyla, a place near to the Temple, of which they also had the overfight, and præsided over the Games made in honour of Apollo Pythius every other year. This Court continued for many Ages without change, until the time of Philip King of Macedon, and Father of Alexander the Great, who overthrowing the Phocians in the Sacred War, for their Sacrilege outed them, and the Lacedamonians their Affiltants, of their Privileges of Voting therein, and transferred the Right to his own Kingdom. Long after, Augustus Casar innovated again, by removing the Magnessam Maleans, and others, from their Interest herein, and making Nicopolis (a City built by him in memory of his Victory at Actium) free of that Society, as Pausanias telleth us, who hath also recorded, that in his time, (which fell in with the Reign of Antonnins Pins the Roman Emperour) this Council was still maintained and kept up, consisting of thirty

Sthenelus, on a Daughter of Pelops, begat Eurystheus, his Successor, seven Months after whose Birth, Hercules the Son of Amplytrion and Alemena was born. Iphicles their other Son coming into the World after Hercules (for they were Twins) Amphytrion was ac A.M. 2724. counted the Father of him, and Jupiter of Hercules, whereupon, Juno is said to have ever hated him, and by the help of Ilythia, (Lucina or the Moon) to have hindred his Birth, and kept his Mother in Travel for seven dayes. The Boy was first named Alcaus, after his Grand-father; but afterwards, for his great Atchievements called Hercules, and ascribed to no less a Father than Jupiter, who made the Night wherein he begat him as long as three, that his Strength might be the greater. That this Person was eminent in his time, is easie to be granted; but incredible things contained in twelve Labours, being reported to be done by him, are either meant of the passing of the Sun through the twelve Signs of the Zodiack; or what things were performed by feveral others that lived elsewhere, have been by his Countrey men attributed to him, whose Epithete of Hercules (fignifying Fame and Glory spread abroad in the Air) came also to be given to them, if the Word be of no other than Greekilb Original. 13. Cicero reckoneth up fix who had the name of Hercules. The first and most ancient, he maketh begotten by the ancientest Jupiter, on Lipitus, and to have striven with Apollo about the Tripos. The second was an Egyptian, Son to Nile, who despised the Phrygian Letters. The third, a Native of Crete, and one of the Idei Dadyli, who first found out the making of Iron, by taking notice of the melting of that Metal in the Hill Ida when it burned, and being five in number, had the name of Dadyli from the Fingers, in number fo many on each hand. The fourth was Son to Afteria, the Sifter of Latona, and Father to Carthage, being worshipped by the Tyrians. Belus in India is reckoned for the fifth; and then in the fixth place cometh this Son of Alemena. The Alegoptian Hercules is faid to have aided the Gods in their War against the Gyants, which being the off-spring of the Earth, Diodorus acknowledgeth that this cannot agree with the time of the Gracian Hercules, who lived but one Age before the Trojan War; but rather happened at the Original of Sect. 26

14. Hercules the Tyrian is believed to have been the Captain of that Expedition which the Phanicians made into Spain and Gades, which, though the Gracians attribute to theirs, yet this convinceth their affertion of Falshood, That in the Island Gades, was a most ancient Temple, wherein Hercules was worshipped, not after the Grecian manner, but according to the Rites of Planicia. This was he, who erected his Pillars at the Bound or utmost Limit of the World, and that over-ran Spain, Italy, and Gaul. Sanchoniathon a Phenician Author of great Antiquity, wrote, that he was the Son of Damacuns, and that his Proper Name was Melcarthus (which fignified the King of the City) by the Greeks called Melicertes and Palamon. He was also called Diodas * by Euschius (for which Defanaus is thought to be corrupt- *Confule Bo ly written in Hierem's Translation) which Phenician name he seemeth to have had, lib.1.cap.24. because he was invocated by Lovers; their happy Success being supposed to depend on him. Some think this Tyrian Hercules was the same with the Egyptian or Libian, by Pausanies named Maceris, who undertook a Journey to Delphos, and whose Son Sardus leading a Colony into the Island Ichnusa, changed its name into Sardinia. Tacitus * writeth, that the Librans would have the molt ancient Hercules * Annal. lib. 2: a Native of their Countrey, and that fuch as came near him in Valour and Renown were named after him. Diodorus Siculus, and Eusebius mention three of this name: though the former attributeth all their Actions to the youngest, or the Son of Alemena) Servius 4, and Varro 44. And here must be remembred what was before noted; that it was the Custom of old, to call the most antient Kings by the name of Saturn, their Sons by that of Jupiter, and their most Valiant and active Nephews, by this of Hercules.

15. This Heroe being so much written and talked of, it concerneth Beginners to have some account of his Actions, and the rather, because they include the Labours of many. Amphytrion, his Father, as it seemeth, was Prince of Tyrinthos, but Apollodorus & thence was forced to fly to Thebes, having at unawares killed Electryon his Uncle and Father-in-Law, where Hercules being educated, flew Linus his Musick-Master with an Harp as he taught him. His Father feeing his Disposition, and fearing some fuch like Accident might fall out again, fent him amongst the Herdsmen, where, not yet eighteen years old, he flew a Lyon. For his extraordinary Strength and Courage he was taken notice of by Thespis, (or Thespins) Prince of the Thespienses, who made him lye with his fifty Daughters, of which begetting so many Sons, these afterwards passed over into the Island Sardinia, with the name of Thespiades. A little after this, he delivered Thebes from the Tyranny of Erginus, King of the Minians.

who exacted an Annual Tribute of 100 Oxen. He destroyed Orchomenus, with his Palace therein, and for this was rewarded with Megara, Daughter to Creon Prince of Thebes. When he was about twenty years old, he failed with Jason, amongst others to Colchos, to fetch thence the Golden Fleece, fo much celebrated by Poets, and variously interpreted by Expositors of Mythology. 16. This Jason was the Son of Eson, and the fourth in Descent from Esolus, being born at Ioleus, which Place, Pelias, King thereof, unjustly detained from his Father. He confidering with himself what glory Perseus and others of late had gotten, fought how he might accomplish some notable Enterprize for the eternizing of his Name; and having at length refolved on this Defign, published his intentions throughout Greece, by a Crier. The young and active Spirits of that time were much taken therewith, and fifty three of the Flower of Greece gave their Names to the Expedition, of whom the most Eminent, besides Hercules, were Orphem, (Scholar to Linus) Oilem, Telamon, and Pelew, the Sons of Eacus, Pollux and Caftor, Sons to Tindareus King of Sparta, Meleager and Argus, who built the Ship, named after Argo, wherein they failed, and thence were afterwards called Argonauta. Having all things in readiness, (Pelias supplying Jajon with all Necessaries, to be rid of him fearing he should call him to account for the Kingdom) they set sail from Iolens, and came to Lemnus, an Island in the Ægean Sea, whence they failed to the Countrey of the Doliones, by whose King Cyzicus they were honourably received 5 but thence Apollonius Riber lanching out by Night, were driven back by Tempest, and being taken by him for the dies 1. 1. ried by them From Cyzicus they came into Mysa, where Hercules, for want of skill in rowing, brake his Oar, and going into the Woods to provide another, whil'st his Companions rested themselves on the Shoar, it happened that Hylas his Boy drinking at a Fountain, was intercepted by the Nymphs, as the Story goeth. cales followed on foot to Colchos.

17. Jason with the rest sailed to Colchos, and by the treachery of Medea, Daughter to Ætes the King, that fell in love with him, became Master of the Golden Fleece, and returned home with her, having finished his Journey in four Moneths. They lived happily at Corinth for ten years, till Creon, King of that City, betrothing his Daughter Glance to him, Medea was commanded to quit the Place; whereupon, mad with anger, the fet the Palace on fire, and flew her own three Sons which the had by Jason, as Euripides relateth the Story; who, as it's probable, too much indulnad by Jajon, as European relaced the conjugation of the Poetick liberty, the Corimbians having corrupted him with five Talents, as an ancient (a) Hiltorian hath discovered. (b) Herodotus writeth, that a Messen-sign flow ger was sent from Colchos to demand Medea, but he was put off with this Answer, ministration at Entire Liberty. that they of Afia had formerly ftoln away Io from Argos. As the Argonauta failed by pidem Athos and Samothracia, they were driven by Tempest upon Sigaum, a Promontory (b) Lib. 1.6.2. of Tross, (c) where they found Hesione, Daughter to Laomedon King of Troy, bound (c) Dioderus upon the Shoar, that she might become a Prey to a Whale. This Whale had been 1. 1. p. 171. fent by Neptune to devour Passengers upon the Coast, because (d) Laomedon, with (d) Vide Pin-Money taken out of the Temple of Neptune, and Apollo, had built the Walls of the dari interpr. City, and made no Restitution. Apollo had answered, that no way could they be quit of the Whale, but by the devouring of some one chosen out by lot, which fell upon the King's own Daughter. But Hercules moved with pity, upon promife to have the Maid, and certain Horses that never were handled, undertook to kill the Whale, which readily performing, he trusted Laomedon with his Wages, till his return from Colchos. Then he demanded them (e) by Iphicles, his Brother, and Tela- (e) Diodorns mon, whom he sent into the City, but the King, instead of restoring what he for- bidd, p. 1755 merly detained, imprisoned the Messengers, and plotted the destruction of the whole Company. Priamus, of all his Sons, was onely against this Treachery, and when he could not otherwise prevail, sent in two Swords to the Prisoners, wherewith they dispatching their Keepers, got out to their Companions. In revenge for this afterward, Hercules took the City, flew Laomedon, and preferred Priamus for his Integrity to the Kingdom.

18. The Argonauta being returned into Greece, Hercules (f) took an Oath of (f) Idem them mutually to aid one another, as also to chuse out some certain place, wherein to page 178. meet and celebrate Games in honour of Jupiter Olympius. This matter being left to his Care and Management, he pitched on the Plains of the Eleans, lying upon the River Alpheus, where he ordained Exercises both to be performed on Foot, and Horse-back, appointed Rewards to the Victors, and fent abroad to give notice thereof to the fe-veral Cities, which were all hereby wonderfully affectionated towards him. But after Eursfikeus had fucceeded Sthenelus his Father, in the Kingdom of Mycene, he began to grow jealous of the Strength and Prosperity of Hercules, and ceased not to press him forwards into dangerous, though glorious Attempts. He at first refusing, went and consulted the Oracle at Delphos, which is said to have acquainted him with the Pleasure of the Gods, that at the appointment of Eurystheus, he should finish twelve Labours, and so attain to Immortality. Hereat he grew exceeding melancholy, taking it in great Disdain to be commanded by him, which Discontent arose to a Phrenfie, and in this Diftemper he killed the Children that he had by Megara. and put her away; but afterwards coming to his right mind, refolved to venture himself, and returned to Eurystheus for his Orders. His twelve Labours.

The * first Task imposed on him, was to kill a Lyon in Nemea, a Wood of Achaia, * Dioderns 1.4. whom no Sword nor any other Weapon could pierce; being only to be maftered p. 219. E. by the Hand, he caught and strangled him, then taking off his Skin, thenceforth wore it as a Garment. The second thing enjoyned him, was to kill an Hydra with an hundred Heads, like Snakes, whereof when one was cut off, two others sprung up in its room. The third was, to bring home alive the Erymanthian Boar, at the fight of which Beast upon his shoulders, Eurysthens was so frighted, that he ran for fear into a brasen Hogshead; and in this Expedition he also overcame the Centaures. The next thing commanded him, was to catch an Hart of marvellous swiftness, with Golden Horns, which he effected, but in what manner is not agreed on. After this, he drave away innumerable companies of Birds from the Symphalian Fens, which there, and in other places devoured the Corn. Then cleanfed he Augeas his Stable; not by carrying the Dung out upon his shoulders, (which Indignity was intended him by Enrystkens) but by the Current of the River Peneus, which he brought down thither for that purpose. The seventh thing commanded him, was, Sect. 3 to fetch a wild Bull out of the Island Crete, with which Passphar is said to have faln in love: and betwixt this and the next Labour, he helped the Gods against the Gyants and pacifying Jupiter towards Prometheus, loofed this man from the place, where an Eagle continually fed upon his Liver, for his communicating to men the knowledge of Fire. The eighth Task was to fetch the Mares of Diomedes out of Thrace. which had brazen Mangers, were tyed with Iron chains, and fed not on any other Fodder but the flesh of Strangers coming that way: But Hercules sirst gave them their Master's Flesh, and then brought them to Eurystheus, who dedicated them to Juno, and their Breed is faid to have continued to the time of Alexander the

20. After this it is, that Diodorus maketh him to have failed amongst the Argonaute to Colchos. Then, at the Command of Eurystheus he warred against the Amazons in Africk, and brought to him the Girdle of Hippolyta their Queen. The tenth Labour was to fetch the Oxen of Gerjon out of Iberia, or Spain, as the Fable gooth; whereas Gerjon reigned not there, but in that part of Epirus which lieth about Ambracia and Amphilochus, as (a) Arrianus witnesseth, from the Pen of Hecatæus, a most (a) L. 2. 4ancient Hiltorian, (b) and others do testifie. There were afterwards in Epirus a  Designation overy large fort of Oxen, called Larini, thought to be of that Kind which Hercules in Dissiplina hierafting. drove away, and to have had this name from Larinus his Herdsman. Seeing then Peringuism. that this occasion of invading Spain, Italy, and Gaul, is taken away from this Her- Scholidits in cules, that Expedition is to be left to the Phanician, to whom formerly we ascribed arilloph. it. But Hercules is farther said in this Journey to have sain Anteus, to have gone down onto Hegypt, and made an end there of Bushin that cruel Tyrant, and erected Suides. his Pillars in the utmost Bounds of the World. Within eight years and one month he finished these his ten Labours. After his return, he was enjoyned to setch Cerberus out of Hell; which having accomplished, the twelfth was the fetching of the golden Hesperian Apples; which, whether they were such, and were kept by a terrible Dragon, or by them were to be understood Herds of Cattel, defended by some strong and valiant man, he also brought out of Africk to Eurystheus. These are his twelve Labours, as Diodorus describeth, and ranketh them.

21. Having served Eurystheus twelve years, he returned to Thebes, and there gave Megara, whom he had put away, to Iolaus, the Son of his Brother Iphicles. He had now no Legitimate Issue, and therefore married Dejaneira, Daughter to Oe-Diodorns neus, King of the Calydonians, to pleasure whom, he derived the River Achelous into Apollodorias another Chanel, and thereby rendred the Countrey more fertile; whence the Fable arose, that he fought with Achelous, turned into a Bull, and cutting off one of his Horns, gave it to the Ætolians, (part of whom the Calydonians were) called the Horn of Amalthea, wherein was plenty of all Fruits. Before this, he had won Iole, the Daughter of Eurytus, Prince of Occhalia, by shooting, which Exercise her Father had proposed to all Comers, against himself and his Son. Yet was he denied her; whereupon, to be revenged on Eurytus, he drove away his Horses, and carrying his Son Iphitus, who was sent to seek them, up into a Tower, to see if he could make any discovery of them, when he could not espy them, as if he had wrongfully accused them of Thest, he threw him down headlong. For this, he was struck with a Disease, and had answer from the Oracle at Delphos, that if he would be freed from it, he must be sold, and the price given to the Children of Iphitus. He then passing over into Asia, willingly permitted one of his Friends to sell him, and was bought by Omphale, Queen of the Maonians, to whom her Husband Imolus had left the Kingdom. Being freed from his Disease, he did his Mistress great Service, killing many of the famous Robbers, called Cercopes, and bringing some of them alive unto her. Omphale admiring his Acts, after the knew who he was, gave him his liberty, and took him to her Bed. Of her he begat Lamus, having already a Son by his fellow flave, named Cleolaus: he ferved her three years, and then returning into Peloponnesus, went against Laomedon King of Ilium, as some rank the Series of his Actions.

22. Some years after, having subdued several Persons, and Cities in Greece, he joyned the Arcadians and others to him, and went with an Army against Eurytus. whom he flew, with his three Sons, and taking away Iole, came to Cenaum, a Promontory of Eubea. Here, being about to facrifice, he fent Liches his Servant to Diederits at Trachine for his Shirt and Coat, wherein he was wont to perform that Religious prints p. 1692 Work. From Lichas Dejaneira learning how Iole was taken, and fearing to be robbed by her of her Husband's Affections, anointed his Shirt with a Poyfon given her Apollodoress by Neffus the Centaure, as he was dying (who would have ravished her, and for that

Games infti-tuted by Her-

Sect. 3. was killed by Hercules) perswading her, that it was an Ointment Efficacious to procure Love. As foon as the Shirt touched his Body, the Venom also seized on it, wherewith being grievously tormented, he dismissed his Army, and returned to Trachines, where the Disease increasing, he sent to enquire of Apollo about a Remedy. It was answered, he should be carried up to the Mountain Oeta, where a great pile of Wood being reared, Jupiter would take care for the rest. This done, and all hope of Recovery past, Hercules, in his Warlike Habit, cast himself upon the pile, and defired the Standers by to put Fire to it; which, when all his Relations refused to do. Peas, who feeking his Cattel came that way, as Apollodorus writeth, or his Son Philottetos, as most deliver, (to whom Hercules gave for a reward his Bow and Arrows) fet fire to it, which allo being kindled with Lightning, was presently reduced toge-ther with the Body, into Ashes. Iolans finding one of his Bones, a perswasion arose, a. M. 2775. that he passed from amongst Mortals to the Gods, as the Oracle had formerly shewed. He commanded, that Hyllus his Son, when he came at Age, should marry lole. As for Dejaneira, she, seeing what was brought upon her Husband, out of vexation hanged her felf. Thus perished Alcaus, Sirnamed Hercules, the Son of Amphytrion and Alemena, at the Age of 52 years, having in a fit of Phrenue, as it's thought, burnt himself. And these are the most remarkable things that are written of him, who lived (according to the Chronology, which taketh not in the hundred years formerly mentioned) in the dayes of Tholah the Judge of Ifrael.

23. Hercules being dead, his Children for some time stayed at Trachine, with Ceyces the King, till Hyllus and others of them were grown up. Then Euryfibeus began to fear them, and therefore resolving to banish them all out of (4) Greece (or ra- (4) Diodon. ther Peloponnesus) sent to Ceyces, commanding him, upon pain of his Displeasure, 1.4.p. 181. What happen to remove them together with lolans, and the rest of their Friends. They being unable to make relistance, voluntarily quitted the Place, and sent about to the Principal Cities to beg harbour, which none would afford them except the Athenians, who placed them in Tricorinth, one of the four Parts of their City. After some time, when they were come to ripeness of Age, and now bare themselves high upon the glory of their Father, Eurystheus much more suspecting their growth, led down a great Army against them; but, affisted by the Athenians, under Conduct of their Cousin Iolans and Thesens, they overthrew and slew (b) him with all his (b) Strabe 1.8. Sons, and then invaded Peloponnesus. Now a Plague seized on the Countrey, and p. 377. the Oracle answered, that it was, because they returned thither before their time; whereupon Hyllus returned, as some say, and went to Hypalius, King of the Dorionses about Octa, by whom he was (e) adopted, because, by Hercules his means, Hgg. (c) damilio, mins had formerly recovered his Kingdom; and thenceforth the Heraclide became to 427.6. embodied with the Dorienses. Diodorus writeth, that Hyllus, provoking some one of his Enemies to a fingle Combat, upon this condition, that if he overcame, then were the Heraclida to be Masters of Mycena, if not, they should depart for fifty years, was flain; and fo they accordingly returned, and kept themselves quiet for that time.

24. Eurystheus being slain, after he had reigned at Mycene forty three years, Atreus the Son (d) Atreus the Son of Pelops succeeded him, who also at this time had the Sovereign (d) English ty of Argos. This Pelops, above an hundred years before (for fo famous a Man must not be omitted) being the Son of Tantalus Prince of Phrysia, had made War upon Ilium, where, after he was put to the worst by Ilus the King, he was forced to fly into Greece, and coming to Pifa, fell in love with (e) Hippodamia, Daughter (e) Diodoust of Oenomaus, Prince of that City, who, being warned by the Oracle to take heed 116.4.1.191. to himfelf when the thould take an Husband, had condemned her in his Refolutions, to perpetual Virginity. Therefore he admitted no Suiter, but on this condition, to run a Race with him in the Chariot, and if he won her not, to fuffer Death, to which he brought many, through the swiftness of his Horses, till Pelops (or Hippodamia for him) corrupting the Chariot-driver, obtained the Prize, for grief of which, the old man thinking now the Oracle to be fulfilled, hanged himfelf. Pelops then obtained Hippodamia, and Pifa with her, after which, by little and ed rija, with most of the perinfula into his possession, called after him Pelopon-painfula, wherein he reigned sifty eight years. Of Hippodamia he begot many children, by which he promoted his Affairs more than Power; for by the marriage of them, he infinuated into the Principalities of most of the Cities. Amongst his Sons the most eminent were, Atreus, Thyestes, and Plestbenes. The two former he left his Successors, and Plesthenes dying young, left two Boyes to Atrens, to be brought up, called Agamemnon and Menelaus. Atreus married their Mother, by name Aerope, the Daughter of Minos King of Crete, with whom his Brother Thyestes committing Adultery, he first banished, and after recalling him, feasted him with the Section

25. Some will have Atress to have out-lived Threftes; others fay, he died before him, and, being reconciled, left him the Kingdom at his Death, on this condition, to restore it to Agamemnon when he should come to Age. After Euryfibens his death, it seemeth, that he became Master of all Peloponnesus, and opposed Hyllus, who challenging any in his Army, as was faid, to a fingle Combat, Eckemus King of the Tegosta in Arcadia, accepted the Challenge, and flew him. He was very skilful in Aftrology, being by some reputed the first that discovered the Mocion of the Sun to be contrary to that of the Starry Heaven, (a) and that observed (a) saving.

Afterwards great Inundations happening in this Countrey, they were forced to divide the People into two parts, whereof, leaving one with Dimas in Arcadia, with the other Jajus, Dardamus and Idans left Peloponnesus, and coasting by Eupope, at length came into the Bay of Melant, and arrived at a certain Island of Thrace, called Samo-thracia, from the Countrey, and a Man's Name who inhabited it; one Samon the Son of

from Teneri to Dardani, and built the City upon the Sea-side, about the 2530th year of the World, in the dayes of Sthenelans King of Argos. Tros fucceeding him, begat Ilus, Asfarachus, and Ganymedes. Ilus succeeded him. From Asfaracus descended AEneas. Ganymedes for his Beauty was stollen by Tantalius King of Phrygia, and Father to Pelops, whence arose a War, in which many lost their Lives, and Tantalus (though the Son of Jupiter by the Nymph Plota) was beaten out of Paphlagonia, Ilus built the chief City on the Plain, which, though the Latins called it Troja, and pled, at fairl. we Troy (which Names most properly belong to the Countrey) yet the Greeks Vist Strikes. constantly Bissum from him. The chiefest of these renowned Warriours were Nestor, who reigned in Mes- vide Simsonifenia, Ajax the Son of Telamon Prince of the Mand Salamine, Ajax the younger, or uminChron.Cathe Son of Oileus King of Locri, over against Eubwa, Achilles the Son of Peleus by 2812. &c. the Goddes Thetis, whose Principality was Phthiotis, part of that Country afterwards called Thessay, Ulssses the Son of Laertes King of Cephalenia, Thoas the Etolian, Podalirins and Machaon, Sons of the third Esculapius, and Tlepolemus the Son of Hercules, who now inhabited the Island Rhodes. They made up amongst them a Navy of about 1000 Ships, and therein transported an Army of 120000 men. From Aulis they failed to Lemnos, and thence, missing of Troy, into Mysia, which miltaking for their Enemies Country, they began to make Incurfions into it, and were beaten back by Telephes Prince thereof; all but Achilles and Patroclus, the former whereof fore wounded him: and Therfander General of the Beotians here loft Paulanias in his Life, into whose Room, because his Son Tifamenus was but young, they elected Basticu. Penelaus. A Conflict presently ensued their Arrival at Troy, wherein Protestlaus was flain by a Dardanian, as Homer calleth him, (either Hector or Æneas) and then the Greeks fent Menelaus and Ulysses Ambassadours, to demand Helena. Priamus calling a Council to deliberate about the Matter, Antenor was for delivering her up, and so were the rest of the grave and ancient Men, though they attributed much to the Beauty of the Woman; but Antimachus being corrupted by the Gold of Paris, urged the contrary, and not only moved to have the Message rejected, but the Messengers killed.

29. Priamus, though otherwise prudent enough, rejected the Counsel of the old men, and out of Indulgence to his Son, fent away the Ambassadours without any Satisfaction. Then both Parties prepared for the War, and another Engagement followed, wherein the Greeks had the better, who then dividing their Forces, left part to continue the Seige, and with the other, Achilles (who took with him Palamedes) was fent to haraffe the Country, and cut off Provisions from the City. Servius. This he fo well performed, as he took 23 Towns, and therein got much Booty, which was divided. Whil'st Palamedes was with him carrying on the War in the Island Lesbos, Ulysses envying him for his great Wisdom, wherein he seemed to overtop him, circumvented him by Treachery, and by false Suggestions procured him to be sent for to the Camp, and stoned as a Traitor, though he had exceedingly well deserved of the Army, being a Person of great Courage (which he also expreffed at his Death) and yet so moderate and wise, that he thereby allayed the too much Heat of Achilles. To him some attribute the Invention of 16 Letters in the Greek Alphabet, others only 4. but withal, the ordering and ranking of an Army, Plink, 7.0.56. the watch word, Guards, and Dice to divert the Souldiers. His Death was grievoully taken by Ajax, the Son of Telamon, who for some time absented himself, but especially by Achilles, who took it so heinously, that for a great while he would not be reconciled, nor brought to Fight, having much more Cause to be offended for this thing, than the detaining of a Woman from him by Agamemnon, as the Poet fings, who industriously omitteth whatsoever reflecteth upon Uliffes.

Ulyffes therefore, and Diomedes, as Virgil fingeth, stole away the Aniad. 21, Image; Philottetes, who had the Arrows, was fent for from the Island Lemnos, and with them slew Paris the Incendiary, after whose Death Deiphobus the Son of Priamus obtained Helena, as being of best Account for Valour, next to his Brother Hector. Then was a wooden Horse prepared by the hands of Epeus, which pretending to dedicate to Minerva, they left before the City, having industriously made it higher than the Gates, hoping the Trojans would pull down part of the Wall to take it in. They left also some of their choicest men in the Horses Belly, and Sinon with his hands bound behind him, who under Notion of a Fugitive that had been ill used. should perswade them to receive it into the City; and then giving out that they would raise the Siege for some time, they withdrew into the Island Tenedos. The

Trojans had drunk themselves fast asleep, the City was taken, sacked and burnt. Menelaus killing Deiphobus in his Bed, took away Helena, and Priamus was slain in A. Menetans not after the Work was done, presently commanded the Greeks to prepare for their Return ; but Agamemnon being unwilling to depart before he had facrificed to Minerva, the Fleet was divided, and a Contention arose betwixt the Followers of Menelans when they came to Tenedos, because some would have stayed for Agamemnon there; insomuch as Ulysses then returned back to him. Because of his Mothers Death he was vexed by the Furies, and found some Difficulty in mastering the Argives, who now opposed him; but by the Help of the Phocians he recovered his Fathers Dominions, though Menelaus his Uncle, either for that he disapproved the Death of his Mother, or for private Respects, bare him no good Will, and neglected him, which he shewed further in taking from him his Daughter Hermione (who had brought him a Son) and giving her to Pyrrhus, the Son of Achilles. Tormented with the Furies he went into Arcadia, and thence to Athens, where he was acquitted in the Court of Arcopagus about his Mother, the Suffrages, for, and against him being equal, in which Case Judgment always passed on the Defendants side. A little after this he is thought to Paterculas I. z. have killed Pyrrhus as he was facrificing to his Father at the Temple of Delphos, and then refumed his Wife. When Menelaus was dead he obtained the Kingdom of Paulan. in Co. Sparta, the Lacedamonians being more willing to receive him as the Grand-son of rinthacis. Tyndareus by Clytemnestra, than the base Sons of Menelaus Nicostratus and Megapenthos begotten on a Slave. It it probable that he, as his Father before him, was Supream Lord of Argos, and that the Successor of Melampus and Bias, ever lince the Division of the Kingdom, or for a good Space, held their Principalities of his Predecessors and himself. But now being King of Lacedemon, and the greatest part of Arcadia lying near to Argos, after the Death of Cylababes, the Son of Sthenelus (who left no Children) and that Amphilochus was departed thence to the Amphilochians (to whom he gave name) having the Phocians constant Friends to him, he easily made himself sole Master of Argos, and so this Kingdom was re-united about 140 years after the threefold Division of it. Divers years after, he placed a Colony of the Tisamenus warm in his Seat, when he was displaced by the Heraclida, or Posterity of Hercules. They had several times attempted their Return into Peloponnesus, but were ever frustrated till now; Hyllus the Son of Hercules once or twice, Cleodaus his Son after him, and Aristomachus left three Sons, Temenus, Cresphontes, and Ariftodemus, which being grown up confulted the Oracle of Apollo, concerning their Return, and had the same Answer their Father formerly had, that they should attain their Desire, if they went by the way Stengerus, which Word in the Greek being of an ambiguous Signification, Aristomachus thinking by it to be meant the Isthmus, as a narrow way, led down his Forces through it, and miscarried. Temenus objecting this, the Pythia, or woman that delivered the Oracles, answered, that their Ancestors by their Misunderstanding had been Authors of their own Inselicity; for whereas Hyllus was told that the third Fruit was to be expected, the third Generation was meant, and not the third Crop or Summer, as he expounded it, and accordingly perished: And as for Stengerus, by it they were to understand the Deep Sea on the right hand as one entreth Peloponnesus, and not the narrow Isthmus. Having received this Answer, and conceiving all things now to be fulfilled and ripe for their effectual Return, they built Ships in Ætolia upon that Sea, the Place wherein they were made thenceforth keeping the name of Naupactus from that Occasion. Whilst they were about this Work, a certain Prophet appeared to them, and foretold them feveral things; but Hippoter taking him for a Magician fent on Purpole to delude the Army, killed him. For this a Pettilence was fent amongst them, about which confulting the Oracle they were bidden to banish Hippotes for ten years, and use the Conduct of a Captain with three Eyes, for two years space.

The Acheans then, driven by Necessity and Desperation, attempted to get by Force, what they could not by Intreaty, and though they lost Tisamenus in the Fight, drave the Iones out of their Seats, and constrained them to pass into Attica, where they were received by the Athenians, through the Perswasion of Melanthus the King. As for the Heraclida, when they came to divide what they had won, Argos fell to Temenus; Cresphontes, by Fraud used in the Lot obtained Meffene; and Lacedamon became the Portion of Procles, and Eurystheus, the Sons of Aristodemus, who was slain by the Sons of Pylas, Kinsmen to Tisamenus, before they entered Peloponnesus: they also according to their Ingagement possessed Oxylus of Elis.

And this they further shewed, when Meltes the Son of Lacidaus, one of these Kings, not enduring this Abatement, grew as they thought, Diffolute and Imperious in the Government. For, impatient hereof, they deprived him of all Power, took upon them to condemn him to Death, and pluck'd up all Supremacy by the roots, not fuffering any afterwards to reign amongst them. For, though we meet with one afterwards, called King of Argos, in Herodotus; yet that Name fignified no more than it did in the Common-wealths of Athens, Carthage, and Rome, where this Title was wont to be given to some forts of Officers, as this work will shew. The Government was now Democratical, the chief Power lying in the People, divided into three Tribes, to which the Senate was subordinate, chosen every year for the preparing of matters for the whole Body, and the management of the Executive Power, with Authority to Enact things of leffer confequence. There was also a Council of State, confisting of 80 Persons, besides Inferiour Magistrates of the City, and Judges for determining of Causes, all which are mentioned in the League, made betwixt the Argives, Athenians, and others, described by Thucydides in his fifth Book of the Peloponnesian War. No further Intelligence have we concerning the constitution of this Common-wealth, which yet flourished downwards for many Ages, and had great Contests with the Lacedemonians, especially about the Territories of Thyrea, to which both laid claim. Sometimes they fell out about their Confederates, being moved with much emulation and distaste at each others Government (the one being a Democracie, and the other an Oligarchy) which once especially brought the State of Argos into great danger. He was feigned to be double-natured, confliting both of a Serpentine and Humane shape, because, coming into Greece, he shook off Barbarism, and turned Civil. Besides this Colony, he gathered the People of these Parts into twelve Towns, whereas before that, they lived dispersedly, according to the most ancient custom of Greece, and called them Athena, after the name of Minerva in the Greek Language. The Story is (c) told, that when the name came to be given, (c) Augustin. on a sudden an Olive-tree, and a Fountain of Water appeared, whereat Cecrops mo- in Various de ved with wonder, sent to enquire of the Oracle what they should mean. It was Civitat. Di, answered, that the Olive signified Minerva, the Water Neptune, and that they might name that City from which of these two they pleased. Hereupon, all the Men and Women were gathered together to make the choice: the Men were for Neptune, but the Women, being the greater number, carried the name for Minerva. Neptune angry hereat, drowned their Territories, whom to pacifie, they punished the Women feveral wayes. They decreed, that thenceforth they should not have a Voice in any Publick matter; that no Child should bear the Mother's name, and that they should not be called Athenaa, but Attica. Some Women, known by the name of Minerva, there have been, though impure Spirits, ambitious to blind men with Superstition and Idolatry, might well act in this matter, as Augustine telleth us, under the name of Neptune.

2. Cicero (d) mentioneth five several Women that have had the name of Minerva. 3 De natura The first was the Mother of Apollo by Vulcan. One a Moor, and the greatest of all; ano-ad 8 caniad. ther an Italian, Father to Electra; the third an Arcadian, Father of Maia, the Mother of Mercury; all which the Antients confound according to their Custom. The first (d) lived near to Mount Atlas; to which, for his great Skill in Astrology, is (1) Diedorits attributed the bearing up of the Heavens; and he is also counted the Father of E. L.s. lectra. Prometheus found out the instrument to strike fire, and thereupon is said to have stollen fire from the Gods. Deucalion his Son married Pyrrha the Daughter of his Uncle Epimetheus, and in his time (e) happened that great Deluge in part of () August. de Greece, which is known by the addition of his name; that Countrey called most Civit. Dei. antiently and truly Hellas, his Seat near to the Mountain Parnaffus being chiefly orofins L. i. afflicted with it, on which Hill he is thought to have faved many men by Boats, and thence the Fable to have risen of his re-peopling the Earth. But (that we may note it altogether) there are three particular Floods which we read to have happened to this Countrey of Greece. The first, under Ogyges (called the Ogygean Deluge) concerning whom we shall speak in the History of Thebes. This fell 248 years before either of the other, and overwhelmed Attica, especially so, that as Pererius will have it, it remained waste 200 years after. The next was this of Deucalion, which happened 737 years before the first Olympiad: and the (f) third fell (f) Diod. 1. 5. 86 years after it, in the dayes of Dardanus and Cadmus.

4. Deucalion of Pyrrha his Wife begat Hellen and Amphiction. Hellen gave the which is espename of Hellenes to his Subjects before called Graci, and of Hellas to the Countrey name of recurres to the didity to be nored, for a formerly named Pelalgia, from the Pelalgia (who there innanted) as Diamonnia to nored, for a formerly named Pelalgia, from the Pelalgia. Holus grew fo famous, that the name of Jupiter and Neptune came to be given him. Dorus inhabited the Countrey Histiaotis, about the Mountains Offa and Olympus. Xuthus after his Father's death, was banished Theffaly Harad. L. z. by his other Brothers, for stealing away a great part of his Fathers Treasure, and Achaich. came to Athens, where he married the Daughter of Erechtheus, on which he begat Achaus and Ion. Achaus getting aid from Athens and Ægialus, went into Theffaly, and recovered his Grand-father's Kingdom; but afterwards killing a man by chance, he fled into Laconia, where his Posterity continued till expelled by the Heraclida Strabo ut such and Dorienses, as we shewed in the History of Tisamenus. Ion being exceeding fa- pra. mous at Albens, had a numerous Progeny, which, for that Attica was now grown too full, was fent out as a Colony into Peloponnesus, whence they were thrust out by their Brethren the Achesns, after they had denied them harbour (as is formerly faid) and returned to Athens, from which City they were afterwards led out into Asia, by the Sons of Codrus. But these things happened in after-times.

The Council

5. In Cecrops his time (g) one maketh the Council, or Senate of Areopagus to have (g) Eufib. had its Original, though no clear light can we discover concerning the true beginning of it. He instituted Games to Apollo and Minerva, and having reigned fifty years, left his Kingdom to his Son Pandion, who also, after forty, gave way to his Son Erechtheus. He became a man of great account; and whereas the Subjects of Athens were before his time called Cecropide, thenceforth they were named after the Place it self. He made War upon the Inhabitants of Eleasine, Ion the Son of Xuthus, and his own Grand-son, by his Daughter, being his chief Commander, wherein, after he had flain Immardus, the Son of Paufan. in Eumolpus their General, he also lost his Life, when he had reigned fifty years. This Cecrops the fecond, fome think to have gathered the People into twelve Towns, for that living dispersedly abroad, the Carians by Sea, and the Baotians (called Eone) by Land, harasted the Countrey, as * Strabo * L.9.9.397. writeth. At the end of forty years, his Son, named Pandion, succeeded him, who C. was expelled the Kingdom by the Sons of Metion his Uncle, and fled to Pyla, the King of Megara, his Father-in-law, who left him his Successor. Whil'it he here pansan, Ht reigned, he begat four Sons, Ægeus, Lycus, Pallas, and Nisus, who after his death print. went against the Metiontide, and expelled them Athens, the Dominions whereof they divided into four parts, according to their Father's injunctions, Megara falling to Nifis, who reigned there a long time.

7. Though this division was made, yet was Ægens Sovereign in effect, for fear A.M.2723. of whom, Lycus fled to Athens. Pallas the other Brother had fifty Sons, which growing up, gave cause enough to Ægens to be jealous of them, having him in contempt because he was childles. For though he married two Wives, yet plutarch, in had he Iffue by neither of them, which made him go to Delphos to enquire of the Thefee. Oracle about Posterity. The answer being obscure, in his return he was enter-who, either understanding the Oracle, or otherwise induced, made his Daughter A.M. 2725. Hitra to lye with him, after he had caused him to drink good store of Wine. At his departure he put a Sword, and a Knife under a great Stone, bidding her, if the brought forth a Boy, as foon as he could remove the stone, and take those things from under it, to fend him with them as Tokens, unto Athens, and he would own him for his Son. She accordingly brought forth a Son (called Thesens, from putting the marks under the flone) whom Pittheus brought up; and for that he proved exceeding Prudent and Couragious, his Mother at fixteen years of Age brought him to the Stone, acquainting him with his Original, and his Father's Injunctions. He eafily removing it, and taking away the Tokens, prepared for his Journey; but they were unwilling to let him go by Land, because all the wayes were full of Robbers, fince Hercules (who went up and down destroying them) after his killing of Iphitus, had quitted these Parts, and was gone into Lycia, where for some years he ferved Omphale the Queen. But Thesens, burning with emulation upon hearing continually the Praise of Hercules his Kinsman (for their Mothers were next Cousins) resolved to take that way to obtain some Renown in killing those Robbers; and effected his Design upon several of them.

8. Being arrived at Athens, he was in danger to be poyfoned by his Father, through the persuasion of Medea, (who now was fled to him from Corinth, and filled his Plutarch. jealous Head with suspitions of this Stranger) till thinking it wisdom to make himfelf known, rather than let another do it, he shewed him the Tokens, which he presently acknowledged, and owning him for his Son, made his Subjects, as such, to take notice of him. But the Sons of Pallas, who before had been Seditious, now feeing all hopes of the Kingdom taken from them by him, and disdaining that Ægens should first reign himself, being not of the Bloud Royal, but adopted onely by Pandion (as Plutarch writeth) and then leave for his Successor a Stranger, and a Bastard, they took Arms; and the better to accomplish their Design, divided themfelves into two Parties, whereof the one came openly with their Father against Sect. 4. Athens, and the other lay in ambush. Theseus having notice of the latter fort, surprized, and cut them all off, which so discouraged the other, as they separated themfelves and fled. Thefens after this, to employ himself, and gain the Favour of the People, went, and took the Marathonian Bull, fetch'd out of Grete by Hercules, and brought him quick into the City, after he had infelted the Countrey very much. Then failed he to Creie, where, as the Fable goeth, he flew the Minotaure, a Monster kept by Minos, King of that Island.

This Li- *apud Strab. berty he thought to be preferved beft by Concord, which would be most citabiliharing a printing beft by the prevention of Avarice and Luxury, the great causes of Disagreement. He would therefore have them all live foberly and frugally, to which purpose he ordained, that Boyes should live together in Companies, called Agelæ, when they were grown up, and men, in others, called Syssitia, from eating together, (which they also named Andria from their Manhood) that taking their Meat all in publick, the Poor might live in equal condition with the Rich.

Those Cosmi at home Governed the Common-wealth ; in War commanded the Army with absolute Authority. There was also a Senate chosen out of those who in this Office had well demeaned themselves, being for life, and not liable to be called to account. There was an Order of Horse-men, who were bound to keep Horses for the service of the State, whereas they at Lacedamon had no such tie upon them. In the Concio, or great Affembly, all Members of the Commonwealth had equal Votes, but its Power was not great, confirming onely what was propounded by the Senate and Cosmi. They had publick Slaves, called Periaci, from their inhabiting up and down the Countrey, who tilled the Grounds, and paid in a constant Revenue. All, when ripe of Age, were commanded to marry, for the propagation of legitimate iffue: Yet did they not lead their Wives to their Houses, when newly married, but let them stay till they were fit to govern a Family. The Boyes took their meat altogether on the ground, serving themselves and the elder fort. They were cloathed meanly, and alike both Winter and Summer; they used bickerings with one another, both with single Hand and Weapon, on certain dayes, and had those who exercised them also in Shooting, and a warlike kind of leaping, invented by Cures; moreover, in certain Rythms, called properly * Rythmi Cretici. The Cretians: had feveral commendable Laws, as that which fe * robust verely reftrained Drunkenness; another, commended by Plato, that required an Karrisol account how publick Corn was distributed and spent. The younger fort were utterly forbidden to make any enquiry into the Equity of the Laws, and if the elder were unsatisfied, without their knowledge, they were to have recourse to the Magistrates, and their own Equals. But, that the Laws might be ingraven in their memories, the Boyes were wont when they were taught to read, to get fome of them by heart, being put into Verse, together with some Musical Notes:

Lycurgus, the Spartan Law-giver, made this Model the Pattern of his new Common-wealth, having travelled into the Island; where he had converse with Thales, a man ennobled for his Laws, and Lyrick Poems; for we must not suppose strab lib 10. The Sylfitia of the Lacedamonians were fetched, as Aristotle proveth, from Crete, and their Phiditia taken from the Andria of that Place, as also their Education of Children was agreeable to the Cretian. Plato commendeth much the De legibra; Commonwealth of Crete, and the Legislator for his Wisdom and Prudence, though 116. 8. he abominateth the immodest love of Boyes, and rejecteth his reason for it, which yet Lycurgus so approved, as to put it in his Model. Aristotle condemneth it, as also, amongst some other things, the Election of the Cosmi, and their too great advantage they had of raising Seditions in the State, when they came to be punished. But Polybius affirmeth the two Commonwealths of Crete and Sparta to have valtly differed, not fearing to blame Ephorus, Xenophon, Calisthenes, and Plato, for saying they were very like; because with the Cretians it was usual to ingross Land and Money, whence they were avaricious, contentious, feditious, and what not? Moreover, they had annual Magistrates, whereas the other had two Kings for life. Lib. 4. & 6. They were, he faith, fraudulent and crafty in their private Demeanour, and most unjust in their publick Councils. Though some publick Abuses taxed by Polybius, Provide tax

Verse of Epimenides a Cretian, which St. Paul citeth and confirmeth,

12. Minos succeeding his Step-father, begat Lycastes, and left him his Successor, who, on Ida the Daughter of Corybas, begat Minos the second, fathered also on Jupiter. He had Issue by Pasiphae, (Daughter to Sol and Crete) Dencalion Astrea, Androgeos, Ariadne, and other Children. Androgeos going to the Solemn Feast of the Panathenea, instituted by Theseus, at Athens, excelled all men in the Exercises then performed, whereby he became familiarly acquainted with the Sons of Pallas. This, when Ægeus perceived, fearing they might by his means receive some aid and affistance, he procured him to be made away, at which Minos fore aggrieved, came to Athens to demand fatisfaction, but obtaining none, is faid to have procured from Jupiter a Famine to fall upon all Greece, and especially Attica, which could not be abated, till he received fatisfaction. A yearly Tribute then he imposed on plutarely the Athenians, of seven Boyes, and as many Girls, which being unwillingly willing at spra. to submit to, they were fore displeased when they came to part with their Children, and repining at Higeus, as the Author of their Calamity, at the third time of sending, Theseus offered himself to go amongst the rest. The Fable is, that they were to be devoured of the Minotaure, a Monster, whose upper Parts were like to those of a Man, but resembled a Bull in the other. Some thought there might be fuch a Monster indeed, but most account it fabulous, and it is interpreted to be meant of one Taurus, the Captain of Minos, who might have custody of these Children, whom Aristotle will not have killed, but made Slaves till their death. Thefeus promising to kill this Minotaure, Ægeus with much adoe yielded he should go. and commanded the Master of the Ship, that, whereas for the sadness of the occasion they used black Sails, if his Son came back alive, he should change them for white ones, as foon as they came within kenning of Attica.

13. Theseus coming into Crete, by the help of Ariadne the Daughter of Minos, He killerh the (which fell in love with him) got into the Labyrinth where the Minotaure was kept (and which was made by Dadalus, who having killed his Sisters Son at Athens, fled into this Island) and slew him. It is thought, that when he landed, he Philotharus offered the Combat to whomsoever would accept of it, and that this Taurus, who apud Platarbore himself high upon his Valour, and was hated by all for his ill manners, was cham, ut says a state of the same state forced by Minos to accept of it. Thefens having killed him, was so admired by the King, that he gave him back the Children, and remitted the Tribute. Ariadne fell in love with him, whom, some say, he carried away with him, but others, that he left her behind, and the hanged her felf; feveral things, one contrary to another, being reported of her. Peace now being made, and Thefens returning homewards, they were so transported with Joy, that they forgot to set up the white Sails; where-The Death of upon Egeus, despairing of his Son's safety, threw himself headlong from a Rock

But Sect. 4. others think it was so called from Ege, the Island near Eubera; others from Ege a Town of Eubera; some from Æga, a Promontory of Æolis, and others from the Rock Æge, lying betwixt Tenedus and Chius; Again fome from Ægeus, the Name of Neptune in Pherecydes; and others from Egeon, the same with Briareus, and others from a Goat, because by it's Turbulency it leapeth like that Creature. Fefin, who deriveth the Name also from Ægans, mentioneth other two Originals as probable, viz. the many Islands, which to one looking at them afar off, appear as Goats, in the Greek Language called Ægæ; and the periffing of Ægæ the Queen of the Amazons in it. Concerning Egens, Suides telleth a long Story out of Nicocrates, which is refuted by the Scholiast of Apollonius, who concerning this, is to be consulted, together with Strabo and Pliny.

14. Theseus succeeding his Father, set himselfall manner of ways to deserve well A.M. 2775 of his Subjects; Whereas before they were dispersed in twelve Towns or more, he gathered them into one City, as being more convenient for Strength, Concord, and Dispatch of publick Business. This being hard to effect, by reason that the People were unwilling to quit their present Possessions for new Hopes, he went from Place to Place, flewing them the Convenience of the thing; and that he might effectually perswade, he promised them Liberty, offering to lay down all Power except that of the Generalship, and of keeping the Laws; in all other things to be like them, and the Power to rest in the People. The Multitude being allured by this Promife, he made the chief City, called Cecropia, his Regal Scat, and built another about it for the People, which he divided into three Ranks, of Nobility, Husbandmen, and Artificers, all under the same equality of Liberty and Law. But the former fort he appointed to be the Fountain of Magistracy; yet so, as elective by the Suffrages of the other two. He abolished the several Courts of Judicature belonging to the twelve Towns, and constituted one general Prytaneum in the City, Thus did he divest himself of all Royalty in a manner, and brought Popular-government into the State.

His Exploits.

15. As Hercules had instituted the Olympick Games in Honour of Jupiter, so he Platarets ordained the Isthmian, and dedicated them to Neptune. He failed with Hercules into the Euxine Sea (some say, by himself) against the Amazons, from amongst whom he got Antiope his Wife, which gave Occasion to that fort of Women to come against Athens. They fore distressed it by a Siege, till Peace was made by Antiope or Hippolyta, as others called her. Some have affirmed, that he was not Partaker in any Exploit with any of the Heroes of his time, except in that he helped the Lapithæ against the Centaurs. Others again contend, that he sailed to Colchos with Jason, and affisted Meleager in killing the Boar; whence came the Proverb, Non sine Thefeo: he also performed many brave things by himself, without the Affistance of any, hence he came to be counted Alter Hercules. Having contracted near Friendship and Alliance with Perithous the Son of Ixion, being now 50 years old, he joyned with him in stealing away Helena the Daughter of Tyndareus from Sparta, and when they cast Lots who should have her, she fell to him. He carried her to his Mother living at Aphidna, there to be kept till she were ripe for Marriage: But having agreed that he who obtained her, should help the other to procure him a Wife elsewhere, they both travelled into Epirus, to steal thence the Daughter of Aidoneus King of the Moloffians, whose Wife was called Proferpina, and his Dog Cerberus, he himself by the Fable being named Pluto. When he understood their Errand, that they came not to woe but to steal, he laid hands on them both, and caused his Dog to devour Perithous, kept Theseus in Prison, till Hercules desired he fhould be fet at Liberty.

16. Whilst Thefeus was absent, one Menestheus the Son of Peleus, (who was Grand-Son to Eredheus by his Son Orneus) incented the People against him, and that upon the Account of that Change he had made in the State, which he would have them believe was intended to enflave them under Pretence of Liberty: and at this time came down the Tyndaride, Castor and Pollux, (some think by his Procurement) against Athens in Behalf of their Sister. Finding that she was not there, and discovering the place of her Restraint, they went to Aphidna, and taking it by Force recovered her, and took Æthra the Mother of Theseus, which afterwards accompanied her as her Servant to Troy, and at the taking of that Town was fet at Liberty by her Grand-son Demophon. By Means of Menestheus, the Tindarida were received into Athens, and great Honour was done unto them, which thing contributed to his Delign. For when Theseus returned, the Citizens were so wrought upon, that in no wife would they be reconciled, and so was he forced to banish

17. Menestheus then began his Reign at Athens, in the days of Atreus King of Argos and Mycenæ, and some years after accompanied Agamemnon and Menelaus to the Siege of Troy, with fifty Ships. During the War, we hear little or nothing of him, but after the City was taken, he honoured the Funerals of Ajax the Son of Telamon with a Funeral Oration, which work belonged to Philoftratus in the Athenians to perform for those that died in the Wars; but within a while Hiroicia. he himself afforded Matter for that Office, dying in the Ille Melos at his Return Homewards. After his Death Demophon the Son of Theseus, (who together with his Brother Achames, (both begotten on Phadra) followed Elphenor to Troy) went to Athens and obtained the Kingdom. As he returned, Phyllis Daughter to Sichon and Queen of Thrace, fell in Love with him, and woo'd him for Marriage. He told her he would first go to settle his Affairs at Athens, and then come and Servius in Ec. marry her; but staying somewhat long, she had no Patience to wait, and think. lie. 5. Virgilling she was slighted, hanged her self. He stole the Palladium or Image of Pallas, from the Argives, who brought it from Troy, and in their Return with Diomedes made Encursions unwittingly into Attica, being driven by Night upon Phalerus, and not knowing where they were. He reigned about thirty four years, and then left his Kingdom to his Son Oxyntes, who after twelve was succeeded by Aphidas his Son, who reigned but one year. Then followed Thymates the fifteenth King, who Athanas, Thymetes declined the Combat, and for that was deposed. Melanthius a Messenian, who was then driven Pausan. in Atfrom Home by the Heraclida, accepted it, and overcame Xanthus the Bastian King ticis. by a Stratagem; for when they came to fight he cried out: Thou dost not justly Xan- Frontinus Strate thus, but contrary to our Agreement, who accompanied with another Person, comest to tagen 1.2.c.s. fight against me a single man, at which he wondering, and looking back to see who Eximp. 41. should follow him, Melanthins ran him through with his Lance. He then reigned Militaribitation in the room of Thymates, and at his Death left Codrus his Son his Succeffor; who king willingly offered himself to Death for the Safety of his Air. now Distasts arisen betwixt the Heraclide, who held Peloponnesus, and them, for Justin 110. 2. that they harboured the Iones, and other Fugitives out of that Country; and at Strabo lib.9. length the Heraclida intending to make War upon them, confulted the Oracle be-eight years lost the Kingdom. He was the last of the Erechthida that reigned at forehand concerning their Success, which answered, that they should have the better, if they kept off their Hands from the Athenian King, and not otherwise. They gave Order to their Men to beware of hurting him; but he getting Knowledge of the Matter, disguised himself, and going into their Army, by Blows provoked them to kill him. This being known, they raifed the Siege, though fome of them had already got into the City, on whom then the Athenians had Mercy, and dismissed them without any Harm. This happened 486 years after Cecrops, 114 after the De-A.M. 2935. itruction of Troy, 35 after the Return of the Heraclida, 293 before the first Olympi-

19. After Codrus his Death, the People took away the Title of King, and gave the finician Name of Archon with a diminished Power to his Successor, who might be called to an Account for what he did, though he kept the Principality during Life. This was Medon the Son of Codrus, whom the rest of his Brothers despising, as weak, and lame, led out Colonies of the Ionians, and some others (Attica being now full) in- them in Athi-Cities of Innia. to Asia, and there founded the 12 Famous Cities of the Ionians, viz. Ephesus, Mile- cis & Strabo tus, Priene, Colophon, Myus, Teos, Lebedus, Claromena, Erythra, Phocaa, Chius in 1.14. the Island Chios, and Samus in an Isle of the same Name over against Ephelias, which at first being subjected to several petty Princes, at length joyned in one Body politick, and became very famous in After-Ages. Twelve other Archons succeeded Medon, named from him Medontide, and in this Condition the State remained unaltered for 315 years, during which time there is little remarkable, either concerning Princes,

The last of all the fix was Eryxias, who after he had governed fix years, either di- Eufel ed, or being deposed for some Crime, opened the Door to a new and greater Innovation, after 70 years Continuance of the Decennal Government.

20. The People still burning with a Defire of greater Liberty, abolished quite A.M. 3318. the Power of a single Person, and instead of him made nine Archons, to be but annual, a new Election being to be made every year out of those who for Birth, de Royal, Athen. Wealth or Favour were most considerable in this City. The first in Order was duttonem Emproperly called Archon, as Principal of the Colledge, and Eponymus, because he mism-figned the Calendar, and all things that fell out in that year, were said to be done he being Archon. He had the Care of their Superstition; to him it belonged to take Cognisance of Differences arising about Inheritances, as also betwixt Husband and Wife, Parents and their Children, and Kinsfolks one amongst another: Moreover, he took Care of Orphans, and affigned them Guardians. The second in Order had the name of King, who taking Care also of another part of their Superstition, determined Causes both Civil and Criminal, or referred them to the greater Courts of Judicature. The third was called Polemarchus, who besides the Charge of some religious Customs, had that of War committed to him (whence he had his name) was General of the Armies abroad, and at home the Judge of Strangers. The other fix were termed The mothet e, being keepers of the Laws or Customs, Judges in several Cases, and had Power to commit to Prison all suspicious Persons. These were their distinct Offices. Altogether they had Authority to assemble the People as the Kings, and other Archons in former times, and to resolve with them about publick Bufiness.

21. Such were the Improvements of that Liberty, which Thefeus bestowed on the People: but though they feemed great, yet were they not arrived at that height as to satisfie the heady Multitude offended with the too great Power of the Nobler and Richer fort; and which finding it self aggrieved with the many Inconveniences that arole for want of Laws (the Sentence of the Magistrate, or Judge; being the only Law) many Grudges and Discords thence arose, which so far prevailed, as that after 50 years, Power was given to one Draco, a man honest and wise, but of auftere Severity, to make Laws. Many he framed, reformed the Court of the Epheta, which he made to conflit of 51 persons, not under 50 years of Age, who were to judge of Murders, and fuch like Crimes. But so severe were his Constitutions concerning Manners (judging no less than Death to the least Offence) that as they were by Demas faid to be written in Blood, so in Process of time they grew Plutarch in Sei intolerable, and little or no Relief had the poorer fort against the Power of the lost. great ones, with the Ufury of whom they were even exhaufted: Hence grew great Diffurbances in the Commonwealth, the Commons hated the Nobility, and the Nobility feared the Commons; nothing but Defolation seemed to attend the State; some being earnest for a Popular Government, others for an Oligarchy, and others for a middle way. These tempered, and poised the other two parties; but nothing at length seemed to avail, except all the whole Power should be put into the hands of one, and a plain Tyranny erected as the only sufficient Remedy for these desperate Distempers. The common fort were hot for an equal Division of the publick Grounds now in the hands of the rich, and fit to make themselves an head, and do it by Force; but the most prudent fort taking notice of Solon, now very eminent, a man of unblameable Life, and unbyaffed by the Interest of either Party; him they

A year or two before those great Disturbances, hapned that which gave a Rise came eminent, to the Eminency of Solon, and as well out of Respect to the Commonwealth, as in Relation to him, must be recited briefly. The Illand Salamine lying not far from Abens, Plataca. Solom confidering the Confequence hereof, counterfeited himself mad; and going into the Place of publick Meeting, began, as the People came about him, to say a Company of odd conceited Verses, whereby he so moved them, that they repealed the Law, and decreed another Expedition against the Megarians, ordaining him their Captain therein. Solon failing towards Colias, where the Athenian Women were keeping the Feast of Ceres, sent one to the Megarians, who counterseiting himself a Fugitive should tell them, that now at this Place they might easily surprize the Women. This being done, he fends them away, and in their Rooms and Cloaths, left there a Company of beardless young men, who being provided of Daggare, stabbed the Megarians when they came to seize on their Prey, and so by this Plot (which several Authors say was executed by Pissfratus, though devised by Solon) the Athenians again recovered the Island. Solon proved it to belong to Athens, for that Frontinus

Megarians buried their Dead in a careless manner, not regarding any such Position. 23. Solon having got much Credit by the Success of this Enterprize, procured fuch to be called to an Account, as had been guilty of the Death of Cylon. This Herad. 1. 5. man being famous for his Victory at the Olympick Games affected the Tyranny of Athens, and endeavouring to seize on the Castle, failed therein, and sled for Refuge to the Image of Minerva, whence the Magistrates giving him Hopes of Life, took him and his Companions, and notwithstanding put them to Death. This now was accounted a great Injury offer'd to the Goddess, and such, as both the Actors thereof, their Posterity and Country were esteemed as contaminate, and Ivable to heavy Punishment. Solon perswaded them to submit to Tryal, and 200 Judges were appointed out of the chiefest Persons, who condemned them to Banishment. Whil'st this was a doing the Megarians fell upon the Athenians, took Nijea, and recovered Salamis: fitange Sights also appeared, whereat the City was affighted, and their Prophets rold them that certain Crimes were committed, which must be expiated. For this Cause Epimenides a famous Philosopher (whom some reckon amongst the Number of the seven wise-men in the Room of Periander) was sent for out of Crete to cleanse the City; a Plague having also faln upon it at this time, as Diogenes Laertius writeth in his Life. Several Altars upon this Occasion he caused to be made, as amongst the rest one to Contumelie (or Reproach) and another to Impu-Ciaro de Ligimade, as amongst the rest one to commente (or received and another to imple bus lib. 2.

But these Calamities increasing publick Discontents, made the Assistance of Solon the more desirable. 24. He feared much to undertake so difficult a Task as a Settlement; and as for the Tyranny (so then it was termed) he refused it absolutely; though his Friends per-Liga Platanti. the common the Work of Reformation, and first of all eased the People of the great the notice the Common the Work of Reformation, and first of all eased the People of the great the solution that the work of Reformation, and first of all eased the People of the great the solution are the Common the Common the Work of Reformation, and first of all eased the People of the great the solution that the Common the Work of Reformation, and first of all eased the People of the great the solution that t then of their Debts, whereby they redeemed their Bodies and Estates; which Act was in Greek called Sifachthea. Some have thought that it was only of the Interest, but others of the Principal too, alledging him to have forgiven 5 (fome have faid 15) Talents that were owing to himself. However, he made them more able to fatisfie their Creditors by raifing the Value of Money, as of the Attick Mina from & 75 Drachms to 100. Then for the fettling of the Commonwealth; in way thereto, and in the first place he abrogated all Draco's Laws, except that against Murther, as too severe. The four Tribes of the People he left as they were ordered by Erechtheus, distinguished into Souldiers, Crafts-men, Husbandmen, and Keepers of Goats; but for that here was no Distinction made according to Estates, and it concerned those that had most therein to take Care of the Commonwealth, he also divided the People into four Ranks, or Classes, according to their Substance, and out of the three first ordered all Magistrates to be chosen, the fourth and last having equal Votes in the great Council, or Affembly of the whole Body of the State, in which lay the Supream Power. The first was called Pentacosio Medimni, the second was Sect. 4. the Ordo Equestris, the third called Zengita, and the fourth Theta. Hereby he gave a Right to the common fort to elect, and call to account the Magistrates. to have an hand in making, and repealing Laws, and in the highest Court of Judicature, by which equal Temper, he suppressed all these Factions that had lately risen. And yet, lest the Multitude should be too much elevated, besides the Court of Areopagus he instituted a Senate of four hundred, (a hundred to be chosen out of each Tribe) through which all things should pass into the great Assembly, wherein nothing was to be debated, but what was offered from this Council, elected anew every year. 25. The College of the nine Archons he left Elective as he found it ; but ordained that they should not be admitted to take their Oath, till they had first in the Senate made Proof of their Descent, and the Unblameableness of their Life (especially of their Duty to their Parents) and then been approved in the great Affembly, after which they were to take their Oath in the Kings Gate, to keep the Laws, and a gept of no Bribes; or if they should be thereof detected, then to erect at Delphos a Statue of Gold of their own Bigness: and the same Oath they Financian in dewere again to take as they went up to the Castle, crowned with Myrtle. Unto fript. Reip. them severally he assigned their Offices; for the most part as they were before, Athen-only more certain; for a Reward of their good Service, if after much and through Examination they were found Upright and Faithful, they were to be chosen unto the Senate of Areopagus, the Colledge of the Archons being hereby constituted the Seminary of it. To this Council, consisting of most grave, experienced, and upright men, an Inspection was given into all Concernments of State, a Power of preferving the Laws and Customs, and also of reforming Manners, in which Particular they were so severe, that once they condemned a Boy, for a Custom of pulling out the Eyes of Quails, as hereby betraying a bad Dispofition. They met ordinarily thrice a Moneth on Mars his Hill (whence the Council had its name) but extraordinarily as Occasion required, and then in the Place called the Kings Gallery. As for the Council of State confifting of 400, it had Power also to determine great Matters and Controversies of it self, and if it faw it convenient, to report them to the People. If the Affent of the People was had, then paffed it's Acts and Constitutions into firm Laws; if not, they continued in Force one year, and no longer. To this Council moreover it belonged, to provide for fuch as were grown poor, and were to be maintained by the Publick; to call all indebted to the State to an Account, and provide for the making of Gallies.

Chap. V.

26. To the great Affembly of the People alone belonged the Power of making of the People and nulling Laws, of Peace and War, fending Ambassadors, and giving the Freedom of the City. When they met together they took an Oath, with a bitter Execration, to confult the best they could for the Good of the Commonwealth. Those that were above fifty years of Age spake first, and after the Business was throughly debated, they fignified their Pleasure by holding up their Hands. Solon ordained that all the Laws should be reviewed once a Year, being cited by the The (mothetæ. But when any were to be abrogated, or new ones made, the whole Affembly took not that matter of Debate upon it felf; but committed it to the Care of the most grave and prudent amongst them, chosen for that Purpose and called Nomothetæ, amongst which none were admitted, but such as had dealt in the most important Affairs. Before them five Orators (called Syndici) pleaded concerning any Law that was to be abolished, which should not be done without mature Advice, left thereby an Occasion might be given to Sedition and Innovation; and what was concluded by the Nomotheta, the Body of the People always approved. The Assembly was had ordinarily thrice in 35 days, at the Pleafure of the Council of State or 400; but extraordinarily upon Occasion called together, either by the same Authority of the same Strategi or Generals for War. and fometimes of the nine Archons.

Courts of Judi-

27. For Courts of Judicature, besides the Areopagites formerly mentioned, there was that of the Epheta, founded, as it's thought, by Demophon the Son of Theseus, consisting at first of 50 Judges chosen out of Attica, and as many from Argos; but Draco excluding the Strangers, made the Number only 51 Citizens, and after him Solon tempering the Rigor thereof, transferred thence the more weighty matters to Areopagus, leaving the Judgment of casual homicide, and lying in Wait for Life, in some Cases to it. The Causes brought in thither were re-

Sect. 4. ported by the King or second Archon. There was another Court most large and common, confifting of 500, 1000, or sometimes 1500 Persons, according to the Occasion, chosen by Lot out of all the Citizens of thirty years old and upwards. They judged of many, and often of the greatest Causes; and this was called the Heliastick Council, because they sate in an open place where the Sun shone. A fourth Court there was of Arbitrators, confilting of two hundred and twenty, chosen out of the Tribes, and being equally divided according to the Number of them, heard and determined their Causes. A fifth and least Considerable there was yet, made up of thirty Persons at the first, afterwards increased to forty, going in Circuit to the feveral forts of People gathered by Thefeus into one City, heard and judged leffer Matters. As for the Officers belonging to the feveral Courts, the twelve men for Imprisonment and Execution, with the Officers of the feveral Tribes, they are scarce to be mentioned by this Work.

The Athenian Commonwealth.

Particular

28. For particular Laws. Solon knowing what a Multitude of People inhabited Athens, took such Care for the Prevention of Idleness, that he absolved Platarch in So. any Son from the Duty of maintaining his Father fallen into Poverty, that had lonnot procured him to be instructed in some Trade: and the same Liberty he gave unto fuch as were born of Strumpets. He made a Law whereby he gave Leave to the People to make Testaments, which they never could do before; all the Estates of deceased Persons going to the next Heir. He forbad Women to have any Portions, lest Marriages should be made for Gain; yet succeeded they in the Inheritances of their Fathers, in Default of Islue Male. Some things about Marriages and Adultery he decreed, which have been noted, and not unworthily, as abfurd. He commanded the Court of Areopagus, to take an Account of all Persons how they lived, and punish those that could render none. He forbad all native Fruits, except that of the Olive, to be transported out of Attica. And nothing is more memorable than this, that he deprived of all Honour, and rendred infamous those, that, in a time of Faction and Sedition in the City, joyned themselves to neither Party, concluding, that such as were concerned for the Good of the Commonwealth, would according to their best Apprehensions, side with such as contended for it. His Laws he exposed to publick View, that none should pretend Ignorance in them. He sware the People, Magistrates, and Senate, to observe them for an hundred years, and the Archons, if they brake them, to fet up a Statue at Delphos, of their own Bigness. Then to conclude his Work, he reformed the Calendar, much amis at that time, and reduced the Year into fuch a Form as was agreeable to the Motion of the

Solon travel-

29. The Work being over, there wanted not those who would both Praise-Idem ibid. & and Discommend it. Some would be amending it by Addition, others by Sub-Hyrodotus I. 1. straction or Change, so that plainly seeing what Stir would be about it, he got Leave to travel for ten years; in which time he went into Egypt, where he conversed with Amesis, and into Lydia, where he had that notable Conference with Crassus before mentioned. But while he was abroad, the City anew brake into Factions. There were the Pediaans headed by Lycurgus, the Paralians by Megacles, and the Diacrians by Pilistratus, one who was descended from Codrus the last King. To the latter, a Company of the poorer fort joyned themselves, such as were most inveterate against the Rich, and although they had not much to fay against Solon's Laws, yet were they desirous of Innovation, hoping to be Gainers therein. Things were in this Posture when Solon returned home, who being received with much Honour, laboured by his Authority to take off the Ring-leaders of the several Factions, and reconcile them. Pilistratus seemed to give Ear to him, being a man of deep Dissimulation, and so much apter to deceive, in that no man appeared so great a Friend to Equality as he, and therefore a greater Enemy to the Change of the present Government. But Solon quickly found him out; yet prosecuted him not with any open Malice, but fought to draw him from his Defigns by fair Means, often professing, that no man was more inclined to Virtue, or to make a good Commonwealths-man, if the Desire of Rule and Sovereignty were but taken from him.

30. For all this, Pififratus proceeded, and by his seeming Readiness to patronize the poorer Sort against the rich, invaded the Tyranny. He wounded himself and his Chariot-Horses, and drove into the Forum, making Shew of an Plutarch at six Tyranny.

Chap. V. Escape from great Danger, and desired of the People that he might have a Sect. Guard affigured him to defend his Person. He so far prevailed, as to have fifty Persons allowed him, though Solon Stepping to him, told him he did not well to act Ulysses in Homer, (who, as he counterfeited himself wounded to circumvent A.M. 3425.

his Enemies, so did he the same, that he might cheat his Fellow Citizens) and opposed the thing as much as possible. Having obtained the Liberty of so many Followers, he took Leave to increase their Number, and thereby got the Castle Piffiratus in- into his Hands, at which the City was much startled. Solon went into the Affembly of the People, where upbraiding them with their former Stupidity, he earnestly exhorted them yet now to pluck up that Tyranny by the Roots, which before they might have so easily prevented; but not at all prevailing, such Consternation had seized upon men's Spirits, he got him to his House, and laying his Weapons before his Court-gate, faid, he had discharged his Duty towards his Country, and thenceforth kept himself quiet, continuing in the City, though his Friends moved him to flie for his Life. But fuch a Reverence bore Pifftratus not only to his Person, but also to his Laws, that he retained still the most of them in their former Vigour. A few he made himself, as one for Maintenance of Maimed Souldiers (though fome attribute this also to Solon, and say, the Occafion was given by one Thesippus) and another against Idleness, whereby he caused the Ground to be more diligently tilled, and the City more quiet than usual. By these two he effectually provided for his own Interest, obliging the Souldiers by the one, and by dispersing the People into the Country through the other (under Pretence of preventing Idlenets, and keeping up Tillage) cutting off from them all Occasion of plotting any thing prejudicial to him. For he knew well, that as Thefens his gathering them all up into one Town, conduced to the Periwafion of that Liberty he meant to bestow on them, so this contrary way tended as much to the keeping of his arbitrary Power.

Expelled.

31. Being feized of the Sovereignty, he carried it exceeding well to People, Magistrates, and Laws, and much adorned the City, of which he held Possession about three years. Then Megacles and Lycurgus, with their Parties, so prevailed, Hyadet I. r. as they banished both him and his Tyranny, and being condemned, his Goods cap. 59. were fet to Sale, of which none but Callias the Son of Phanippus would adventure to buy any. But not long it was, before those that cast him out, became the Means of his Restitution; for falling out amongst themselves, Megacles, upon Promise that he would marry his Daughter, covenanted to bring it about. and effected it by a strange and ridiculous Wile. There was a Woman in the Val. Max. 1. 1. City named Phya, almost four Cubits tall, but otherwise of tolerable Beauty: 6.2. Ext. exher being armed, curiously dressed and seated in a Chariot, they drove into the emp. 2. This being acted with wonderful Confidence, the Citizens were so far besotted, as to adore this Woman for Minerva, and received Pifftrains as brought by her; whereby he recovered the Tyranny about five years after his Expulsion.

Reftored.

32. He married the Daughter of Megacles, according to Agreement; but having several Sons already in the Flower of their Age; and Megacles being supposed guilty of that heinous Crime about the Death of Cylon, not yet expiated, lest he should put them beside their just Expectations, and his Family be attainted, he Harodot I. I. neglected to use her as his Wife. She concealing this for some time, at length revealed it to her Mother, who told it to Megacles. He took it in great Disdain, and reconciled himself to his Enemies, consulting again how he might out him; which Pilistratus understanding, departed of his own Accord out of Attica, and went to Eretria a City of Eubæa in the third year of the 54th Olympiad, about ten years after his Restitution. Ten other years he continued in Exile, at the end whereof, by the Advice of his eldest Son Hippias, he laboured again for a Recovery of his Principality. Scraping together all the Money he could make, he drew the Thebans and Argives into Confederacy with him, and got Marathon a Town of Attica into his hands, whither flocked to him from Athens, and the Country round about, those of his Faction. He marched then against the City, and And again re- put such to slight as came out against him, but fearing they might rally again, he gave Order to his Sons to ride after, and bid them fear nothing, so they would but get them to their own Homes, and be quiet. Thus recovered he the Tyranny once more, which he laboured to establish, not by the shedding of Blood (from which he wholly abstained, and therefore hath the best Report of any of his Condition)

Not long after his Restitution he died (for his whole Reign including the Exile, amounted but to thirty three years) about the time that Crassus King of Lydia was overthrown by Cyrus, in the A. > 33. This only could be reprehended in Pififtratus, that he had cast the Yoak upon his Country. For fuch an one it was as had no great Weight in it, more than what lay in the Minds of the Athenians, not accustomed fince the days of Theseus, to ftoop to Sovereignty. Though he commanded them to apply themselves to plateth & Husbandry (contrary to what Theseus had done, who gathered them out of the plateth & Country into the City) that he might take them off from plotting against him. yet required he no other Tribute than the Tenths of their Profit, which had wont to be payed to the former Kings. He killed no man, neither banished any; he made Spoil of no mans Fortune or Estate, injured none by any contumelious Demeanour, abused neither the one Sex nor the other through any libidinous Carriage. The Laws of Solon with the Order of Magistrates he left as he found; and though he had most Cause to be averse to him, yet detained he him in Town when he would have been gone, defiring his Counsel and Advice for the better Government of the Commonwealth, contenting himfelf only in having a Power greater than the Laws, in which Respect Cicero was wont to call Julius Casar, who trode in his Steps, by the Name of Pififtratus. He was as Learned as any in his Gellius I. 6. c. Time, and deferred very well of Learning, being the first that erected a publick the State Library. Whereas Homer's Verses before this were scattered abroad and consused, Library. he purchased with Gold whatsoever of his Works he could come by, and setting 6.14. on Work the ablest Grammarians, put them into that Order of Iliads and Odaffes, in which they are now found; to which work Solon is said to have contributed his Diligence. He had two Sons, Hippias and Hipparchus, to whom he left the Principality of Athens. They for many Years reigned, as lovingly betwirt themselves, so with Moderation towards their Subjects, till the younger being slain by Harmodius and Aristogiton, upon Occasion of some Injury supposed to be offered by him to the Sifter of Harmodius, the other exasperated hereat grew severe towards the Athenians, and for that was expelled by them four years after his Brothers Death, and his Tyranny was utterly subverted. But these things falling in with the Reign of Darius, the Son of Hystaspes, belong properly to another

The most antient Kingdom and Commonwealth of Lacedamon.

Helena.

His Country was most antiently inhabited by a people called (a) Leleges, (a) Paulaias fo named from Lelex their King, said to be an Indigena, or a natural of the in initio Launiplace, because it was uncertain from what Countrey he and his people came. From microum. him this Region was called Lelegia, and Lelegis. He left two fons, Myles and Polycaon, whereof the former succeeded him in his Kingdom, and the latter marrying Messen, the daughter of Triopas King of Argos, went and subdued that Countrey, which from her he named Messenia. Myles was succeeded by his son Eurotas, who perceiving the water to stand in the grounds, drew a Ditch from it to the Sea, which draining the earth, continued to be a River, bearing his name. He, dying without iffue-Male, left his Kingdom to Lacedamon, the son of Jupiter and Taygeta, from which woman the Mount Taygetus took its name. For Lacedamon matried Sparte, the daughter of Eurotas, and when he came first to the Kingdom, named the Countrey from himself, and to the City which he built gave his wive's name; it being ever after most properly called Sparta, when any distinction was made betwixt Country and City; although it be also sometimes read Lacedamon, as in (b) Thucydides, and Latine (c) Authors. As for the Inhabitants of both places, (b) Liv. t. those of the City are by Herodotus, Xenophon and Diodorus called Spartiati, in House Acutopposition to those that lived up and down in the Countrey, comprehended under (c) Livius 138. the name of Lacedamonians. The City was built in the days of Crotopus, King of Argos, and Amphitryon of Athens, 303 years before the destruction of Troy, 711 be-

Amyclas the fon and successor of Lacedamon (d) begat three sons, which are (d) Passan ut recorded, Argalus, Cynortas, and Hyacinthus: of which the latter, as Apollodorus Inpidwriteth, being for his beauty the delight of Apollo, was killed by him at unawares, when they were at play. Argalus succeeded his Father, and left his Kingdom to his brother Cynortas, whose son and Successor was Oebalus, from whom the Countrey was also called * Oebalia, and thence Castor and Pollux, by Statius, Oebalida fratres, * Servius ad On his first Wife he begat Hippocoon, and Icarion, and on his second Gorgophone Georg. 4. till at length he was restored by Hercules, (who slew Hippocoon and his ten Sons, but, with a great number of the Spartans;) but on this condition delivered was the Kingdom to him, to keep it for Hercules his own Children, and restore it when it flould be demanded. Tyndareus of Leda, the Daughter of Thesius an Hostan, begat Castor and Pollux, (called Dioscuri, as the supposed off-spring of Jupiter) and on her, or some other, a Daughter named Helena. The two Sons being samous Cafter and Telin their lives, grew more renowned after their death, having the efteem of Gods. and from them was named the Constellation of Gemini. Helena was she that made fuch a broil in the World, being first stoln by Thefere, afterwards married to Menelaus, and from him stoln again by Paris, who kept her till the destruction of Troy, as hath been shown. Her two Brothers dying before their Father, Menelawa with her obtained the Kingdom of Lacedamon, through the special favour of Tyn- A.M alon dareus, who, from amongst 29 Suitors, (all Princes of Greece) made choice of him, Lest those great ones should fall out amongst themselves, he bound them all with an Oath to be Defendants to whomfoever he would give her; which he did by

> 3. Menelaus on aflave begot two base Sons: but by Helena had onely a Daughter named Hermione, which he married first to Orestes, the Son of his Brother Agamemnon, and again taking her from him, gave her to Pyrrhus the Son of Achilles. It's thought that Orestes killed Pyrrbus; for after his death he presently resumed his Wife, and Menelaus once dead, he added the Kingdom of Lacedamon to his other two of Mycene and Argos; for the Lacedemonians were more willing to receive him as their Prince, than Nicostratus and Megapenthes the bastard Sons of Menelaus. Tifamenus his Son succeeded him in his Kingdoms, out of all which he was outed by the Heraclidæ, or posterity of Hercules, as before was shewed, by the help of the Dores; with him the Acheans being also banished, who were O. riginally of Phthiotis in Theffaly; for Achaus their Progenitor was the Son of Xuthus, Grand-fon to Deucalion by his Son Hellen. Argos fell to Temenus by lot; Crefphon- A.M. 2901, tes got Messene; and Lacedamon became the portion of Procles and Eurysthenes the Sons of Aristodemus, who was slain at Delphos (for Pausanias judgeth this the Eurysthemes ob- most probable opinion) by the fraud of Pylas, when they were preparing for the Expedition. Thenceforth the Lacedamonians were accounted Dores; who if formerly they were part of the Acheans, and going to Troy, at their return were expelled by those that remained at home, and so forced to seek out new seats, and received the name of Dores from their Captain, as Plato writeth; then had they full as much right to the Countrey as the Heraclida themselves, the title of whom we have formerly shewn. This change happened 80 years after the destruction of Troy, as Thucydides gathereth; 327 before the first Olympiad, in the days of Melanthus, Father to Codrus the last King of Athens, in the year of the 4. The two Brothers Eurysthenes and Procles were Twins, and that so like, as

In their minority Theres their Uncle by the Mother's fide managed the Kingdom for them, in obeying whom they ever agreed; but in nothing elfe, though Twins, and so like one another. This difference was in a manner propagated to their posterity, which continued on both sides for many Generations downwards by the names of Eurysthenide and Proclide; and being partakers in what is commonly accounted to bear no corrivals, no wonder it is that Emulation should be continued, but much that for so long it kept within the bounds of civil concord. After these two followed their two Sons: Agis for Eurysthenes, (from whom the Kings of this family were also called Agida) and Plutarch. in Soils for Procles. In their time it happened that the Inhabitants of Helos (a Town 19cargo. built by Helius the youngest Son of Perseus) were made Slaves (both they and their posterity) to the Lacedamonian State: for whereas they as well as others had Strabolib 8. formerly the freedom of the City, and were Members of the Commonwealth, Agis pag 363.67365. took away that privilege, and ordered them to pay Tribute to Sparta, which refuling to doe, and standing out, they were thus punished; all other Slaves to that State, though of what Original foever, being called after them Helota. Agis dy- Eufel. ing, was succeeded by Echestratus his Son; and Sons some years after left for his Successor his Son Eurytion, (called otherwise Eurypon, and Euryphon) from whom the Kings of that family were also named Eurytionida. Echestratus was followed by Labotas his Son, and Eurytion by Prytants, in whose reign the first quarrel arose betwirt the Lacedamonians and Argives. Labotas being dead, Doryssus his Son fucceeded him in the Kingdom; and in like manner after the death of Prytanis, Euromus his Son continued the fuccession of that family.

Archelaus the Son of Agesilaus succeeded his Father, and was accompanied in the Government by Polydectes, who dying with Plutarch at out iffue left his inheritance to Lycurgus his Brother. Lycurgus then governed fupra. as King, but not long after his Brother's Wife proved to be with Child. She fent to acquaint him therewith, and to tell him, that if he would marry her she would make away the Infant. He detefting from his heart fuch Villany, yet returned her no denial, but defired her not to practife any thing upon her felf whereby the might come in danger, for when the Child was once born he would take care for the destruction of it; and by this deceit he drew her on till the time of her Travel. When that came he fent some to observe her, with command, if it were a Girl, to deliver it to the Women, but if a Boy, to bring it straight unto him. As he was supping with the Magistrates, a Boy was born and brought to him, who taking him in his Arms, told the Spartans that there was their King, and presently put him in the Royal feat. And because all men wonderfully rejoyced at so A. M. 3107. ffrange a thing, admiring his Magnanimity and Justice, he gave to the Child the name of Charilans.

He went first into Crete, where he made Observations of the Laws and Customes of that Commonwealth instituted by Minos, (which afterwards he made his Pattern) and whence he sent Thaletas, an eminent Lyrick Poet of those times, by his charming Verses to stir up the Lacedamonians to Love and Unity. From Crete he passed over into Asia, (that he might compare the Luxury thereof with the Cretian Severity, and as good Physick make up a temper out of both) where he found Homer's Verses, kept as it seemeth by the Sons of Creophylus, (the Poet being dead not above thirty years before) which he then copied out, and bringing them home, first made them publick in Greece, though in great disorder; in which they continued till the days of Pisistratus. The Egyptians reported that he came down into their Countrey, and there learnt the diffin-tion of Military men from Artificers, and those of other Callings. But whilst he thus improved himself abroad, he was much wanted at home, and often earnestly solicited to return by all parties.

7. For great need there was of his Presence to heal the Distempers into which the State was now fallen, the heady Multitude having by its defire of loose liberty brought all things into confusion. The first Government, till the coming in of the Heraclidæ, for any thing that can be known, was meerly absolute; and afterwards we do not find that the Regal power was diminished till Eurypon, or Eurytion, most imprudently let loose the reins of Government. This gave occasion to the Rabble to fly high in disobedience, and contest with his Successours when they endeavoured the recovery of their old Authority. Many great tumults and feditions were hence raifed, infomuch that Eunomus, the Grand-fon of Eurypon, Father of Lycurgus, and fifth from Procles, was murthered in one of them with a Butcher's knife. These Distempers increasing, and the Kings not being strong Pluster. enough to rule the diffolute Rabble, nothing but absolute ruin and destruction was expected, when Lycurgus returning home (of whose prudence and integrity they had had formerly large demonstrations) alone seemed able to give any hope of better things.

This was the fcope he aimed at, to make provision for Equality, which he thus was the scope ne aimed at, to make provinon for equality, which he lesh the state. thought to be the best Nurse of Concord, and the Bulwark of all Societies; to accustom the People from their tender years to obey the Laws and Magistrates, and hereby to render them more inclinable to live juftly and frugally, to bridle all corrupt affections, endure labour and hardship, refuse no danger for the pu-blick good, nor Death it self if the case required. Having therefore a defign to make a full evacuation of all bad humours, as he accounted them, and knowing how full of difficulty and danger this might prove to the Body politick, the minds of men much loathing so violent a Purgation, he considered that they were apt to be led by a shew of Religion; and having learn'd how Minos pretended to have received his Laws from Jupiter, with whom he conversed in a Cave, he resolved to go to Delphos, and make use of that Oracle to the same advantage. There was he received with incouraging words, faluted, Beloved of the gods, a God rather then a Man, and received in an Oracle the frame of a Commonwealth, which bringing home, he called Rhetra, to gain the more Authority to it. At his return he first consulted with his intimate Friends, and drew others on by degrees, till having made a Party, he ordered thirty principal persons to go armed into the Market-place betimes in the morning, that they might thereby strike a terrour into their Adversaries. let him propose concerning matters, or null them. Gamodan, Gorian, &c. In these words of the Oracle, faith Plutarch, Obe, and Phyle (that is, Tribes) fignific certain parts, into which the People was to be divided : the Kings are called Archagete, as Captains: and to affemble the People, is in Greek expressed by apollazein, for that he attributed the beginning and cause of the Commonwealth to Apollo Pythius. Babycas and Cnacion is at this day called OEnuns. Aristotle Writeth, that Cnacion is the name of the River, and Babycas of the Bridge. In the middle betwixt these the Concio was assembled, though there was neither Gallery nor any other accommodation; because he thought that those things conduced nothing to Council, but rather hindred; for that Statues, Pictures, the Attiringrooms of Theatres, and Withdrawing-rooms of the Court, being too curiously adorned, made those that met light and vain, diverting them with toys and idle thoughts. The Multitude being affembled into one place, power was not granted to any of the People to propose: they could onely enact what the Senatours and Kings had propounded. But in after-times, the common People perverting and wresting their Suffrages, Polydorus and Theopompus, then Kings, added this to the Rhetra: But if the People resolve upon any bad thing, let it be lawfull for the Senatours and Kings to dissent; that is, saith Plutarch, let them not ratisse it. but forthwith dismiss the Assembly; seeing the People depraveth the Decree, and altereth what is best. As for Gamodan and Gorian, Plutarch doth not interpret them, and it cannot be understood what they mean. Another Rhetra was this; That they should use no written Laws. Another, concerning Expences, commanded, That the roof of every house should be made with an Axe onely, and the doors with a Saw. And a Third ordained, That War should not be often made upon the Same Enemies; lest, learning to defend themselves, they should thereby be made warlike: which afterwards was laid to the charge of Agellaus in behalf of

The Lacedamonian Commonwealth

10. Having prepared all things for his purpose, he dissolved the Government of his Forefathers. For though he left two Kings as he found, with the same Right of Succession, yet took he away almost their whole Power, instituting a Senate to restrain them, and be an equal poize betwixt them and the People, to reduce both Parties into order. Without the Authority of this Senate the Kings could not decree nor undertake any thing of confequence. He ordered they should sit in the chiefest places as Members of the Lege Platar-Senate, first speak their minds and give their Suffrages; but conclude no-concentration thing without consent of the major part. All Magistrates, till the impudent abbasem same. Ephori took fo much upon themselves, rose up to, and did them reve- wm, & Dobits rence. Their employment was to take care of Sacrifices, to command the Py- in titulus, The thii, whereof two constantly attended them, to be fent to consult the Ora- Stunbling-block of Discocle of Apollo Pythius at Delphos: they took care of Embassadours and other bedience dis-Strangers, of the causes of Women that were Heirs; Adoptions also they had covered on charge of, so as none could be made without them. They gave answer to Embassadours, and looked to the Repairing of High-ways. This was their condition at home, which amounting to no more then titulary Royalty, after that the present Kings had either given away their just Right, (as Plutarch telleth us, that Charilaus joyned with his Uncle) or were deprived of it by the Treason and Violence of Lycurgus and his Party; the attempt of some men is as ridiculous as feditious, who taking it for granted that the popular Villains, the Ephori, were 130 years after this fet up by the People to restrain the Kings, (which yet cannot be granted, though most have so thought) thence would draw a Precedent to the disadvantage of true Royal Majesty. For these Kings were not real Kings as to Prerogatives of Majesty, being scarcely so much as a Duke of Venice.

11. Abroad they were the Generals of Armies, which were left to their ordering or disposal; so as no Council of War, or any in Commission could thwart their Commands; they onely receiving Orders from the State for their expeditions and returns. They had Judges to accompany them, a General of the Horse, four Polemarchi, besides Colonels, and other inferiour Officers, whose advice, as well as help, in the War they might use, but were at their own disposal, and obnoxious to none of them. And what is here spoken of a King, is to be extended to his Protectour, Guardian, or Tutour in his minority, by the Lacedamonians called Prodicus. Such were chosen to this trust and charge as were nearest of kin by the Father's fide to the Orphans, and confequently the next Heirs, that whofe was the hope, his also might be the burthen. This appeareth by several examples of Lycurgus himself, Aristodemus, and Pausanias, to be related in their due places. Which though it be not admitted in other Commonwealths, and perhaps with good reason, yet these Prodici having all in their power, scarcely ever any of them was found to have plaid false, or, by treachery towards their Pupills, gone about to make way for their own preferment.

The Senate.

Book I.

12. The Senate confifted of 28 persons, besides the Kings, not under 60 years Less Plutarch. of age. The first were such as had affisted Lycurgus, and been helpfull to him in in Lycurge, the Settlement, whom he ordered to continue for Life, except they committed Platam. de · cgib. any Offence worthy of feclusion; conceiving it not safe for this his Commonwealth, th. 3. to have a frequent change of Senatours, which the Kings might improve to their Ariflo. Polit own interest. Into this second rank of dignity were none to be admitted, but such members as had well deserved of the State by good service or eminent vertue; that so it might be a reward to old men, and an incouragement to the younger fort, to be conformable to the Laws. They had in effect the whole executive power in their hands. They had the supreme power of Judicature, wherein they proceeded not rashly, but with great advice and delay, deferring Judgement most commonly for some days, till they had heard both parties, and received the testimonies of witnesses: yet it was lawfull afterwards to appeal from them to the People. They were not liable to be called to an account for whatfoever they did: which immunity, as exceeding the moderation of a Commonwealth, (together with their fuing to the Peo- Folinic lib. 2.c 8. ple for their Places, whereas able and honest men should be sought for,) amongst other things is taxed by Ariftotle.

13. A Reverend and Learned man observeth, that whatever the Kings lost, Dr. Herlin. the People got little by the alteration, being left out of all imployment in affairs of State, and forced to yield obedience unto Thirty Masters, whereas before they had but Two. For the Kings and Senate affembled, and dismissed them when they pleased, and propounded to them what they thought convenient. For the People so affembled it was not lawfull to propound any thing to be debated or determined, nor to deliver their opinion in the Point propounded: there being nothing left to them, but to testifie their affent to the Propositions made either by the Kings or Senate. But the cunning flattery of the Ephori in after-times much enlarged the power of the People. By the appointment of Lycurgus it met at the River Cnacion (afterwards called OBnuns) by the Bridge Babycas. Sometimes onely the Spartans, or Inhabitants of the City, met together, and then it was called the Plutareh in Ly-Lesser Assembly: but otherwhiles the whole Body of the Lacedamonians gathered curgo. Xenoph. Helle-Leffer Affembly: but otherwines the minor Body of the Commonwealth, which went by the nic. ib. 3. 6. name of the Greater Meeting or Assembly, called then simply * Ecclesia.

14. Having reduced the Government to this Antimonarchical pass, he rightly Plutarch in vita judged it could not fubfift without levelling. He therefore attempted a thing most Lieuwij & in An Equality of difficult, and even beyond all hope of attaining. Many that had got much wealth & Names & In in the late turbulent times, he persuaded to part with most of it, and to an equal di- Agide, & alibi. vision of the grounds, urging, that no Inequality was to be amongst them, but what Vice and Vertue made; and what by arguments drawn from convenience, as others from necessity that lay upon them from the indigent and displeased Multitude, he brought his Design to perfection. Then divided he the grounds into 30000 Lots, or equal Portions, whereof 9000 he laid to the City of Sparta it felf, (the number of Citizens amounting to fo many,) and distributed the rest to the other Lacedamonians inhabiting the Countrey. Each Portion contained fo much as to maintain a family in a frugal way, and no more. To the Kings a larger quantity was affigned for the maintenance of their Degree, so much as might serve with moderation, and not make them abound in Riches.

15. That he might take away Covetousness, and the desire of hoarding up wealth, he forbade the use of Silver and Gold Coin, putting in the room thereof Iron money, of which a great quantity amounting but to a little value, no confiderable payment could be made without the help of an Horse or Waggon. Hereby it came to pass that they were unfit to Traffick with other people, no Merchandize being imported, which he herein aimed at, as well as by another Law made exprefly against the continuance of Strangers in the City; fearing more the Contagion of the mind in his People then that of the body. And otherways to prevent Luxu- Platarch. ry, he forbade that any man should eat at home by himself, or with his family, or to make any private Feasts, without some special occasion; but ordered them to fup together in common, without any distinction of Dignity or Fortune, by fifteen together. Each one fent in his Provision monthly; as Meal, Wine, Cheese, and Figs, with a little money to buy other Victuals. If any had killed Venison, or offered Sacrifice, whereby any Flesh was gotten, the ancient men left that to the younger fort, and contented themselves with Broaths, of which a black fort was most used, of no pleasant taste to such as were not accustomed to eat it. As for Fish, and all kind of delicate Cates, they were utterly forbidden. None were to eat or drink beyond fuch a proportion as fufficed Nature: the Kings indeed were allowed a double Mess, but this was, that they might have opportunity to pleasure and countenance others with part of it. All came to these publick Meetings (which first were called Andria, after the name of those of the Cretians, from whom Lycurgus borrowed this Constitution, afterwards Phyditia and Syllitia) with their Arms, and after Supper were to go home without Torch or Candle, though never fo dark, that they might learn, if need should be, to make the same shift when they lay abroad in the field. All stately Buildings he forbad, and all Trades that tended any way to the maintenance of Luxury or Excess.

The Pholicia and Sylvia.

The Education

16. But to have these Customes durable, it being highly necessary to breed up the youth in fuitable Discipline, he also provided for that in ample manner. The first thing previous to education was very unnatural and cruel; for the Infant, as foon as born, was carried to the most ancient of that Tribe to be viewed; and if it was found any way deformed, weak, or fickly, whereby might be judged that it would rather prove burthensom then beneficial to the Commonwealth, then was it to be exposed upon the craggy places of the Hill Taygetus, there to take such quarter as wild beafts, fowls, hunger and cold would afford it. But if it feemed Platarch, in firong, lufty, and worthy to live, then was it restored to its Parents to be nursed. Lycurgo. And nurfed it was very harfuly, not used to any delicate or costly feeding, and so used to darkness and solitariness as not to be affrighted at them. When the Children were seven years old, they were not committed to any mercenary School-mafters, after the custom of other people, but to the care of the Publick, being distributed into several Companies, over which some that were most fierce, hardy and prudent amongst them were set as Captains, who governed them in their sports and exercises, and to whose correction they submitted. There were also most commonly some men present at their exercises, who would rebuke and chastise them, observing which had the most notable spirits; Lycurgus leaving it in charge to the Lacedamonians, to take care of other mens Children as of their own. All manner of ways were they inured to labour and pains. Their Hair was cut close to their heads, they went bare-footed from their Infancy, fought with one another naked with as much earnestness as might be, and after a certain barbarous and cruel manner were once a year whipped at the Altar of Diana Taurica, (to which goddess facrifice could not be offered without man's bloud) till the bloud ran down in great abundance, their Parents beholding the fight. They would bear it with admirable patience and emulation, chearfully (nay, many times, with great delight, which they took in excelling one another in patience) enduring the stroaks unto Death it felf.

L'adonomiu.

Iren.

17. When they were past their Childhood, at twelve years of age, their labours and exercises were both increased, lest vice together with years should grow upon them. They were to be content with one Coat both Winter and Summer. and flept by Companies together upon course and uneasie Beds. The ancient men also oversaw them upon occasion, but the Charge was committed to one of the principal, called thence Padonomus, who had power to gather them together and correct them. Over feveral Companies certain young men of twenty years of age, called Irens, were fet, who, if no man was prefent, had command over them, exercised them in watches, lying in ambush, and other crasts of War, wherein if any were caught, they were feverely punished, to make them the more wary for the future; as also if they were taken in Thest, Stealing with them being lawfull, and incouraged as an exercise for War, but to be surprized therein was punishable. The same Irens supping with them would make some sing, and others propose questions, in answering which they exercised their wits, accustoming them to make a short, clear and witty answer, in the dexterity whereof the Lacedamoni- Plutarch in /ans excelled all others: Oratours with their long-winded speeches being utterly for-conicis. bidden. When the Iren corrected them, there were men standing by to take notice of it; and if it was not rightly done, nor upon good grounds, he had the same punishment inflicted on him. Those Boys performed several forts of exercises; but amongst the rest, those called Platanista (from the place thick set with Plane-trees) were most eminent, in which with hands and feet, teeth and nails, they fought in good earnest, to the putting out of eyes, and sometimes to the danger of Life it self, none giving over, or shrinking one jot, than which no disgrace was esteemed more hainous.

Such strict and constant discipline under-went they all their minority, till they arrived at 30 years of age, (before which time they married not, went not out to War, neither exercised any Office) so that the greatest trouble in the Field afterwards feemed much more easy to be undergone.

The education

18. The Education also of young Women was agreeable to this of the other Sex, that by Vigilancy, Industry, and enduring Labour, they might be furnished with Courage and Refolution against all evils, being married with more ease undergo the pains of Travel, and bring forth Children of the same constitution. According to their age they had Exercises of fundry forts; most of which they performed in publick, naked, and that not onely in the fight of Kings and Senate: but the young men alfo; which yet because of the Laconick modelty and temperance, with the custom of it, was not judged at all to contribute to Vice, but rather to an innocent and harmless emulation, and honest love. Their diet was such as might nourish them, and not any ill disposition in them. Such were their Cloaths, and all things else about them, as long as Lycurgus his Constitutions were in force; and therefore the too great power of the Women, their Luxury, and the many great inconveniences that thence arose to the State, objected so much by Aristotle, is to be ascribed to the married fort; and probable it is that this corruption crept in in aftertimes, it being well nigh as easie for him to reform the Women as to make this great alteration in the Commonwealth, though the contrary be afferted by the Philoso-Politic lib. 2. pher, who as it seemeth was much satisfied in the wilfulness of that Sex. The set "49.7. time for Marriage of Men was at 30, for Women at 20 years, before which it was unlawfull; but if a man within some reasonable time after betook him not to that estate, he was publickly disgraced by command of the Law-giver. Women had no Portions; yet the Heirs carried with them their Father's Inheritance. No plurality of Wives did he allow; and yet as for Adultery it was not heard of in that City, against which neither did he make any Law, having already provided sufficiently against it by such strict Constitutions.

19. As he provided against the flocking of Strangers to Sparta, so forbad he any of War) left he should bring home with him the dissolute and effeminate Customs of other places. Merchandizing was esteemed a base imployment, as meerly practifed for getting of Wealth. Drunkenness they rendred more abominable to Children by making their Slaves drunk, that then they might behold them in that beaftly condition. He that had been fo unthrifty as not to be able to bear the charge of the Phiditis was excluded from all truft in the Commonwealth. To keep them vigilant, he commanded that the City should not be walled, they having fufficient leifure to look carefully to it; this being even their whole calling, with their heads and hands to attend publick affairs; the drudgery of Tilling their Grounds, and gathering their Fruits, being imposed upon the Helota, or publick Slaves, with other servile and mechanick affairs. Those Slaves it was not lawfull for any one privately to manumit, or fell out of Laconia; whereby increasing to so great a number, that they equallized, or exceeded that of their Masters, they sometimes afforded occasion of great danger; upon which account this Constitution is taxed by the Philosopher. For the lessening of their numbers a course was taken not altogether clear from a note of cruelty, Certain young men being fent about into the Countrey, who lying hid in the day-time, (whence this practice was called Cryptia) by night killed as many of them as they could light on.

20. Such was the form of the Commonwealth instituted by Lycurgus, which faved him the labour of erecting any other Courts of Justice then what have been already mentioned. For Gold and Silver being taken away, and the use thereof forbidden upon pain of death, Controversies and Suits most commonly thence arising naturally fell of themselves. He forbad his Laws to be written in Tables, Pla arch, at because he would have them rooted in the Minds of the people, to which he suprá. thought the strict Discipline he erected might sufficiently conduce. After the thing was done, as it hath happened usually in this kind, he was but ill rewarded; for fuch as had parted with their Silver, Gold, or Luxury, were so enraged as to throw stones at him, which to shun he was glad to betake himself to his heels, and looking back had an Eye struck out by one Arcander, who yet afterwards repented him of the deed, and was very observant of him. One telleth us he was cast out of the deed, and was very observant of him. One tenerin us ne was care out *Valerius Max; by publick rage; but *he who hath handled the subject of his Life with *Valerius Max; by publick rage; but *he who hath handled the subject of his Life with *Valerius Max; but had been to be subject of his Life with *Valerius Max; but had been t greatest industry, hath recorded, that when things began to be settled, and he saw Ext. for vertue and happiness, but one thing, and that of greatest consequence, was yet behind, which was not to be enacted before first he had consulted the Oracle Kings, senate, at Delphos. Therefore he defired them to keep the Laws already made, and change nothing in them till his return with fuch Answer as the Oracle would give him. All confenting, he took an Oath of the Kings, Senate, and People, and beand Confliction gan his Journey. At Delphos he enquired whether the Laws already made, and ensof Lyengus, established, were not sufficient for the vertue and safety of the State. It was anfwered they were, and that it should continue most glorious so long as it would ftand to them. This Answer then he sent to Sparta; but, resolving never to loose them from their Oath, he there made an end of himself by abstaining from all sustenance. Some have said that he died in Crete, and that he ordered his Body to be burnt, and his ashes thrown into the Sea, lest his Reliques being brought back to Sparta, they should account themselves freed from the Oath. But * Tertullian * In Applicat. writeth, that he famished himself, because the Lacedamonians went about to alter

The War with the Argives.

21. Lycurgus being dead, and the State settled, after this great change, it renewed the War formerly begun with the Argives; and afterwards deluded by the ambiguity of the Oracle, commenced another against the Tegeata, a people of Ar- Pausan in Accacadia, by whom they were worsted, and Charilans the King was taken Prisoner, Hered, libs. through the especial valour of the Women: yet was he presently set at liberty, upon his Oath never to fight more against them, which he but ill performed. After this they overthrew divers Cities, on which the Acheans had feized, some whereof made their peace, as Paufanias telleth us, and departed out of Peloponnesus. Paufan, in Mes-The Colleague of Charilaus (or Charillus) for some time was Teleclus, whose death fenicia gave one occasion to the famous Messenian War. Charilaus was succeeded by Nicander his Son, and Teleclus by Alcamenes. In * the 34th year of Nicander, was * Clemens celebrated the first Olympiad, after the Restitution of those Games by Iphitus, in Strom.lib. 1. which Corabus a Cook of Elie got the Prize in the Course. These Solemnities being of so great consequence to the knowledge of times, must not be passed over without some observation.

The first Olym-

22. These Exercises had in former times been held by divers others, as Hercuof the Olympick les, (both the Idean and the Son of Amphitryon, as some think) Pelops, Endymion, Neleus, Pelias, Lycurgus, and others. After the descent of the Heraclida into Peponnesus, Oxylus the Ætolian also (who, as we said, was chosen their Guide, and according to agreement had the Countrey of Elis given to him) renewed the Paulan in Eli-Games: but they were interrupted as formerly, or feldom observed, for about 300 acts. years, till Iphitus the Son of Praxonidas, and Nephew of Hamon, descended from him, and one of his Succeffors, again restored them; after which they never intermitted, but were kept up for many generations. But the occasion of the last re- A. M. 3220 flitution was this. Greece being almost ruined by Seditions and Pestilence, Iphitus ofie 34. inquired of the Oracle at Delphos, how those evils might be redressed: and it was answered, that it was expedient for him and the Eleans to restore the Olympick Games; whereupon he proclaimed them, and for the better celebration of them, procured a Truce to be made. The place whence they had their name was Olympia, a City fituated in the territories of the Pifeans, upon the River Alpheus, upon which account the Piscans contended a long time with the Eleans about their interest in them. There was a Temple dedicated to Jupiter Olympius, and a place for Races and all forts of Exercises, filled with many goodly buildings, which resembled another City. Near to the Town was also a place where the Eleans sate and judged of the Controversies arising about Victories, to which Crowns or Garlands were given. As long as the Eleans continued under a Monarchical Government, their Prince, of the posterity of Oxylus, was sole Judge; but afterwards there were Two, chosen by the Votes of the People, which where after increased to the number of Nine, then to Ten, and last of all to Twelve. This solemnity was held once every fifth year beginning, so that from the commencing of one to the beginning of another, passed four entire years, by some mistaken for five, because of the commencement of the Games. The time was at the full of the Moon, the change whereof immediately preceded the Summer Solftice, in the Moneth by them called Hecatombæon.

23. Upon this occasion meetings and consultations were had concerning the affairs of all Greece, besides the Inhabitants of which, many flocked from other Countries. Care was here taken concerning the form of the year, for the intercalation of a day at the end of every fourth. Charge was given to the Priests of the Temple, to take notice of every new Moon, especially of that wherewith the Moneth Hecatombeon began, and to proclaim it: they were also not onely to regifter the names of the Victors in the feveral forts of Games, with other things that concerned them, but also whatsoever memorable thing occurred in the intervalls. The account of years henceforth never failed, and the affairs of Greece, and other Countries, were known in a most certain order. And here the second intervall of time, amongst three reckoned by * Varro, received its period. The * vide center. first began with the beginning of things, and ended at the Deluge, called by him mande bit No. Unknown: the second began where the first ended, and concluded with this restitution of the Olympiads, which he termed Fabulous, because the Story thereof is mixed with Fables: and the third, commencing with the first Olympiad, reached to his own time, which he named Historicall, for that things done therein were truly and clearly related. This happened 408 years after the destruction of Troy, 774 before the Æra of Christ, A.M. 3229.

The bringing in of the Ephori

24. Towards the latter end of the seventh Olympiad, a great change was made A.M. 3256. in the Government of Lacedemon, by the bringing in of the Ephori, who, according Johami 10. to Plutarch, had their beginning 130 years after Lycurgus. It feemeth that for all the means used by him to gain an Equality, and clip the power of the Great Arift. Polit. 11b. 4. ones, yet it again grew extravagant within this time, so that the People, to pro- cap. 11. vide against that of the Kings and Senate for the future, got these Officers created. Five they were in number, (whereof one Elatus was the first) chosen every Val. Max. lib.4. year by and out of the People, without any distinction of birth or wealth; infomuch, that fometimes the meanest fort of men were elected: which custom is noted as bad by Aristotle. But their use and end being onely to protect the Liberty Plutareh.in vita of the people, such, what ever they were, must be preferred, as made the greatest show of love to Freedom, of a sharp and bold wit, and averseness towards the power of the great ones. Theopompus the Son of Nicander, and Grandion to Charlins, was Plate de Legibus King at this time, who bringing in, or giving way to this Office, his Wife rebuked him for fo doing, faying, that he would leave the Kingdom to his Son of lefs value Citero de Legib. than he had it of his Father. To which he answered, that on the contrary, he should leave it so much the greater, by how much more durable. Indeed hereby it came to pass, as Plutarch observeth, that the Kingly power, being less, was not subject to that envy which ruined the affairs of the Kings of Messene and Argos, who would not moderate their power, nor at all stoop to any Popularity; and the Government here being poized, continued longer, as freed from the inteffine diftempers of the neighbour Commonwealth. Yet it is also observed by * one, that the reason of the prosperity and long duration of the Spartan State, * Machiavelli above that of the Athenian and others, is to be fetched from its so much partaking Decad. di Tho of Aristocracy, and the want of that influence which the heady Multitude had in- Livio.

25. The general and most probable opinion is, that the Ephori were brought in in the time of Theopompus. So writeth Aristotle, Plutarch, and Valerius Maximus. Yet (a) Herodotus, having reckoned up several things performed by Lycure (a) Tiphs note. gus in the framing of his Commonwealth, at length addeth, Fasther, Lycurgus & Maria and Elders: of which opinion Xenophon seemeth also to have have you have you have your been in his Treatise of the Lacedemonian Commonwealth. But though they were brought in during the reign of Theopompus, yet it is not agreed who was the principal Author of their creation, because the end or design thereof is uncertain, though that ere now spoken of be generally received. (b) Plato, and Plutarch (b) to retrothough that ere now ipoken of the generally received to be as a bridle to the power analysis us (as he confessed) from him, will have them created to be as a bridle to the power analysis us (irrep dusable place). of the Kings, for theirs it must needs be, which he calleth Hereditary. Cicero Supra also in his third Book of Laws testifieth, that the Ephori at Sparta were opposed and in in his third Book of Laws testifieth, that the Ephori at Sparta were opposed and in in in its analysis of the sparta were opposed and in its analysis of the sparta were opposed and in its analysis of the sparta were opposed and in its analysis of the sparta were opposed and the sparta were op against the Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls, who as well as the Asyavis are the Senate were, even at the first institution, seared by the Commons, for that they were the chief Patritian Magistrates at that time, and the Animosticis in that State were profit states as the chief Patritian Magistrates at that time, and the Animosticis in that State were profit states as a caused by the distinction of the two Orders. Valerius Maximus maketh the same Arduses. people, that Lycurgus having added the Senate to the Kings, the Commonwealth was for a long time governed without any other Magistracy. Afterwards, when the Messenian War was drawn out in length, the Kings, because they were employed abroad, chose some of their friends to administer Justice, whom they left as their Deputies over the people: and those were called Ephori, from their inspection on. Being at first no other than Affistants to the Kings, by little and little they assumed power to themselves, and no body aware of it, constituted a peculiar Office. Hereof, he faid, a fign remained at that day, for that the King being called by the Ephori, refused to come once, and again; but at the third call came to them: besides, Asteropus, who first inlarged the bounds of this Office, was Ephorus many Ages after.

Their power.

26. The power of those Magistrates, for what end soever constituted, (as of others in other places) was moderate at the first; but in process of time, as the ambition of them, and the confidence of the People thereupon increased, it exceeded the due and just bounds, and made the Government almost degenerate into a Democracy. They not onely confulted with the Kings and Senate, resolved about the affairs of State, and judged of Controversies amongst the people; but afterwards grappled even the whole Power into their hands, doing all things themselves that were of moment. They govened the Assemblies of the people, proposing and gathering Suffrages, they made and disannulled Leagues, ordered what Forces were to be fent out, for which they also made provision, they rewarded or punished, according to their pleasure, other Magistrates, calling the very * Kings to account for their Lives; infomuch that, as the Philosopher ob. Agis. ferveth, they obtained a kind of Tyranny: the onely remedy was, that their Office was but annuall, and being five in number, the defigns and endeavours of Paulanias. one or two were croffed and overthrown by the contrary party, nothing be- vide Platarch. ing done without the confent of the whole College. They role not up, as other & corn. Neps. Magistrates, in presence of the Kings, with whom they mutually sware every moneth; the Kings, that they would rule according to the Laws, and they in the name of the people, to preserve their Rule thus ordered, safe and entire to them. With their entring into their Office the year began, (constantly in Winter, as we learn from Thucydides;) and from one of them, as principal, the year was na- Lib. s. med, (who thence was called Eponymus,) as from the Archon at Athens. At their first entrance they were wont to publish an Edict, that the men should take Plutatch in off all the Hair from their upper Lips, and observe strictly all the Laws, lest they Cleamene ex should be constrained to punish them, requiring obedience in a little, thereby to inure the people to it. In the Wars two of them used to go out with the Kings, to affift them in their Councils. They were wont to proclaim open war against the publick Slaves or Helots, giving liberty to kill them; and thence is to be derived that cruel custom of the Cryptia, rather than from any Constitution of Lycurgus, as Arifotle thinketh. The cause thereof, as Plutarch judgeth, was the conspiring of these Slaves against their Masters, during the Messenian War.

27. In the second year of the ninth Olympiad this War began: though the Padaiss in ground of the quarrel had been partly laid several years before the bringing in of Mellenicis. the Ephori. In the days of Teleclus Father to Alcamenes now King, there being a Strabe lib 5. Temple of Diana in the borders, to which both the Lacedemonians and Messenie & 8. ans constantly resorted, it happened that some Spartan Virgins going thither, according to the cultom, were abused by the Messenians, and Teleclus, endeavouring 711th, in lib. 3. to prevent the injury, was there flain: morover, the Virgins for very shame and grief destroyed themselves, as the Lacedamonians told the Story. On the contrary, the Messenians pleaded, that at this Temple Teleclus lay in wait for the principal of their City, by fending thither young men, disguised in the habit of Virgins, with Poniards under their cloaths; that hereupon the Meffenians coming in to help their friends, flew Teleclus, and the counterfeits, for which at that time the Lacedamonians found not themselves so much concerned as to stir. However it was, grudges hence arose, or were rather heightned betwixt them; for the Lacedamonians often complained, that in the division of the Territories obtained by the Heraclida, Eurysthenes and Procles, their Kings, were cheated by their Uncle Cresphontes of the far better grounds, for which now they envied the Messenians, thinking themselves far worthier of them, as being much the more confiderable people.

28. Animolities being raifed upon these accounts another thing happened which increased them to that height as they brake out into open War. There was one Polychares, a Meffenian, who had got the victory in the Course at the celebration of the fourth Olympiad. He let out some Cows to one Eucephnus a Lacedamonian, on this Paufan, ut supra.

condition, to have part of the profit. Eucphone fold the Cows, and then coming to Polychares, told him that they and their Keepers were ftoln from him. But while he was labouring to gain credit to his tale, fome of the Herdf-men (who, as it feemeth, with the confent of Enaphnus, were taken away by force) escaped from the Merchants, and acquainted Polychares with the Fraud; which now the other not able to deny, asked him pardon, told him for how much the Cat-tel were fold, and promifed to fend the money, if he would let his Son accompany him to Sparta. He fent his Son accordingly; but when they were come together into Laconia, Eucphnus most perfidiously murthered the young man: with the horridness of which fact Polychares grievously moved, came several times to Sparta, complaining bitterly, and with many tears, to the Kings and Ephori, but found no Justice; insomuch that growing into a great rage against all Lacedamonians in common, he killed them as enemies wherefoever he could meet them. 29. The Lacedemonians, finding themselves concerned herein, sent to the Mes-senians, demanding Polychares. At that time Androcles and Antiochus, the Sons of Phintas, reigning at Meffene, promifed they would report the matter to the People, and know their minds therein. The Multitude being called together, Androcles was much for the giving up of Polychares; but, on the contrary, Antiochus urged how unjust and lamentable a thing it would be for him to be tormented before Eucphnus: and the contention grew so hot betwixt the Brothers, that it came to blows. Antiochus his faction prevailing, Androcles with the chief of his party lost their lives. Antiochus then reigning alone wrote to the Spartans, offering to refer the business to the Argives, who were of the same stock with them both; or to the publick Council of the Amphytiones; or else, if neither of these liked them, to the Senate of Areopagus. They returned no answer by the Messenger, and within a few months Antiochus died, and his Son Euphaes succeeded him. Neither then His 6. did they fend any message, nor yet renounced amity with the Messenians, but entring into secret consultations provided for the War, and bound themselves with an Oath never to return home till they had subdued Messenia.

30. Being bound with this Oath, and having all things in a readiness, under the conduct of Alcamenes, the Son of Teleclus, they went out by night and fell upon Aruphea, a Town upon the Borders; which by the fuddenness of the onset, no Idem ibid. Watch being kept, but the Gates standing open, they easily took; and finding it A.M. 3262. a place for situation, and convenience of water, sit for their purpose, put all to the scale of the standard of the standard of the scale of the standard of the scale of the Sword, intending to use it as a Receptacle, and chief Fortress in the War. After this Joihami 16. they made Excursions, and rather practised Robberies than carried on a War, the Messenians declining the Fight through the persuasion of Euphaes. But after four years, when they were now well exercised, and exceedingly incensed against the Lacedamonians, he gave them leave to make inroads into Laconia, where they wasted all about Taggetus. He then led down his Army into the Borders to fight: which opportunity the Lacedemonians imbraced, and ingaged with the Horse, and those Foot that bare the light Armour. But Euphaes having provided matter for making a Trench, caused the place where his other Souldiers lay to be fortified, (in them confifting his chief strength;) so that, seeing they could not fight with them, and being unprovided to befiege the Camp, they returned home, where they had but cold welcom, because of this Retreat made contrary to their solemn Oath.

31. The year after, for that the elder fort exceedingly upbraided them, they returned into Messenia under conduct of both the Kings, Theopompus, the Son of Nicander, and Polydorus of Alcamenes now dead. There they were received by the enemy, and entertained in a great and bloudy Battel, wherein both Parties with much earnestness and contention demeaned themselves. The Spartans as they surpassed the other in skill, being trained up in Exercises from their Childhood, so exceeded them also in numbers: but desperation and necessity made the Messenians valiant, as they abundantly shewed it, many breaking their Ranks on purpose to come to hand-stroaks with the enemy. In the main Battel the Victory continued doubtfull a long time; in the right wing Euphaes put Theopompus to flight, and in the left Polydorus did as much by the Messenians, and neither Party would give the chace: Euphaes, for that he thought he had already done enough; and Polydorus, because the Lacedamonians were deterred from it through their ignorance of the place, being in an enemie's Countrey: fo that fighting on even terms they were parted by the night. The day following neither fide would fight, nor had the confidence to erect a Trophee; but made truce so long as to bury their dead.

32. After this Battel none other fucceeded for feveral years. The Meffenians, for that their Countrey was the feat of War, were pressed with many difficulties.

Their Garrisons had cost them so much money, that now they were rendred unable to pay their Army: their Slaves fled daily to the Lacedamonians, and a certain Difease, not much better than the Plague, seized upon them; which though not exceeding deadly, yet, jointly with the other difficulties, caused great trouble and perturbation. After a ferious debate concerning the main of their Affairs, it was refolved, that most of the Towns lying upon the Sea should be dismantled as far remote, and libone, a Mountain as large as any within the libone, (whereupon stood a Town more ancient than great) was to be fortified, because of the natural strength thereof. When they had here settled themselves, they sent to Delphos to enquire concerning the event of the War. The Oracle (agreeable to the disposition of the Enemy of mankind) required a Virgin of the stock of Æpytus to be facrificed; whereupon all that belonged to that Family were subjected to the lot, and the Daughter of one Lycifcus was taken. She being to be offered, the Sooth-fayer forbade it, alleging that the was not the Daughter of Lycifeus, but brought in under-hand by his Wife that was barren: and whilst he was thus persuading the people, Lycifeus fled away with her to Sparta. All hereat exceedingly startled, Aristodemus, another of that Family, voluntarily offered his own Daughter: but a young man there present that was in love with her, and shortly intended marriage, stifly impugned it, and contended she was not in her Father's power, because betrothed to himself. Not herewith prevailing, he af-Arifodemus kil- firmed he had lien with her, and that she was with Child. Whereat Arifodemus A. Yet the Sooth-sayer avou- Achazi 8. ched her Death could not at all profit the State, and commanded some other to be offered: but Euphaes perfuaded the People that the Oracle was already fatisfied, and required not the Life of any other. 33. The rest which the Lacedamonians had in this intervall was presently turned nians make War into action with the Argives about Thyrea, a Town fituate in the borders of both Commonwealths.. This fell out in the reign of Theopompus, whereat yet he was Paufan in Lacanot present, partly by reason of his old age, and also for grief taken at the death nicht & Argolic, ich; Platare, in of his fon Archidamus. The controversie was brought before the Amphyttiones, Para elis, to who ordered that 300 on each fide should decide it. Of the Argives two persons Herod. lib. I. furvived the Combat; but of the Spartan party onely one, by name Othryades, Othryades, as good as many, who lived no longer than to make use of broken Spears in stead of Crutches to fustain his body, then to gather together the Targets of the slain, and to erect a Trophee therewith, whereon he made an infeription with his own bloud. Because of this Trophee the Amphytiones decreed the Town to the Lacedamonians; but the Argives, for that two of their party furvived, afterwards renewed the War to their own dammage

34. The offering up of Aristodemus his Daughter seemed to the Messenians to 1c- have done some good, the affairs of Lacedamon appearing to be in a declining Pathanias in posture, and that State flower in its Enterprises than formerly. But in the fixth Meffenicio. year after the departure of Lycifeus, and the eighth from their removal to Ithome, the War was again renewed against them. Another Battel was fought, but with the same success as formerly. In the midst of the Fight was the hottest contest, the most valiant on both sides betaking themselves thither; where Euphaes also, venturing farther than either stood with his dignity or fafety, against Theopompus, received many and deadly wounds. Herewith being fo weakned that he fell, the Lacedamonians strove to take him, and a great conflict ensued; but one Amander so far resisting as to lose his own Life in the quarrel, Euphaes was brought off, and died a few days after, having reigned thirteen years, all which time he spent and the drive against the Lacedemonians. He dying Childles, a great controversie A.M. 3274 arose about the Succession, for that several of the Family of Epytus stood for the V.C. 23. Kingdom, amongst whom was Aristodemus, who, though it was objected that, Achari 13. having polluted his hands in the Bloud of his Daughter, he was not capable, was preferred before all others through the favour of the People. After his Election he fent Presents to the chief of the Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, whom he engaged to his Party. Affisted by some Arcadians he made incursions, and the Lacedamonians did the same, proceeding to no greater extremity: but at length, in his fifth year, another Battel was fought near to Ithome, wherein the Meffenians were affisted by the three States ere now mentioned, and the Spartans by no other Peloponnesians than those of Corinth. The dispute was very sharp, and the event doubtfull, till the Messenians, having the upper ground, at last put their enemies to flight, of whom it is credible, as Pansanias onely writeth, that many miscarried.

35. The Lacedemonians, after this, almost despairing of success, both Parties sent to enquire at Delphos concerning the iffue of the War. The Mellenians received an answer so ambiguous as could not be interpreted: that to the Spartans plainly fignified, that as Cresphontes had obtained Messene by a wile in ordering the Lots. to by wiles it was to be recovered. Several then they invented, but all were difcovered, by the vigilancy and cunning of Aristodemus. But the twentieth year of the War approaching, the Affairs of the Messenians began exceedingly to relapse, and the Oracle, again confulted, answered, that who foever could first dedicate a hundred Treftles (or Three-footed stools) to Jupiter of Ithome should obtain Mes. scne. The Messenians, having the Temple within themselves, doubted not but to be able to doe this first: yet the Answer being brought to Lacedamon, one OEbalus, a crafty man there, made a hundred of Clay, and while the Messenians were bufie about others of Wood, (for their purses were not able to reach to Brass) disguised himself in the habit of a Fowler, and carried them into the Temple. This struck the Messenians with great consternation, who were streightly besieged by this time, and hindred from getting in any Provisions. Aristodemus was also tormented with fad Dreams about his Daughter, whereat forely moved, and exceedingly afflicted with confideration that he should kill his Child for his Countrey's good, which notwithstanding was desperate, he slew himself at her Monument.

36. With this fad Accident the Messenians were more grievously struck, and so despaired as to have thoughts of making their applications to the Lacedamonians; but as yet not able to stoop, they made no Overtures, though almost oppressed with Famine: they chose them Captains in the room of Aristodemus, preparing to fally out, and fight it out to the last man for their lives and fortunes. Yet at length distrusting their ability to doe any thing that way, and considering themfelves urged hard with the want of all necessaries, they left Ithome, and yielded in the fifth month after the death of Aristodemus, the twenty eighth year of the War being almost finished, in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, the Medontide at Athens yet enjoying the Power for ten years, in the days of Hezekiah King of Judah, and the time of the deportation of the ten Tribes. The Conquerors utterly demolished Ithome, and, having gotten easily the other Towns of Messenia into their power, imposed what Laws they pleased upon the Inhabitants, who were commanded to till their grounds, and fend one half of the profits unto Sparta; to bind themselves by Oath, to remain in perpetual Fealty to the Lacedamonians, and both men and women, when the Kings and Nobles of Sparta died, to attend upon their

As many as would not endure those hard Conditions, and had hope of ending tertainment with the Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, went thither, and sich as V. C. 31. were Priests, to Elsusine all the rest of the Multitude departed every one to his Ecoch. 8. own feat : and fo the first Messenian War ended.

37. Whilst the Lacedamonians were abroad, and lay under the obligation of their Oath, never to return till the War should be finished, fearing, either through Julia ex Irago, the fuggestion of their Wives, or their own recollection, that their Posterity might fail, they chose out of their luftiest young men fifty in number, who, coming out under age, were not liable to the Oath, and fent them to Sparta, to lie with their Wives and Virgins (or the Virgins onely) in a promiscuous manner, whence arose a Lege Straton 16.

But after that the War was fi- 281. nished, and the Spartans returned home, they looked upon them as a spurious broad, and as fuch contemned them; which these Youths apprehending, and how they could not inherit any thing in the Commonwealth, entred into conspiracy with the Helots, and made one Philanthus their Captain, whose Father Aracus had given the advice to fend the yong men to the Virgins. This Plot being revealed by fome of the Slaves, they were expelled, and forced to feek out new feats; so that departing into Italy, they drove out the Barbarians and Cretians, who inhabited about Tarentum, and seizing upon that Place, therein planted themselves. 38. The Meffenians thus brought under the yoak, endured it, though with much The fecond Mef-

Grand-son to Theopompus, by his Son Archidamus, who died ere hecame to reign, were Kings at Sparta.

39. Aristomenes managed the whole business for the Messenians, being of extraordinary abilities both of body and mind. He first ingaged with the Spartans at Dera, a Village of Meffenia, where he is said to have behaved himself above the capacity of a man, and feeing he was of the Family of Epytus, was chosen King by the People. Refufing this Title, he was created General, with absolute Authority; and afterwards, at the Monument of the Boar, (a place in Messenia, where Hercules made a League with the Sons of Nileus) by the affiltance of the Arcadians, Argives, Sicyonians and Eleans, overthrew the Lacedamonians, terrifying all whereever he came. In the pursuit he lost his Target, which whilst he was feeking, they had opportunity to escape. After this, he took and plundred a Town of Laconia, named Phara, whence retreating with much Booty, he also overthrew Anaxander the King, who purfued him; and having in his intentions to march against Sparta it self, is said to have been deterred from it by the Apparitions of Helena and her two Brothers, Caftor and Pollux.

40. The Lacedamonians, much startled at this Loss, thought to have put a period to the War, but were again incouraged by the Veries of Tyrteur, who persuaded them to fill up their Army with the Helots. A year or two before this, sending to Padjania in confult the Oracle about the War, they had answer, That they must fend to Athens Messenicia. for a Counsellor. The Athenians were unwilling in the least to promote their Affairs, being jealous of their growing Power: yet fearing also to doe any thing cross to the Oracle, they sent to them this Tyrtaus, a School-master, lame on his feet, and not very found in his brain. In the third year of the War, another Battel was fought, at a place called the Great Ditch, wherein the Messenians having no other Affociates than their Friends of Arcadia, these also failed them at this time, through the Treachery of their Captain; so that, left to themselves, and compasfed in by their Enemies, most of them were slain, though Aristonenes omitted nothing worthy of a General, or common Souldier. Having gathered up the reliques of his Army, he persuaded the people to quit all in-land Towns, and, fortifying onely Pylus and Methone upon the Sea, to secure themselves in the Hill Ira. Here they were prefently befieged, and iffuing out for Booty, made Depredations both in Laconia and their own Countrey; which drew out an Edict from the Lacedamonian State, that the Borders of both Countries should, during the War, be lest desolate: whereupon a Dearth ensued at Sparta, and thence a Sedition, which Tyriaus with his Poetry had work enough to suppress.

41. Aristomenes in the mean time, like some sierce and greedy Lion, with 300 choice men at his heels, to the great fear of all men, ranged up and down, and made continual Excursions into the Enemie's Countrey. At length he was taken and carried to Sparta, where condemned to death, he was thrown into a deep Dungeon, the ordinary way of punishing capital Offenders. Coming fase to the bottom, though others were killed by the fall, he perceived a Fox feeding upon some dead Carkases; whereat considering that this creature must have some hole to creep in at, he caught it by the tail, and defending himself from its teeth by the other hand, it led him to the hole, which being but little, he so inlarged with his hands, as, contrary to the belief and expectation of all men, he returned fafe to his Companions. Prefently after his return, he fell upon the Camp of the Corinthians, who affifted the Spartans in the Siege, and lay carelessly, without any watch, and killing the Captains, plundered their Tents. Not long after a Truce was made for forty days, during which, he wandring abroad too carelessly, was entrapped by some Cretians, who affisted also in the Siege, and being bound with the thongs of their Quivers, was carried into a Village, to the house of a certain Widow. This Woman, understanding who he was, cast in her head how to deliver him: which she effected, by giving his Keepers so much drink, that they falling afleep, with one of their daggers he cut the thongs. Being loofed, he stabbed the Cretians, and escaped: and afterwards, to requite the Woman's kindness, married her to his Son Gorgus.

42. Ten years the Siege of Ira continued, the Messenians enjoying the grounds at the foot of the Mountain, as far as the River Neda, and thereby being better provided for to hold out. But in the eleventh, when Aristomenes was rendred by a wound incapable of taking such care about the Watch as he had been wont, in a rainy and dark night the Sentinels, secure of him, betook themselves to their own homes. Amongst those there was one, whose Wife in his absence entertained a certain Herds-man as a Lover, who belonged to Emperanus, a Lacedamonian, now at the Siege. He being hid by his Paramour upon her Husband's coming, heard the man tell the Story, how he and his fellows had forfaken their charge, and flipping away, therewith acquainted his Master. Both the Spartan Kings were abfent at this time; but Emperamus, unwilling to let flip fo fair an opportunity, led the Army thither, and got into the Fortreis before he was discovered. When the matter was perceived, a great contest there was betwirt the parties; but Ari-

O- Manafits 34lympiad, when Autofthenes was Archon at Athens, A.M. 3337.

43. When the Arcadians understood of the taking of Ira, they defired of Ariftocrates their King to be led out, either to restore their friends, or die with them. But he having formerly betraied them at the great Ditch, was now also corrupted with money, and refused to doe it, alleging there was none left to whom they could give affiltance. Yet when it was clearly known that they were alive, they fent some before to comfort them, then met them with Cloaths and Meat, as far as the Hill Lycaus, and kindly invited them to live amongst them. Aristomenes boyling with hatted and revenge against the Lacedemonians, chose out of the Company 500 men, whom he knew to be no whit desirous to outlive the fortune of their Country, and asked them in the hearing of Aristocrates (not knowing any thing of his treachery) and the Arcadians, whether they would venture their lives with him. Upon their answer that they would, he acquainted them with his delign, to march straight for Sparta, which if he could surprize, now that all its strength was employed in the plunder of Messenia, then should be make an even exchange with the Lacedamonians; but if not, death would be the worst that could happen. Besides the Messenians, 300 Arcadians gave their names to this Expedition; but being stayed by reason that the entralls of the Beast were not propitious, Ariftocrates had time to give notice of the defign to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Treachery was discovered after the return of the Messenger by some that suspected it, and the Letter sent back from Anaxander was read in the Assembly of the Arcadians, wherein thanks was given to Aristocrates, as well for the help he afforded the Lacedamonians at the great Ditch, as for this timely notice. Hereat the multitude was fo inraged, as they stoned him out of hand. cast him out unburied, and erected a Monument to his infamy, with this note, that Perjury cannot escape God. They exhorted also the Messenians to throw Stones at him, who looked upon Aristomenes, as expecting directions from him; but he onely fixed his eyes on the ground and wept.

44. The Messenians desired of Aristomenes to lead them out to seek some new

he offered to them. Those that had kept Pylus and Methone, with others which lived on the Sea-coasts, went by Ship to Cyllene, the Haven of the Eleans, to seek out the reft. The following Spring several places being proposed to go to, Ana-xilus, who then reigned at Rhegium, and was descended of one Alcidamidas a Mes-seniam, (that, after the taking of Ishome in the former War, betook himself thither) fent some to convoy them into Italy. After their arrival, he told them he had continual War with the Zancleans, a people of Sicilie, that inhabited a fruitfull and pleasant Soil, which if they would help him to conquer, he would put it The Messenians into their hands. He then besieged them by Sea, and the Messenians by Land; A. M. 3339. pus into sicily. whereby being distressed, and the greater part of the Wall now cast down, they V. Aristomenes for some time continuing in Greece, married his Daughters very honourably, whereof Demagetus, Prince of Rhodes at that time. took the youngest to Wife, having been advised by the Oracle to make choice of that man's Daughter who was the best in all Greece. He carried his Daughter to Rhodes, whence he intended to go to Ardys the Son of Gyges, then reigning in Lydia, and thence to Echatane, to Phraortes King of the Medes; but death prevented him, and he finished his days in that Island, being found in the number

The accession of this Countrey to their Demessies very much increased the power of Lacedamon, and so they held it for two hundred years, till an opportunity was offered for the old Inhabitants, in despite of them, to return. This thing being brought to pass long after, must be referred to another place: as also (because what farther happened betwixt the Arcadians, Argives, and this Commonwealth, is not very material) whatfoever we have farther to observe concerning the Lacedamonians.

SECT. VI.

The most antient Kingdom of Corinth.

Corieth firft called Ephyra, and built by Si-

This City, seated in the Isthmus of Peloponnessus, had first the name of E- passan, in Co. phyra, and was built by Sifyphus (whose posterity reigned here some 428 rimbiasis. years) in the days of Cecrops, the first King of Athens, and a little before Deucalion's Floud, about the 2486. year of the World. He married Merope, the Daughter of Atlas, by which he had four Sons, Glaucus, Ornytion, Therfunder, and Almus; was accounted a very wife and prudent man, feigned also to have retur- A.M. 2486. ned to life again, that he might chaftise his Wife for not having performed what was due to his memory. After he was once got up, he would not return of a long time to Hell; where he is also said by the Poets to rowl a great Stone up an Hill, which continually tumbling down again keepeth him in constant toil; having this punishment inflicted on him for discovering to Asopus his Daughter stoln away by Jupiter. Glaucus his eldest Son was the Father of Bellerophon, and first celebrated Games in the Isthmus. Ornytion begat Phocus, who led a Colony into, and gave name to the Countrey called Phocis after him: and Thous, a younger Son, who continued at Corinth. Ther funder had two Sons, Coronus and Haliartus, who being adopted by Athamas their Uncle on the Father's fide, then reigning in Baotia, (after he had lost his own two Sons Phryxus and Helles, and his Daughter Ino with her two Sons) gave name to two places in that Countrey. Alms, (called otherwise Halms and Olms) the youngest Son of Sisphs, had part of the Countrey of the Orchomenians bestowed on him by Eteocles the King: and from him Almon, or Olmon, a place in Baotia, was so named.

Pratus taking it in great disdain to be so used by his Guest, yet would not kill him, but fent him to Iolas, King of Lycia, his Wive's Father, with Letters, wherein he defired him to make the bearer away. To fulfill his request, Iolas first caused him to fight with the Chimara, a Monster that vomited fire, not doubting of his destruction thereby; but he mounting the Horse Pegasus, slew the Monster. After this he sent him against the Solymi and Amazons, whom he conquered: then caused some of the strongest young men he could procure to ly in ambush, and fall on him; whom also he having flain, Iolas, admiring his valour, gave him his Daughter Philonoe to Wife, and when he died, left him his Successor in the Kingdom of Lycia. Concerning this Chimara, what should be meant thereby is scarcely discernable. (a) Some have understood by it a Mountain in Lycia, the top whereof (a) Servining vomited forth fire, the middle part had pastures full of Goats, and the foot or lib. 6. bottom abounded with Serpents. 'Tis conceived he might make this Mountain habitable, and thence be faid to have flain the Chimera, which had a mouth like a Lion, middle parts as a Goat, and the hinder parts like a Dragon. At his return this was fulfilled; for begging some meat of an Herdsman, he, having nothing to give him, offered him a Clod, which he gladly accepted, saying, Aletes accepteth of a Clod: which became a Proverb. Who gave the name of Corinth to the City is uncertain; but however, Aletes, out of gratitude to the Oracle. named it Corinth of Jupiter: which gave occasion to the multitude to believe that Corinth, the King that built it, was the Son of Jupiter; wherein they fo gloried, All Khens &: and so often vaunted of it, that nothing became more ridiculous, and they were laughed at for it throughout Greece. After Aletes, the eldest of the Family succeeded Eufeb. in Chrofor several generations. The first after him was Agelas, who governed thirty years; the next Eudemus, who reigned 25: then came Aristomedes, who having ruled 35, left a Child behind him, which his Brother Algemon, whom he had appointed Guardian, deposed, and held the Kingdom himself sixteen years. After him followed Alexander for 25, whom Telestes the Son of Aristomedes slew, and obtained his Father's Kingdom, which he held twelve years. He was also flain by Arieus and Perantas his Kinsmen, and then Automenes reigned one year, which being expired, the Bacchiada, more than 200 in number, seized on the

More people flocking thither out of Peloponnesus, this City grew and increased exceedingly; so that it became not onely the principal of all in Sicily, but the greatest and most beautiful of all Greece, as Cicero witnesseth, and in its due place will be farther discovered. Much about the same time was there another Colony sent into the Island Pheacus, lying nigh to Epirus, at a little distance from the Continent, conducted thither by Cherscrates another of the posterity of Hercules. Homer in his Odys. maketh this Island inhabited in the Trojan times, by the Pheacians a most noble People, over whom reigned Alcinous the Son of Nausthous, who received Ulysses after his long Wandrings, and helped him in his journey home to Ithaca. He mentioneth his Royal feat, called Scheria, (which Pliny from him affirmeth also to have been the name of the Island, as well as Pheacia) and faith, the Inhabitants were much given to Navigation, and most skilfull therein. In the foil of this Scheria, the old Inhabitants being expelled, this new Colony planted it felf, which taking the name of Corcyra, the whole Island came thence to be so called. The City, much befriended by the commodiousness of the Haven, and the conveniency of the place for Sea-matters, grew in a short time to be very considerable; so that it founded of it self two Cities, viz. that of Epidamnus, as we have it from Thucydides, (by the Romans called Dyrrachium) and Apollonia, as Strabo writeth; both of them feated in that part of Illyricum inhabited by the Taulantians. The form of this Commonwealth was (agreeable to the constitution of all Colonies) like to that of Corinth the Metropolis, which then was governed by the Bacchiade in an Oligarchicall way. When Corinth was afflicted by Tyrants, Corcyra felt also their influence upon its infancy; but at length it grew to that height, as to renounce such obedience as the other challenged, whence great and tedious Commotions were produced in Greece.

The Corinthian Kingdom

5. The Bacchiada neither communicated the Government nor Marriage to any Herod. lib. 5. other person than of their own family, till one of their Women being lame, and cap 90. 66, upon that account despised by them all of her own stock, had thereby an occasion given to break the custom. She (named Labda) married Ection, (the Son of Echecrates, and Nephew to Antassus of the Petrean Tribe) who, having no Children by her, or any other, went to Delphos, and enquired of the Oracle concerping iffue. He received an answer to this effect, That he should have a Son, who like a Stone would fall upon the Oligarchy, and breaking it in pieces, amend the State of Corinth. This coming to the ears of the Bacchiada, who had an Oracle before much to the same purpose, though under general terms, they resolved to hold their peace, and kill Ection's Child as foon as it should be born. And as foon as his Wife was delivered, they fent ten of their Company to destroy it, whom the Mother presented with a fight of the Babe, thinking they had come to congratulate her Husband about its birth. They had agreed amongst themselves, that whosoever first came at the Infant should knock out his Brains: but the Child smiling in his face who first took it in his Arms, he was so moved with compassion, that he would not kill it but delivered it to one of his fellows, who touched with the fame compassion gave it to another, till it passed through all their hands unhurt. Being gone out, and standing at the door, they blamed one another exceedingly, especially the first, whose part it was to kill it, and in they returned now to doethe deed. But the Mother, hearing their discourse, hid the Infant under a Bushell, or such a like instrument of measuring Corn, so that not finding it they returned, giving out they had done their errand; and so the Child thus preserved was named Cypfelus, from Kuling. the measure under which he was hid, in the Greek tongue called Cypsele.

6. When he was come to man's estate, relying upon another Oracle (whereby he was plainly bidden to be King of Corinth, and his Children after him, but not his Nephews) he invaded the Tyranny, which to establish, many he deprived of their estates, but many more of their lives. He first lulled the people asleep with A.M. 3350. good language, and thereby getting all into his hands, made himfelf Lord of the City. His power he preferved by removing those out of the way whom it most concerned him; but once established he grew exceeding mild and fair, with good words, and no ill deeds, drawing the people into such a respect of him, that all his time he flood not in need of any Guard: a rare thing in men of his condition, which Gelo at Syraufe onely imitated. This change happened at Corinth in the second year of the 31. Olympiad, in the days of Phraorter, King of the Medes, and Ardyr Grandfather to Crafus, King of Lydia, 20 years after the second Messenan War, and 30 after the nine Annual Archons were established at Athens, A. M. 3350. Upon his A. M. 3350. Geizing the power, Demaratus, a man eminent amongst the Bacchiadæ, and very Dissoft Halisson. rich, fled into Italy, and seated himself in Hetruria, where, of a Woman of that Gliving Li. Countrey, he begat two Sons, Aruns and Lucumon, the latter whereof became King of Rome, by the name of Tarquinius.

7. Cypselus having enjoyed the Principality of Corinth and Corcyra the space of thirty years, then died, and left it to his Son Periander. He was much unlike Herodotus on his Father, of a cruel disposition, (if we believe Aristotle rather than Sosicles in Herodotus) infomuch as not trufting the good will of his People, he got a Guard of 300 men about him, and would rather be feared than loved of his Subjects; yet being hardy and warlike, he held the power longer than he. Herodotus out of Solicles relateth, that at first he was very mild and courteous, till, by acquaintance with Thrasybulus the Tyrant of Miletus, he altered his humour: for fending to him for his advice how he might best order his affairs in Government, he returned no answer to the Messenger, but carrying him out into a plot of Corn, sell a-plucking off the tallest and most eminent Ears, till he had well-nigh marred the whole plot. The Messenger returning, told Periander what he had seen; who eafily gueffed, that the most eminent and powerfull Citizens were to be removed out of the way. But * Ariftotle maketh him the Author of this Counsel * Polit. 1.3 c.g. to Thrafybulus. Laërtius faith, he grew more cruel after it was known that he lay & 15.6.10. with his Mother Cratea.

8. He married Melissa the Daughter of Procles (or Patrocles) Tyrant of Epidaurus, on whom he begat Cypfelus and Lycophron, whereof the elder was very Latenius in via blockish and stupid. At the instigation of his Whores he afterwards killed his Wife, Periandi, kicking her when she was great with child, then lay with her when she was Herod, w saped, parentation to Meliffa of all their cloaths and ornaments. Lycophron, his youngest Son, who onely was capable of the Government, moved by Procles his Grand-father, grew exceeding froward and refractory because of his Mother's death; infomuch that, differences and distasts increasing, Periander banished him first his house, then forbad all his Subjects to speak to or comfort him, and at length forced him into Corcyra. But after some years growing old, infirm, and unfit for business, he fent for him home, offering to pass over all to him: but by no arguments or intreaties could he move him to return, till he offered to change places, and devest himself of all Power. Now when this was agreed on, the Coregreans, fearing above all things to have Periander come amongst them, to prevent it, killed the young man. Periander, to be revenged, took away from them 300 of their choicest Boys, which he sent to Halyattes, King of Lydia, his Friend and Ally, to be gelded: but they being driven upon the Island Samus, the Inhabitants took such pity both on them and their relations, as to fend them home fafe, and disappointed the Tyrant. This fo vexed him, now almost eighty years old, that he died of grief, though by some he be reckoned amongst the seven Wise men of Greece. Suidas out of most ancient Authors delivereth this Character of him; That he was an harsh and cruel Tyrant, very martial, scarcely being ever out of War, and very powerfull at Sea, having so convenient Havens both upon the lonian and Ægean Gulfs. He reigned nigh forty years, and died in the fourth of the forty eighth O- A-M-3420. lympiad, seven after the establishment of Solon's Laws, A. M. 3420.

9. Periander being dead, his Tyranny as it were tottered for three years and Nabuch. 24. some fix months, during which time Pfammetichus the Son of Gordias, Brother to Periander, or rather something a-kin to him, held it; as appeareth by (e) Ari- (e) Politic. L.s. ftotle, who onely hath preferved his name to us from utter oblivion. After his "12. removal the power of One man was laid aside, and the People put themselves into a Free State, which continued as long as the Liberty of Greece it felf. The form thereof is not described to us by any ancient Author; onely this we know from (f) Plutarch, that it was inclining more to Oligarchy than that of Syracuse, the (f) In Timolepower of the Multitude being more bounded. Yet, for certain, the Government was Popular, things of greatest consequence never being resolved on without the consent and decree of the People, (which kept those of highest concernment in its own power;) and, if any other in the World, was a friend to Antimonarchical liberty, and an utter enemy to Monarchy, whereever it was found in Greece. For this City undertook many times great Wars for this very cause, and not out of any ambitious defign, as is clear in the case of the Syracusians, and others; so that a Captain out of it was most defirable upon such an occasion; as may hereafter be discovered.

SECT. VII.

The ancient Kingdom of Thebes.

1. DOEotia had on the West Phocis, on the East the Eubwan Sea, on the North the Eastern Locri, and on the South Attica and Megaris. The chief Seat and Metropolis of this Countrey was Thebes, the Builder of which is not certainly known. Calydnus is reported first to have reigned here; whence by a Poet of Chalcin it is called the Tower of Calydnus; and in Hesychius, Calydnaan is the fame with Ancient. After him was Ogyges, or Ogygus, from whom Thebes by the A. M. 2244 Poets is called Ogygian, and that great Ogygian Deluge is named, which is faid to have happened in his time, 1020 years before the first Olympiad, in the days of Phoroneus King of Argos, (as Africanus gathereth) and so overwhelmed all the region of Attica, that it made it unhabitable for 200 years, as Pererius noteth. in those parts, together with the Temmices, (who came from Sanium) and the Leleges, till Cadmus, coming to Greece, made himself Master of this place. in the days of Corax King of Sicyon, and Danaus of Argos, 347 years after the beginning of Ogyges. 2. This Cadmus, according to the tradition of the Greeks, was Son to Agenor Apollod, lib. 2. the Brother of Belus, Uncle to Danaus and Ægyptus, who, coming out of Ægypt into Phanice some 36 years before, on his Wife Telphassa begat three Sons. Cadmus, Phanix, Cilix, and a Daughter named Europa. This Europa Jupiter stole, and carried over Sea into Crete, in the likeness of a Bull, where he begat on her Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Sarpedon. Afterius King of the Island afterwards married her, Died. L4. p.183. and, having no Children of his own, adopted her Sons. Herodotus telleth us that some Greeks, (Afterius perhaps, or some for him) in revenge for what the Lib. 1. cap. 2. Nation had formerly suffered from the Asiaticks in stealing away Ino, went to Tyre, and thence stole Europa the King's Daughter, bringing her away in a Ship whose Enfign was a Bull; whence occasion was given to feign, that she was carried over upon a Bull's back.

3. Agenor fent out his three Sons to feek their Sifter, charging them never Diod. 1.4 P. 1457 to return without her into Phanicia. Cadmus failed first into the Island Callifthe, (lying near Crete) where he left a Colony, and thence into Thasus, Paulan lib. 5. (fo named from Thasus one of his Companions, and head of another Colony A.M. 2555. left here) and at length into Greece, where, in Beotia, being past all hope of finding his Sifter, and confequently of returning into Phenicia, by the command of an Oracle he founded Thebes; or re-edifying what was formerly built by Ogyges, a-new laid the foundation of the Castle, which, ever after, from him retained the name of Cadmea. The Hyante, beaten by his Forces, fled the night fol- Strabo 1.9 p.401. lowing into Phocie; but the Æone, upon their submission, were suffered to continue and imbodie themselves amongst the Phanicians. Here he married Harmonia

the Daughter of Mars and Venus, agreeable to which alliance, the Gods are faid to have come down unto Cadméa to the Wedding. Out of Phenicia he first brought Died. 1.3. p. 140. Letters into Greece, giving them their peculiar names and characters, fitted for the 228. Multi alii. language of the place, and thence they were called Phanician; though afterwards Pelasgian, because the use of them was, after they were brought over, first made known to the Pelasgi. 4. chus, who found out Wine and Ale, and travelled throughout the then known World, to reduce men to civility. This he did with an Army both of men and women, and after an Expedition of three years returned out of India, first triumphing upon an Elephant. Ino was married to Athamas the Son of Æolus, and Grandfon of Hellen, to whom the bore Adecon, that was devoured by his own Dogs. A. Apollod. gave became the Wife of Eetion, to whom the bore Pentheus. After Cadmus had reigned some time at Thebes, he was called by the Enchelee, who had Wars at that time with the Illwians, and were bidden by the Oracle to fend for him and Harmonia to be their Captains. He left then the Kingdom of Thebes to his Son Polydorus, and, having subdued the Illyrians, reigned over them, and begot another Son called Illyrius, who either gave or took name from that People. The Poets feigned Cadmus and his Wife to have been turned here into Snakes, because they feem to have forgot their former civility, and learnt barbarism. 5. This is the fum of what the Greeks have delivered concerning Cadmus. But what the Side though they, for their own credit, made him the Son of a King, yet the Sidonians, whose Countrey-man he was, denie this, alleging that, being their King's Cook, he fled away with Harmonia, a certain Minstrel. His time, as it is computed, falleth in with that of Johna, so that he seemeth to have led into Greece a Colony of those Canaanites, or Phanicians, who were outed of their habitations by the Ifraelites. His Family may be gathered to have been that of the Kadmonites, mentioned by Moses, who were the same with the Hivites, and called Cadmonim, or Orientals, because they possessed Mount Hermon, the most Eastern part of Canaan, taken for the East, as Thabor for the West. Hence came it to pass that Cadmus his Wife was called Harmonia, or Hermione; and it is apparent why they were feigned to be turned into Snakes, because an Hivite in the Syrian language signisfieth a Serpent. That he first brought Letters into Greece is most probable, 1. Because the ancientest Greek letters, in most things, are like to the old Phænician, which the Samaritans at this day use. 2. Their names are plainly Phanician, or Hebrew, as may be instanced in Alpha, Beta, &c. of which the Greeks were not ignorant, as appeareth out of Varro. For Crates the Philosopher, disputing in Greece about some points of Grammar, demanded why they said not Alpha Alphatos as well as Gramma Grammatos; to which the Grecians answered, that the names were not theirs, but barbarous: and Plutarch rendred this reason why Alpha is set before the rest by the Phanicians, because they called an Oxe by that name, 3. The Greeks kept the same order of letters as the Phænicians did, being most ancient, as appeareth by some acrostick Verses of David and Jeremiah. Cadmus brought over the Rites of Bacchus into Greece, and thereupon is feigned to be Grand-father to him, who lived many Ages before, and indeed was Nimrod. To this City, built or re-edified by him, he gave the name of Thebes, of which name there was a place in Canaan mentioned by the Book of (a) Judger, and by (b) Jo- (a) Capo, so fephus also written Thebe, in the plural number; so that an end may be put to that (b) Amiq. 1.5. controversie about the original of the word, which betokeneth mud or dirt. But concerning all this Bochartus is to be consulted, in the first Book of that admirable

6. Polydorus, succeeding his Father, married Nydeis the Daughter of Nydeus, by whom he had a Son named Labdacus, whom, dying before he came at age, he * left to the tuition of his Father-in-law. fully the Kingdom to him: wherefore the King dying also not long after, and leaving his Son Laius a Child but of one year old, having experience of his faithfulness, committed him to his protection. Afterwards Amphion and Zethus, the Sons Died. 14. p.1567 of Antiope, invaded Thebais in revenge for their Mother's hard usage and Captivity, the having been taken by Lycus in Sicyon, or delivered up to him by Lamedon King of that City, when he led down thither an Army, at the defire of his dying Brother, to revenge him upon her and Epopeus, as we before shewed. Lycus meeting them in the field was slain in battel, Thebes lost, and the Child Lains had miscarried, but that some well wishers to his Family withdrew him out of the danger, lest the posterity of Cadmus should be utterly extinct. Amphion then and Zethus obtained the Kingdom; faid by Homer to have built Thebes, which must be meant of the lower City distinct from Cadméa. Amphion was so excellent a Musician, that he is faid to have made Stones to follow him, wherewith he built Towers about the City. He married Niobe, the Daughter of Tantalus, and Sister to Pelops, who brought him many Children, but boafting her self more fruitfull then Latona her self, procured the destruction of them all. For Apollo was commanded to kill the Boys, and Diana the Girls; whereat she was struck with such stupidity, that she is seigned to be turned into a Stone; and Amphion with all his Family at length died of the Pestilence. Zethus, having his young Son killed at unawares by the Mother, pined

7. Lains married Jocaste, the Daughter of Menæceus, but was admonished by the Oracle to beget no Children, because else he should be killed by his Son; which punishment Pelops had prayed might fall on him for stealing his Son Chrysippus, begotten on a Concubine. Notwithstanding this he had a Son, but as soon Applied. as he was born he thrust his Feet in Iron setters, and exposed him as a prey to wild Beasts. Yet, either by those that had this charge, or others that found him, he was carried to Polybus, King of Corintb, who caused his Feet to be healed, (from the Died. 1.4. p. 185. Swelling of which he had the name of OEdipus) and brought him up. Many years A. M. 2695. after, when he was grown, Lains, either hearing some rumour concerning him, or carried by natural affection, went to enquire of the Oracle what had happened to his Son; and at the same time it chanced that OEdipus, having heard of some design against himself, went thither also to enquire who were his true Parents. They met A. M. 2722. in Phocis, where Laise bidding the other somewhat imperiously to give way, OEdi-

9. OEdipus then married Jocasta his own Mother, not knowing that she was such, and obtained the Kingdom of Thebes. Diodorus telleth us that he had two Sons by her, Eteocles and Polynices, with as many Daughters : but others fay he had them by Euryganea, the Daughter of Hyperphas. At length all came to light; both that he had killed his Father, and married his own Mother: whereupon the presently hanged her felf, and his Sons kept him up close for the filthiness of the thing, 1) nanged that we have a single from Thebes, and that, going to as some say; though others will have him driven from Thebes, and that, going to Theseus King of Athens, he there died a little after. Polynices, while his Father was yet living, went to Argos, where he married Argia, the Daughter of Adr. Diodorns. flus; but after his death returned to Thebes to succeed him in the Kingdom. The Applied. two Brothers then agreed to reign by turns; but Eteocles, having the first course, refused to yield up his Power at the time prefixed, so that Polynices was glad to return to Argos. At the same time there happened to be with Adrastus one Tydeus, the Son of OEneus, who, having killed a man in Ætolia, fled also to him: both these he kindly received, and, by direction of the Oracle making them his Sonsin-law, promifed to reftore them to their Countreys and Estates. Beginning first with Polymees, he sent Tydeus in Embassage to Eteocles, who caused fifty men to lie in wait for him by the way, but he killed them all, and returned fase to Argos. Adrassus, to revenge the injury, made all possible preparation for a War, and invited all the best Souldiers from all quarters to the Expedition. Seven eminent Captains gave their names, whereof Amphiaraiis, who had married Eriphile, the Sifter of Adrastus, was Chief; though of so ancient a thing as this Theban War there can be little certainty.

Gates of the City. Eteocles made all preparations for defence, affigning to every Gate its Officer, and confulted Tiresias a Prophet, then blind, concerning the event of the War. He answered, that the Thebans should overcome, if Menæceus, the Son of Creon, would devote himself as a Sacrifice to Mars: which he presently did, killing himfelf before the Gates. The Thebans then made a Sally, but were beaten Diod. 1.4, p.177. back to the Walls, which when the Argives approached, Capaneus, one of the seven Captains, first of all others set to Ladders, and mounted; but he being killed, the other retreated, and many of them were flain in the pursuit. After this, it was agreed that the two Brothers, in a fingle Combat, should decide the Quarrel; and fo doing, they mutually fell by the hands of each other: then followed a very sharp Fight, wherein all the Captains that followed Adrastus were slain, and he onely escaped by the swiftness of his Horse Arion. Yet this Victory cost the Thebans so

dear, that being themselves almost ruined, hence Cadméa victoria became a Proverb.

This War fell out twenty eight years before that of Troy. 11. Eteocles leaving behind him a young Son, named Laodamus, Creon, the Brother of Jocasta, assumed the Guardianship of him, and would not suffer the Argives to be buried, till Theseus and the Athenians procured it. neral: which having done, and marching into Thebais, they wasted all the Countrey round about the City. Hereupon the Thebans made a Sally, and a sharp conflict insued, wherein Laodamus slew Ægialeus, the Son of Adrastus, and was himfelf killed by Alemaon; though Pausanias faith he escaped out of the Fight, and fled to the Illyrians. After this the City was taken, and, with other plunder, Tiresas the Prophet was sent as a Present towards Delphos; but drinking by the way pre- Parlan. fently died. Generations; even from the days of Cadmus to this time. The Epigoni having taken the City, and either flain or driven away Landams, placed Therfander, the Son of Polynices in the Kingdom, who failed with Agamemnon towards Troy as Generall of the Buotians, and was killed in Mysia by Telephus, as was before shewed. The Baotians chose Peneleus for their Captain, because his Son Tifamenus was then but young: and he was also flain in the War by Euryphylus, the Son of Telephus, who after the death of Achilles brought Auxiliary forces out of Mylia unto Priamus.

Peneleus being dead, Tisamenus, the Son of Thersander, reigned at Thebes, Pausanian il His Son Autesion less this place, and went to the Dorienses; wherefore Damasichthon, support the Nephew of Peneleus, and Son of Opheltas, was chosen in his room. After him followed Ptolemaus, and then Xanthus the last King of all, who was slain by Melanthus the Messenian in a single Combate, in behalf of the Athenians, about clide, 57 before the death of Codrus the last Athenian King, 252 before the first Olympiad, A.M. 2877. After his death, together with the possession of Celene. the Thebans quitted the Government of Kings, it feeming good to them no longer to be governed by a fingle person, but by many, as Pausanias writeth from whom yet it appeareth not what kind of Rule was crected; whether an Oligarchy at first or the whole power was affumed by the People, which we know affuredly exercifed it in after-times, in a Democraticall way. Such was the Government when the Persians had obtained the Empire of the East, and Greece it self most flourished; at which time, in the entire History of this Countrey we shall hear farther of the Thebans.

SECT. I.

The Original of the City of Rome.

The anciene inhabitants of

THE City of Rome was seated in Latium, the Western Tract of Italy, upon the River Tiber. The foyl, for as much as can be known, (faith Dio- Dionyf. Halicarnysus) was first inhabited by the Siculi, who held many other places of that Coun-nass. i. i. trey. These were expelled by the Aborigines, who being the Posterity of the OEnotrians, (who seized upon that Tract lying near Tarentum) were consecrated first to the Gods, and, according to the custom of the Countrey, then sent out to feek them new feats, and fortunes. The OEnotrians came out of Lycaonia (afterwards called Arcadia) to feek a more commodious habitation under conduct of OEnotrus, the Son of Lycaon, from whom they received their name. These Aborigines here fettled, were forced to admit of some Pelasgians to live amongst them that fled from Hamonia, (fince called Theffaly) where for some time they had continued; and afterwards certain Arcadians who followed Enander, Son to Mercury, and the Nymph Themis, from a Town of that Countrey called Palantium, which name they gave to an Hill on which they fixed, afterwards reckoned amongst the Seven belonging to the City. Not long after, the Greeks will have Hercules come into these parts, as he was returning home from his Expedition into Spain, and the Western Regions, and here to have left some Peloponnesians, who fettled themselves upon the Hill called then Saturnius, and afterwards Capitolinus, at what time Faunes reigned over the Aborigines.

2. The Father of Faunus is faid to be Picus the Son of Saturn, who, flying out of Crete from his Son Jupiter, came into this Country, and here hiding himfelf, gave occasion for the Region to be called Latinm. Some say the Father of Picus was rightly called Sterces, and furnamed Saturn, from whom the Laurentine Augustin. de Picus was rightly called Sterces, and inflanted outside, then the Town, and that from Givitat Dei, Kingdom took its beginning, named from Laurentum the Town, and that from Givitat Dei, Kingdom took its beginning, named from Laurentum the Town, and that from Givitat Dei, Kingdom took its beginning, named from Laurentum the Town, and that from Givitat Dei, Kingdom took its beginning, named from Laurentum the Town, and that from Givitat Dei, Kingdom took its beginning, named from Laurentum the Town, and that from Givitat Dei, Kingdom took its beginning, named from Laurentum the Town, and that from Givitat Dei, Kingdom took its beginning, named from Laurentum the Town, and that from Givitat Dei, Kingdom took its beginning to the Control of the Contro Laurus or Laurel. Picus had this name from the Bird Picus (a Wood-pecker) which he used, by its flying to foretell things to come, as Festus noteth out of Verrius. Plutarch faith, that he was by the Sorceries of his Wife changed into this Bird, in the likeness of which he gave forth Oracles, and answered Questions. And agreeable hereto, Dionysius of Halicarnassus compareth this Bird with the Dove of Dodona, as performing that to the Aborigines, which it did to the Thesprotes. But

Servius thinketh all this feigned, because Picus was a Soothsayer, and observed the flying of this kind of Bird: and Bochartus telleth us, that Piccea in the Phenician dialect fignifieth a Seer or Prophet; whence, as Phix amongst the Baotians was taken for a cunning woman, so he, for his skill in such matters, might, according to the termination of Latin words, have the name of Picus. This man, who in Suidss hath the name of Jupiter, (except Jupiter of Crete, that stole Is, was called Picus) begat Faunus or Fatuus, and a Daughter named Fauna and Fatua, which being in a fury would also foretell things to come; whence such as were thus taken were faid Fatuari. Being killed by Faunus her Brother and Husband, as it feemeth, she was worshipped as a Goddess, and called Bona Dea, because she was so modest, that never any man saw her except her Husband. Dionylius maketh this Faunus the Son of Mars. He is feigned to have ferved under Bacchus in his Expedition into the East; and this is the reason, because indeed he was the same with Pan, the constant companion of Bacchus. (a) One writeth (a) Auth-Villa the back of the same and Pan by some (b) Another Gigh de Orig genis that he was called also Sylvanus Invius, and Pan by some. (b) Another faith, Rom him on a certain Hiperboreau Virgin, whom having received as an Holtage from her Father, he kept untouched till he came into Latium, and afterwards gave her in marriage unto Faunus, therefore accounted the Father of Latinus. Fifty five Eneas with the years after the departure of Hercules, and in the 35. of the reign of Latinus, Eneas with his wandring Trojans arrived at Laurentum, not far from the Mouth of Tiber. Livie faith, it is most certain, that, Troy being taken, the Gracians raged against the other Inhabitants, but abstained from Antenor and Æneas, (the Son of Anchifes, who was Son to Capys, and Grand-fon to Affaracus, the Brother of Ilus King of Troy) both for the friendship which had past betwixt them and their families, and because they were ever for peace and the restitution of Helena. But Dionysius relateth out of Hellanicus, that the lower part of the City being taken, Æneas with his affociates, that came from Ophrynium and Dardanus to the aid of Ilium, timely perceiving it, retired into the Castle, where were the Idols and much treasure, protected by the most valiant Souldiers. Hither also betook A.M. 2821; themselves such as escaped the fury of fire and sword; and they easily repelled the force of the Enemy. But Enems confidering that the City could no way be preserved, resolved to quit the Castle so as might stand with the safety of the Company. He therefore fent out with a guard the aged and infirm, in the mean time diverting the Enemy, and then marched out in order of battel, when Neoptolemus and the Ackeans had now taken part of the Fortifications. Whilst the Greeks were busied in plunder, they all escaped to the Mount Ida, where fortifying themfelves, the same night others flocked to them out of Dardanus, Ophrynium, and the rest of the Troign Towns, expecting till the Enemy, satisfied with the destruction of Ilium, would draw off, and return into his own Countrey.

4. But the Acheans having wasted the City, and lesser Towns, provided also to storm the Hills; when a Treaty was defired by the Trojans. It was there agreed, that Æneas and his Companions, with fuch things as they had, should depart out of the Country under safe conduct. Whereupon he first sent away his eldest Son Ascanius, with part of his Associates, (whereof the greater number was Phrygians) to the Lake Afcanius, for that he was defired by the Inhabitants of that Country to be their King. He continued not long with them, for the Scamandride, with others of the Family of Hector, now difmissed out of Greece by Neoptolemus, the Son of Achilles, coming to him, he returned with them to Troy, and restored them to their Father's Principality. Hneas with the rest of his Chil-SECT. dren, Anchises his Father, and his Houshold, passed over the Hellespont into a Peninfula called Pallene, whence he failed to the Island Delm, and thence to another named Cythera, over against Peloponnesus. Touching at the promontory Cinethium, (so called for that Cinathus a Trojan was here buried) they renewed their friendship with the Arcadians their kinsfolk, and passed on to the Island Zacynthus, which was so named from Zacynthus one of the Sons of Dardanus. Thence they came to Adium, and so to Ambracia; from which Bay Anchises directed his course towards Buthrotum an Haven of Epirus, and Æneas by Land went two days journey to the Oracle of Dodona, which having consulted about new Seats, in four days he came to the Navy at Buthrotum. From this Haven failing towards Italy, they touched upon some parts thereof, but passing into the Streights of Sicilie, they fell also upon that Island; where leaving part of their Company, they went over and landed at Laurentum, the place appointed to put an end to these Wandrings. This account Dionysus giveth us, as most probable, amongst others which he briefly toucheth. Alexander the Ephesian, as he is cited by Aurelius Victor, wrote that Ilium being betrayed by Antenor, Eneas took his Father upon his back, with his Gods, and his little Son in his hand, and thus loaded made towards Ida; whither being suffered to come by the Greeks, (who were much moved at his Piety) he there built Ships, and by the advice of an Oracle came into Italy. The Piety of Eneas is much spoken of, and commended by many; and, amongst others, by the pen of Xenophon, that Attick Muse: but some wrote that he joyned

5. The Trojans landing at Laurentum, there pitched their Tents in the place called Troy from this occasion, distant from the Sea about half a mile. Taking their Livius 1 t. dinner on the ground, some laid their meat on Parsley, that there grew, or, as some faid, on crusts of Bread, which afterwards they did also eat up; and then understood that they had fulfilled the Oracle, which bade them go so far Westward, as till they should eat up their Tables, and then take the conduct of a Sow, which they should follow till she lay down, and in that very place build a City. Now was Latinus busie in War against the Rutuli his neighbours. As some wrote, he was first overcome by Eneas, and then made peace with him: but others say, he first sent to expostulate the injury offered him by these Strangers in the invafion of his Kingdom; and then, understanding who they were, agreed to give them all the ground five miles about the Hill where the Sow lay down, upon their ingagement to affift him in his War against the Rutuli. This Accord made, and Hostages delivered on both sides, they soon utterly subdued the Rutuli, and then built up the Trojan City, which was called Lavinium, as the Romans faid, from the Daughter of Latinus. Virgil, too much indulging his Poetick fancie in imitation of Homer, bringeth Heness into Italy not till the eighth year after the feptime piece destruction of Troy. But Dionysius and Solimus (out of the Annals of Cassius Hee-Omnibus erranmina) write, that he arrived at Laurentum in the second year, and the latter saith, tem terris & fullibus estat.

abode in Italy, reigned onely over the Trojans: but the next brought him also the Kingdom of the Aborigines, by the right of his Wife Lavinia, Daughter to Latinus now deceased, and the favour he had purchased of this People, by his conduct against the Rutuli. For they had again revolted, through the procurement of a certain Fugitive named Turnus, who being the Nephew of Amata, Latinus his Wife, out of indignation that a Stranger should be preferred to the Marriage of Lavinia before him, at the instigation of Amata and others, revolted to the Rutuli with a party of men which he commanded. Livie maketh him King of the Rutuli, and to have made War upon Latinus, because he had first made him a promise of his Daughter. The Aborigines had the Victory, but lost Latinus in the Battel. Dionysius saith, that Turnus was now also slain with many others: but Livie will have him again to renew the War, and to call in Mezentius King of the Hetruscans, who was already jealous of the growing power of the Greeks. Heres, to oblige his new Subjects, caufed both them and his own Country-men to be called by the common name of Latini; but ingaging in another great and bloudy Battel with Mezentius, which night onely interrupted, he was never feen more, by some thought to be taken up to Heaven, and by others drowned in the River Numicius. This happened to him in the fourth year of his reign over the Latines, and the feventh after the destruction of Troy. He was honoured by a Chappel dedicated to him un130

Alba Longa

name came to be changed in their flight from Troy, as Dionysius writeth. Some thought him the same with the eldest Son of Æneas by Creufa, and called Iulus, from whom the Family of the Julii took its name; but others accounted him younger. Mezentius grew very high upon the death of Eneas, and belieging Lavinium, forced the Latines to submit themselves; but requiring all their Wine to be yearly fent as a tribute into Hetruria, they would not endure so harsh terms. and encouraging themselves, fell upon their Enemies at unawares, and, killing Lausus the King's Son amongst many others, forced him to submit to equal conditions. Thirty years after the founding of Lavinium, Ascanius led out a new Colony, and built another City called Alba Longa, whither he betook himself, A.M. 2852. leaving the old to his Mother Lavinia, who, if his own Parent, managed the ante Rom. 400, Kingdom for him in his Nonage. He died in the 28. year of his reign, and was fucceeded by Sylvius, whom some make his Son, others his Brother, saying, that Lavinia being left with child by Æneas, for fear of Ascanius fled into the Woods, and there was delivered of this Child, who from the place of his birth had the name of Sylvius. Iillus, the eldest Son of Ascanius, contended with him for the Kingdom: but the people conceiving it to belong to him of right, as the Nephew of Latinus, gave the Priesthood to the other, in whose family it thenceforth continued. From Sylvius all his Succeffors were furnamed Sylvii; whereof the first (after he had reigned 29 years) was Æneas Sylvius, his Son. Æneas having reigned fo many, left Latinus his Successor, whom after 51 followed Alba for 39. After Alba, Capetus reigned 26 years, Capys 28, Calpetus, or Carpentus, 13, and then Ti- A. After him Agrippa reigned 24 years, then Alladius (called also Aremulus and Romelus Sylvius) 19; who was very wicked and tyrannical, infomuch that he would counterfeit Thunger, definous to be accounted a God by his Subjects, and justly perished by Thunder and Laundation through excessive Rains. Aventimus succeeded him, who gav. masse to one of the seven Hills, and after 37 years left Procas Sylvius his Succession

8. Procas, the thirteenth King of Alba, left two Sons, Numitor and Amulius: A. M. 3209. whereof the latter and younger violently thrust his Brother from the Kingdom; and that he might have no Posterity to revenge the injury, caused his Son to be made away in a pretended Hunting, and his Daughter Rhea to be devoted to the fervice of Vesta, and a single life. In the fourth year of her Priesthood, as she was going to fetch water for the fervice of the Goddess, she was light upon by some one, and ravished: some said by one of her Lovers, others by Amulius himself, who came disguised upon her, rather out of desire to take an occasion against her, than for any affection; but for credit of the cause the fact is laid upon Mars, in whose Grove it was committed, and who came to her, as tis faid, in a terrible manner with Thunder and Lightning. Rhea (called also Sylvia and Ilia) conceived with two Boys; and when they were born, she was either put to death, or condemned to perpetual prison, and they were thrown into the River. At the fall of the water A. M. 32351 they were left upon the dry ground, and a Wolf moved with their cries came O'ymp 2.40.4 and fuckled them, till they were taken notice of by Faustulus the King's Cris 40-Herdsman, who brought them home to his Wife Acca Laurentia, that had been newly brought to bed of a still-born Child. Some thought that Numitor, aware of his Brother's intention to make them away, caused other two to be brought in their rooms, and gave his two Nephews to be nourished by this Faustulus. Others write that this Acca Laurentia was but the Paramour of the Herdsman, and for the naughtiness of her life called Lupa, (Lupanaria amongst the Romans signifying Brothel-houses, and Lupa a Strumpet) whence the Fable arose that the Children were nourished by a Wolf. Their names were Romulus and Remus.

9. The Boys grown up proved active and couragious, fuitably to their birth: but being educated as was agreeable with the fortune and employment of their Foster-father, they had occasion to fall out with the Herdsmen of Numitor, and Remns being taken priloner was carried before the King. Now did Fanffulus Dissoft reveal the whole matter to Romulus concerning their Original, who got together a company of Herdsmen, and therewith falling upon the Palace slaw Amulius, and restored their Grand-sather to the Kingdom. After things were fettled at Alba, the young men had a defire to build a City in the place where they had been brought up; which their Grand-father well approving gave them the ground, with such of his Subjects as he knew to be of his Brother's Faction, and all others that of their own accord would willingly go out in this new Colony.

Most of the Trojans gave their names, (whereof continued to the time of Dio- SECT. 1. ny fine almost fifty Families:) the Inhabitants of the place also, as many as were left about Palantium and Saturnia, were taken in, and the Multitude divided into two parts, that by emulation the work might proceed with greater expedition. But what was intended for a laudable contention grew to a greater inconvenience; for hereby were two Factions made, which preferring the Brothers each before the other, raifed in them ambitious desire of Preeminence. This foon appeared in that they could not agree about the place; Romulus would have the Palatine Hill (or Palantium) to be taken in, and Remus contended for Remuria, though on the other they were educated. The matter was brought before their Grand-father, who advised them to go apart, and observe the flying of Birds; and to whom happened the most lucky Flight, he should be accounted the Author of the Colony. Romulus went to the Palatine Hill, and Remus to the Aventine near adjoyning. Remus first had fix Vultures come flying by him; but Romulus his flock doubled the number: so that both of them were saluted King.

10. The contention grew fo sharp as to proceed to a Fight, wherein Remus had the worst of it, and was slain; which Dionysius thinketh the most probable opinion. Others write, that he scoffed at the lowness of the Wall which his Brother had made, saying, it would easily be passed over by Enemies, and therewith leaped over it himself; for which he was presently killed by one Celer, who overfaw the work. Romulus compassed in the Palatine Hill, and made that the Rudiments of the City, with an Heifer and a young Bullock joyned together plowing up a furrow where the Wall should be reared: which use was afterwards observed by the Romans, both in the building and razing of Cities. This is the most common and received opinion about the Original of Rome, which some make built at another time, and by other Founders. Cephalon Gergithius, a most antient on concerning Historian, wrote that it was built in the second Age after the Trojan War, by Romus, one of the four Sons of Eneas; with whom many other Authors agreed. Others made the Founder of it to be Æneas himself, whom they will have come in company with Ulysses into Italy. Aristotle the Philosopher wrote, that part of the Acheans themselves, in their return from Troy, were by Tempests driven upon Italy, and forced to plant themselves in Latium. Callias the Historian, who recorded the Acts of Agathocles, mentioned a Trojan Woman, called Roma, that being married to Latinus, King of the Aborigines, bare to him two Sons, Remus and Romulus, who building the City, named it Rome after their Mother. Kenagoras reckoned up three Sons of Ulyffes by Circe, Romus, Antias, and Ardea, all which built Cities of their own name. Dionysus of Chalcis, with others, would have this Romus to be the Son of Ascanius; some of Emethion, and some of Italus by Electra the Daughter of Latinus. Besides these, many other Greek Authors diffented about the Founders of the City.

11. Neither have Roman Writers agreed amongst themselves. Some of them would have the Sons of Eneas to be Founders of the City, viz. Romulus and Remus; others, his Nephews by his Daughter, which he gave up as Hostages to Latinus, King of the Aborigines. Some write how Ascanius, being left Heir by his Father, divided his Inheritance with Romulus and Remus his Brethren. He himself built Alba and other Towns: Romulus Capua, so called from Capys his Greatgrand-father; Anchifa, from Anchifes his Grand-father; and that place afterwards called Janiculum, which he named after his Father Æneas; then lastly, Rome after his own name, which being afterwards desolate, the Albans re-peopled by a Colony led thither by Romulus and Remus. According to this History, this City should have been twice founded; first, not long after the Trojan times, and then again in the fifteenth Age after. But more than this, Antiochus of Syracuse mentioned a third Rome that must have been before the War of Troy, writing, that from Rome came a certain Sicilian fugitive to Morges, the Son of Italus, King of Italy. By reason of this uncertainty of the Founders, some, whose prejudice against the Empire of the City moved them with envy, accounted it no other than a receptacle and fortress of Barbarians, Fugitives, and Vagabonds; and were ready to call into question the History of Romulus, as a meer invention made to hide the despicable Original of so great a Commonwealth.

12. Whether it was a new Plantation, or reparation of an old Town, there is great variety of opinions concerning the Time thereof. Timeus the Sicilian made its Foundation contemporary with that of Carthage, and the 38. year before the first Olympiad. But of those which seem to approach nearer to truth, some place the

SECT. 2. foundation of it in the fixth Olympiad; whereof Velleius Paterculus affigneth the Several opinions first year, others the third, and Varro (from the opinion of Tarcutius, a most ex-Several opinions collent Mathematician) the fourth: which opinion is followed by many Authors of great note, (besides Augustus, Claudius, Severus, and Philip, Emperours, in their Secular Games) as Plutareh, Tacitus, Dio, Gellius, Censorinus, Onuphrius, Casar Baronius, Torniellus, Joseph Scaliger, and Jacobus Cappellus. Solims will have Pomponius Atticus and Cicero to reckon from the third year of this Olympiad; but as Pliny, Paterculus and Livy, fo Cicero varieth, fometimes counting from the Calends of January of the foregoing, one while of this, and another of the following year. M. Portius Cato, knowing that Rome was built something before the feventh Olympiad, not standing upon minute and scrupulous deductions, began the Æra of the City from the first of January that fell in the first year of that Olympiad; and so the year of his own Consulship he said to be the 758. year of the City. This Æra is followed by the Fasti Capitolini, Solinus, Eusebius, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, (who taketh pains to prove the account good) Polybius, Sigonius, Pighius, Occo, Goltzius, Isaacus Cafaubonus upon Polybius, and others. Fabius Pictor wrote that Rome was built in the eighth Olympiad; the reason whereof, as Cappellus thinketh, is, because Romulus might then have finished the Wall and Ditch; some deriving the Æra of a Building from laying of the Foundation, and others from the finishing of the Structure. Lastly, L. Cincius, as Dionylius informeth us, held that the City was built in the fecond year of the twelfth Olympiad. In this great variety of opinions we have most reason to approve that of Varro, the most learned of all Romans, who placeth the beginning of Rome in the fourth year of the fixth Olympiad, the fixth of Jotham King of Judah, and A. M. 3252. The feventh of Pekah King of Ifrael, about the time that the Epbori were made at 01.6 m.q. Sparta, in the days of Charops the first Archon at Athens for ten years, A.M. 3252. Juliani 6.

The number of the Colony amounted scarcely to 300 horse, and 3000 foot, Diany lib. 2. wherewith Romulus (which some make but the diminutive of Romus his true name) Livins lib, 1. planted this new City, called Rome after himfelf. To increase the number of his Citizens, he opened a Sanctuary to all malefactors and discontented persons, who then reforted to him in great numbers from the Countries adjoyning. Setting about the frame of the Commonwealth, by his Grandfather's advice, he remitted it to the choice of the People what kind of Government they would have; whereby, obtaining the Kingdom in way of gift, his Power became the more plaufible. He divided the people into three Tribes, every Tribe into ten Curia, and every Curia into ten parts or Decuria, over all which he appointed Officers. According to the number of the Curia he divided the Grounds into thirty parts, excepting one portion for publick use, and another for superstitious Cere-SECT. monies. He made a distinction of his People according to honour and dignity, giving to the better fort the name of Patres, either for that they were elder, had Children, for the Nobility of their stock; or, if Detractors may be heard, he therefore named these Patritii, because they alone could shew their Fathers, the other multitude being a rabble of Fugitives that had no free and ingenuous parentage, Wherefore when an Affembly of the People was called by the King, the Patritians were by the Crier cited by their own and Fathers name; but the inferiour fort, or Plebeians, were gathered together by the found of Ox-horns. Having distinguished his Subjects into these two Ranks, he ordered what each should doe. The Patritii were to take care of Superstition, bear Offices of Magistracy, administer Justice, and govern the Commonwealth together with the King: The Picbeians to till the Fields, feed Cattel, and exercise Trades; lest by their meddling in the Government, and by mutual Contention of the poorer and richer fort, such Seditions might arise as were too visible in other Commonwealths. 3. To bind each to the other, he commended to the Patritians certain of the

Patrons and

Plebeians, whom they should protect and countenance; liberty being given to the common fort to make choice of whom they would for their Patrons. This custome Distribute. of Patron and Client was very ancient in Greece, especially amongst the Thessalians and Athenians; where yet the Clients were very imperiously used, their Patrons imposing on them services ill beseeming Free-men, and beating them like Slaves, if they disobeyed their commands. The Athenians called them Theta for their service, and the Theffalians Penesta, upbraiding them with their Fortune. But Romulus refined the use of Patronage, rendring it profitable unto both. Patrons by him were ordered to advise their Clients concerning Law, of which they were ignorant, and take care of them as well absent as present, as their own Children, in what concerned money and contracts, undertaking Suits for them when oppressed, and procuring them quiet both as to publick and private business. On the other hand it was the duty of Clients, to help their Patrons with money in the marriage of their Daughters, if need should be, or redeem them and their Sons if taken captive; to bear the charges of private Sutes or publick Fines, and that at their own cost, in way of gratitude; to assist them with their purses in defraying the charge of Magistracy, or honourable employments. This was common to both that neither ought to accuse the other, nor give any testimony or suffrage against each other, or to be reckoned amongst his Enemies; which if any one did, or was, he was held guilty of Treason by Romulus his Law, and it was lawfull for any one to kill him. Hereby, for many Ages, this Patronage continued in force, and was as effectual for love and mutual help as Consanguinity or Alliance: it was the glory of the Nobility to have many Clients devolved upon them from their Ancestors, and obtained by their own vertue. But not onely the Plebeians in the City found themselves secured by this Patronage, but in process of time all Colonies, associate Cities, and fuch as were fubdued by war, had their Patrons, to whom many times the Senate would remit fuch Controversies as were brought before it from the faid Cities or Commonwealths, and ratifie their Judgement. Lastly, such firm Concord followed this Constitution of Romulus, that, for 730 years, as Dionysius reckoneth, though many and great Contests arose betwixt the Nobility and Commons about the Commonwealth, (as is usual in all both great and little States) yet it never came to bloud or flaughter, but, mutually yielding and granting, all Controversies were composed by civil Expostulations; till Caius Gracchus, Tribune of the people, overthrew the peace of the City: after which, they neither spared to kill and banish one another, nor to commit any other wickedness, whereby they might compass Victory and their own devices. 4. After this, Romelus refolved to chuse a Senate, which should affist him in the Government, and from amongst the Patritians selected 100 after this manner. Out of them all he first made choice of one particular man, to whom, when he was Idem. constrained to be absent in the Wars, he committed the Government of the City: Then he commanded every Tribe to chuse three men, such as were eminent for birth and wisedom; and every Curia to elect three out of the Patritians. This number he called a Senate, either for their age, or vertue; or because, as Festus will have it, nothing was done without their permission, the Senate being named à Sinendo. Perceiving after this, that he stood in need of a Guard for his own person, he caused the Curiæ by their Suffrages to chuse him out 300 young men, (ten out of each) whom he called Celeres, from their readiness to execute his commands, as most have written; or, according to Valerius Antias, from their

SECT. 2. Captain, whose name was Celer. Under him were three Centurions, and other inferiour Officers. This Company with their Spears defended the King in the City, and received his Orders: in Battels were the first Leaders, and the Keepers of his body, beginning the fight first, and retreating last of all; which custome Diongfins thinketh Romulus to have taken from the Lacedamonians. Things being thus appointed, he limited unto all their work and honours. The King's duty was to take care of their Superstition; to look to the preservation of the Laws and Customs, either natural or written; to decide the most weighty Causes betwixt man and man. and refer those of lesser consequence to the Senate, into which he was also to have an inspection. He was to call together the Senate, assemble the people, first to speak his opinion, and ratissic what was approved by the major part. This was the King's work at home, who in the Wars had absolute authority. To the Senate this honour and Senate. power was given, to debate and resolve about such things as the King propounded, which were decreed by the greater number of voices, agreeable to the constitution of Lacedamon, as our Author observeth. To the People he committed three things; People.

to create Magistrates, make Laws, and resolve about War what was propounded by the King: yet fo, as that the authority of the Senate interpoled. All the whole Multitude together gave not their votes, but the Curiæ apart; and whatfoever feemed good to most, was referred to the Senate: which custom was afterwards changed. when the Senate did not confirm the Decrees of the People, but the People the Refolves of the Senate. 5. For the increase of the City, besides the opening of a Santluary, (which Dionylius ranketh after this fettlement of the Civil Policy) he forbad, when any Town was taken, that Prisoners of ripe age should be slain or fold, or their grounds left untilled; but commanded a Colony to be fent from Rome, to which part of them should be assigned, and some of the Strangers to be admitted to the Freedom of the City: which device our Author esteemeth of great weight and conse-L ws in referiage.

quence. He made many good and profitable Laws, whereof most were unwritten. He ordained in reference to Marriage, that the Wife should be partaker of all that was her Husband's, when chast and modelt. If he died intestate, she was his absolute Heir; and if he left Children, equally with them. When she offen- confule Val. ded, she was lest to his disposal for punishment, who admitted her Kindred to judge Max. 1.2.6. 1. with him concerning the fault, if the either violated Chastity, or drank Wine, which Ronalus utterly condemned, as an incentive to wantonness. So effectual became this Constitution to the preservation of the conjugal knot, that for 520 years there happened not any Divorce in Rome, till, in the 137. Olympiad, when Marcus Pomponius and Cains Papirius were Confuls, Sp. Carvilius, an eminent man, put away his Wife; and then, though he sware to the Censors, that he did it onely to provide for posterity, yet was he ever hated by the people. He gave to Fathers absolute power over their Sons, and that for all their lives, either to imprifon, beat, carry away bound to rustick labours, or kill; although the Son bore the greatest Office in the Commonwealth, or were publickly commended and honoured. By virtue of this Law, some eminent Persons, making Orations to the People in opposition to the Senate, in the midst of popular applause, have by their Parents been pulled down from their feats, and led away to be punished according to their pleasure: and as they passed along the Forum, none could deliver or rescue them; not the Consul, Tribune, nor Multitude it self, which they had flattered. And because of this absolute paternal dominion, several valiant men have been put to death for their valour shewed in some way against the Enemy, contrary to the direction or command of their Fathers.

6. He compelled Parents to educate all their Male-children and their eldest Daughters: he permitted a Child younger than three years to be made away, if it was born defective in some member, or monstrous; and yet then was it not to be exposed without approbation of the five next neighbours. If any one broke this Law, he, befides other punishment, forfeited half of his goods. The Father was permitted by the Law-giver to fell his Son, and that three times over, if it happened that he recovered his liberty: a greater power than was had over Slaves, who, if once made free, thenceforth to continued. All fordid Arts, and fuch as were subservient to Luxury, he forbad, which being left to Slaves and Strangers, for a long time the Romans scorned to meddle with. Two courses of life onely he enjoyned them, Warfare and Husbandry, allowing a Market once in nine days. He divided equally to them the Grounds, Slaves, and Money, taken from the Enemy. Concerning Injuries, he presently decided all Controversies, or referred them unto others, inflicting punishment according to the crime: and seeing the people to be by fear best retained in order, he set up his Judgement-seat in the SECT. most conspicuous place of the Forum, where his guard of 300 Celeres, and twelve Sergents, or Lifers, carrying Rods and Axes, and in the view of all men either beating or putting to death Malcfactors, made a terrible flow. This is the form of the Commonwealth, as Romulus first established it, much admired by Dionyfins above all the Constitutions of his own Country-men the Gracians: whose Religion also (as giving occasion to the vulgar sort to contemn their Gods involved in such misfortunes, or to abstain from no iniquity and filthiness to which they heard that their Deities were also obnoxious) he esteemeth vain, frivolous. and dangerous, in comparison of that which was instituted by the Roman Law-7. Romulus, confidering that there were feveral powerfull Nations round about him, which with evil eyes beheld the growth of his City, bethought with himfelf how he might contract Amity with them. Concluding, that Affinity was the onely means, by the advice and confent of the Senate, he refolved upon a course The Rape of the to provide Wives for his Subjects. He caused, at the suggestion of his Grand-Sabine Vingins. father Numitor, a solemn Feast, and Exercises in honour of Neptune, to be proclaimed throughout the Countrey: to which many flocking with their Wives and Children, upon fign given, his men laid hold on fuch Virgins as were come to fee, and violently carried them to their houses. The number of them amounted to 683; for whom Romulus chose out so many Husbands, and married them after their own Country Rites, making them covenant a Society or Communion of Fire and Water: which Custom continued for many Ages. Some write that this happened in the first year of Romulus; but others affign the fourth of his reign for it, which scarcely could be done till matters were fomething fettled. Some delivered, that scarcity of Women was the cause of this Rape: others thought, that by it an occasion was onely fought for War: but a third party will have, that by this violent act an Affinity with the neighbouring Cities was endeavoured.

8. Some were grievoully moved, and others put a good construction upon the business: but at length the matter broke out into a manifold War, of which that with the Sabines was most grievous. The Cities Canina, Antenna and Crustumium first began, after they could not perswade the Sabines to joyn with them. The two former, inhabited by the Aborigines, Romulus presently subdued, and afterwards the latter also, which was a Colony of Alba. The Grounds were divided betwixt some Romans, sent thither to plant, and the old Inhabitants; of whom fuch as would were made free of the City, and, without loss of their former estates, reckoned amongst the Tribes and Curie, to the number of 3000: so that now the Roman Footmen were increased to 6000 men. Upon the Victory over Cenina and Antenna, he first triumphed, and designed a plot for a Temple to Jupiter Feretrius, (6) called from Romulus his bringing home in triumph the Spoils of Acron the King of Cenina, whom he slew. The Spoils were named by the Romans Opima Spolia.) The plot of ground was about fifteen foot long, and this was the original of the Capitol. Having obtained a great name for his valour and clemency, many eminent men went over to him with their families, amongst whom was Celius, who gave name to an Hill in the City: and some whole People comand received Colonies from Rome. This faces the Sabines fore repined at, layning now the blame one upon another, that they had not withstood the beginnings of the Roman Greatness: wherefore they resolved to correct their former carelessness by double diligence, and affembling together at Garrer, their Metropolis, decreed War against Rome for the Spring following, and made choice of T. Tatius their King to be General. Romulus made all possible provision for refistance, fortifying the Capitoline and Aventine Hills. Lucumo from Solonium, a City of Hetruria, brought Auxiliary forces, and Numitor was not wanting to the affiftance of his Grand-fon.

9. The Sabines having demanded restitution of their Virgins, and to have the authors of the injury delivered up, (that they might have a more specious pretence for their actions) received no fatisfactory answer, and therefore both parhorse: and the Roman Army contained 20000 foot, and 800 horse; a very great number for a new-builded City. Tatius pitched his Tents betwixt the Quirinal and Capitolian Hill, where feeing all places strongly fortified, and small hopes for him to attempt any great matter, as he despaired of doing any good, one Tarpeia, the Daughter of Tarpeius who kept the Capitol, called to his men from above,

It is said, that the required to have what they wore on their left arms, meaning their Bracelets; but when the let them in, they threw their Targets which they carried on their left arms upon her, and therewith pressed her to death. Being Masters of the Capitol, they had thereby great advantage to continue the War at their pleasure, and first some light Skirmishes insued: but at length they resolved to doe their utmost on both sides, and for several days continued the fight, so long as till night severed them, for the most part with equal success. This made the Sabines serioully bethink themselves, whether they had best carry on the War, or retreat; and the Romans were rather more to feek how to hold out: yet neither party would stoop to desire a Treaty. Whilst they remained in this anxious condition, those

Such of the Sabines as would, were made free of Rome; and a respect was had of those Matrons who procured the Peace, that they which would live with their Husbands, should be exempted from all work and fervice, befides spinning and making of Cloath.

10. Some write, that from thirty of these Women which undertook this Reconciliation, to perpetuate their memories, the Tribes were named: but Terentius Varro denied it, alleging that they had names before, and that by fuch honour given to thirty, the rest of the Women were not passed by and discouraged. For five years the two Kings reigned peaceably together, and joyntly subdued the Camerini, a Colony of the Albans: but in the fixth, it happened that some of Tatius his friends plundring the Lavinians, and by him being protected, notwithstanding Romnlus and the Senate judged they were to be given up; moreover killing the Embaffadors fent to demand them, wherein they were also born out by him; when he went to Lavinium to facrifice, or perswade the injured perfons to be quiet, the friends of the Embassadors fell upon and knocked him on the head. Romelus, to his great contentment thus freed from his Partner, made fatis-faction to the injured, and burying Tatins at Rome very honourably, subdued Fidenæ, a Town five miles off, which had seized on provisions coming to Rome in a time of famine. Thither he fent some of his own to inhabit, according to his custom, and then punished the Crustumini, who had killed those Planters which he placed amongst them; and over them he obtained his second Triumph. The Veil. most powerfull People of Hetruria, inhabiting a City no less than Athens, situated upon a craggy Rock, at some twelve miles distance from Rome, found themselves concerned in what the Fidenates suffered, and by an Embassie required the Romans thence to remove their Garrison, and restore the Inhabitants to their whole Demesses. This being denied, they met at Fidena, and there fought two bloudy Battels, wherein Romulus had the better, and triumphed the third time. Plutarch writeth, that the Veientes ridiculously challenged Fidenes to belong to them, and receiving a fcornfull answer from Romulus, divided themselves into two parts. whereof with one they fought the Fidenates, and with the other went to meet Romulus, who flew of them above 8000, with the loss of 2000 of his own men. In the next Battel he is fabuloufly reported to have killed 7000 with his own hand, being half the number that was flain. The Veientes now betook themselves to intreaties, and entred into a League with the Romans for an hundred years, on these Conditions; to quit a great part of their Grounds, with the Salt-pits near the River, and give up fifty Holtages of their most considerable Families. Romulus triumphed over them on the Ides of October, leading with him their Captain, an high and tyrannical upon his Success, inlarged his Prerogative beyond those bounds he had formerly set to it, and made use onely of the Senate to ratifie his commands. Hereby he contracted the hatred of that Order, (though the Souldiers loved him) which brought him to an untimely death. Some think he was torn in pieces in the Senate-house, and the Senators by piece-meal carried out his body under their gowns, so that it was never seen. Others wrote, that having drawn out the people to the place called Capra Palus, and there making an Oration to them, a fudden darkness mortals. The Senators took occasion from the secrecy of their fact, and concealment of his body, to perswade the multitude that he was taken up amongst the Gods; and Julius Proculus, a man of prime Nobility and credit amongst the Patritians, put all out of doubt, by swearing most religiously that he appeared to him in the high-way, and told him, that it pleased the Gods, from whom he came, so long to let him continue amongst men, till be had founded a City, whose Empire and glory should excell, and then again that he should return to Heaven. He bade bim farewell, and tell the Romans, that if they did but use Temperance and Valour, they should in power excell all Mortals. And he would be a propitious God unto

He lived 55 years, and reigned 37, in which space he much advanced the State of the City, which who first planted with him, were not much above 2000 foot, and scarce 300 horse; but when he died, he left of the one kind 46000, and almost 1000 of the other fort. After his Grand-father's death, he succeeded in the Kingdom of Alba, which he governed by Deputies, continuing his refidence at Rome. The day on which he died, was the Nones of Quintilis, (afterwards called July) which answereth to the 26. of May, as the Calendar was reformed by Julius Cafar. It was named None Caprotine from the place where he vanished; and Fuga Populi, because the people aftonished at the King's death took them to their heels. Tarrutius the Mathematician observed, that the Life of this Prince was signalized by three Eclipses of the Sun: one at his Conception, which is also the first that is observed by Authors; another the same day he founded Rome; and thethird on the day of his death; concerning which, for that the calculation of the former is rather founded upon Aftrological than Astronomical Principles, Jacobus Capellus is to be consulted.

An Inter-regnum for a year.

12. Romulus dying childless, the Senate for a year's space retained the Power in their own hands, which is called an Inter-regnum. They governed by their courses, each man five days. But the People murmuring, and giving out, that for one Tyrant they had got an hundred, at length they resolved that a King should be chosen. The Sabines thought it reasonable he should be of their Nation, not having had any fince Tatius; and the other were averse to a Stranger, being defirous he should be some one of the Patritians: but at length the Fathers fixed upon Numa Pompilius, a Sabine, a man of almost forty years of age, and the most A.M. 3291. confiderable for knowledge and ability of that time, who by confent of the People Exerbia 17.

was advanced to the Government. At first he excused himself; but solicited by Olymp. 16. an. 4. his Father, and Marcius his kinsman, not to let slip so fair an opportunity of his own and Countrie's preferment, he accepted of it. He thought it policy to raise that City by Laws, and religious Customs, which had been founded by Force and Arms, and to soften the Genius of it by diversion from Warfare; it being as necessary to employ a People well at home, as exercise them abroad. He built a Temple to Janus, which was to stand open in time of War, and be shut in peace, as it continued all his reign. But it onely happened so to be twice from his time to that of Tiberius Cæfar, as some observe. The first occasion was in the Consulship of Titus Manlius and Marcus Attilius, after the ending of the first Punick War; and the second in Augustus his reign, after he had subdued Antonius and Cleopatra, at what time there was an universal Peace. Numa disbanded the Royal Guard of the 300 Celeres, as standing in no need of them. To the two Flamens of Jupiter and Mars, he added the third of Romulus. To him is also ascribed the bringing in of the Pontifices. whereof he himself was one, and the Original of which name is so much controverted. He also ordained the Vestal Nuns, and the Feciales, a fort of Priests which judged concerning the equity of War, and denounced it. His Religion much fuited, in the manner and strictness thereof, with that of the Pythagoreans, which caused the report of his being contemporary and converling with Pythagorus; although this Philosopher was born 100 years after his death. The reason of this miltake, befides the ignorance of the times, was his familiarity with Pythagoras a Lacedamonian, who gave him advice concerning the ordering of his Kingdom, travelling in Italy in the fixteenth Olympiad, the third year of which was the beginning of Pythagoreans.

Numa's reign, according to Plutarch. 13. As Pythageras taught that the Principle of all things is not to be perceived by sense, or liable to motion, but invisible, immortal, and to be apprehended by the understanding alone; so Numa forbad the Romans to use the Image of any God which represented him after the form of a Man, or any other living Creature. Neither in these antient times was there any painted, carved, or molten Image amongst them: but for the first 170 years, though they built Temples BOOK I

138

He reformeth

SECT. 2. and Sacred places, yet had they no Image at all; because they thought it wickedness, to liken more excellent things to those below them, and thought God no otherwise to be perceived than by the Mind. Numa divided those Grounds amongst the poorer fort which Romulus had gained in his Wars, caufing his Subjects to apply themselves to Husbandry, to cultivate their Minds as well as the Earth; and that he might take away the distinction of Roman and Sabine, which threatned the State with endless emulation and prejudice, he distinguished them all according to their Trades and occupations, making every Art a particular Company and Fellowship. He abated the rigour of that Law made by Romulus, concerning the power of Fathers over their Children, ordaining it should not be lawfull for them to fell fuch Sons as by their leave had married, because it was unjust that a Woman which had married a Free-man should be constrained to live with a Slave. He reformed the Year, which in the time of Romulus was quite out of all order; some moneths had fewer than 20 days, some had 35, and some above; the variety of the several courses of Sun and Moon was not understood; but onely this aimed at. that the Year should confist of 360 days. 14. Numa, confidering that a Solar Year exceeded the Lunar by eleven days.

(the one confliting of 354, and the other of 365) doubled these eleven days, and every other year inserted a Moneth after February, consisting of 22 days, and by the Romans called Mercedonius, because at that time mages were wont to be paid. He changed the order of the Moneths, affigning to March (formerly the first) the third place, to January the first, and February the second; whereof this was the last, and the other the eleventh, in the days of Romulus. Many have been of opinion, that Numa added January and February to the rest of the Moneths, and that formerly the Romans had but ten, which appeareth by the name of December, the last moneth, and because the fifth and fixth moneths from March were called Quintilis and Sextiss. Thus March must have been the beginning of the Year, which Romulus so named from Mars his supposed Father. The fecond was April, so called from Venus, as some thought, (because her superstitious Worship was performed in it, when the Women were crowned with Myrtle as they washed;) or, as others gathered, from the opening of Plants at that time of the year. The third was May, named from Maia, and facred to Mercury. The fourth was June, from Juno, as some thought: others deriving the names of these two from Majores and Juniores, the Elder and Younger. The rest had their names from their order, as Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, November, December. Afterwards Quintilis was from Julius Cafar called July; Sextilis August, from Augustus. September and October the Emperour Domitian changed into his own names, but prefently after he was killed they recovered their former. Onely the two last ever retained their first appellations. Of those moneths which Numa either added, or ranked, February was so called from the Expiations which used to be in it, signified by the word Februa: then they were wont to make Parentations to the dead, and celebrate the Lupercalia, certain Sacrifices and Games in honour of Pan, much like to the Sacrifice of Expiations. January was named of Janus, which Numa seemeth to have set before March, because he would shew that Civil vertue is ever to be preferred before what is exercifed in War: For Janus was accounted one of the most antient Gods, or Kings, (from whom, reigning in Italy, some make the Romans descended) very studious for civil fociety and humane converse, and who changed the course of man's life from brutish and savage to an humane and gentle kind. He is therefore feigned to be double-faced, because he brought in another fashion of life than what formerly had been; and had a Temple built by Numa with two doors, that were shut in Peace, and open in War, as was before faid. These things Plutarch relateth in the Life of Numa.

15. But Livie, and other confiderable Authors, (a) Solims, (b) Macrobins, (c) C. 3 and (c) Conformus, write that the first Roman Year consisted but of ten moneths (b) Saur. libs. and 304 days; fix of the moneths having 30 days, and the other four 31 apiece. (c) cp, 20, But this account differing from the course of the Sun, Numa, to make them agree, added 51 days to the year. That he might make up the twelve months; from the fix, confifting of thirty days, he took one day apiece, and therewith made up 57, which were divided into two moneths, whereof the one contained 29, and the other 28 days; and so the Year began to have 355. Of this opinion, besides Junius Gracchanus and Fulvius, both Varro and Suetonius were, as appeareth out of Censorinus. Yet Licinius Macer and Lucius Fenestella, by the same testimony, (two antient Writers of Annals) delivered that the first Roman Year confifted of 12 moneths, agreeable to the former opinion related by Plutarch. This S E C T. 2. to the beginning of the year; and endeavouring to shew, that they who would Temp lib 2. 5 have the year to confift but of 10 moneths make it no shorter than they that are for the abnormal for 12, distinguishing it not so much in number as placing of days: for the Romans in mis, cap. 17. Romulus his time filled up the year, either by affigning more days than thirty to the moneths, or adding so many in the end thereof as seemed to be wanting.

16. Numa, to gain credit and obedience to his Constitutions, seigned that he had converse with the Goddess Egeria. He married Tatia, Daughter to Tatius the King, by whom he had a Daughter named Pompilia. Some faid he neither had any other Wife nor any more Children: but others both as to Wife and Children differted from them. He lived above 80, reigned 43 years; and at his death was buried with great honour. His body was not burned, (which he forbad) but buried in a Stone-Coffin under the Janiculum; and the Books of his Ceremonies laid by him in another, which being twelve written in Latine, and as many in the Greek tongue, were 400 years after, when Publius Cornelius and Marcus Bebius were Confuls, by water wrought out of the earth, and, for that it was thought wickedness to have such things discovered to the multitude, (from whom he also kept them, after the fashion of the Pythagoreans, not communicating discipline by writing, but onely by word of mouth) burned by command of the Senate. He kept the State in constant Peace, and his ability herein contributed to the general quiet of Italy; so that, by the example of his Reign, Plutarch judgeth that saying of Plato to be verified, That the onely means whereby men should be made happy, would be, to have a Philosophical mind and Regal power concur in a Prince, who would make Vertue superiour to Dishonesty. But the fortune of the fucceeding Kings added to the luftre of his glory: For of the five which followed, the last was cast out, and died in exile; and none of the rest obtained a natural and quiet end, according to Plutarch. 17. Numa being dead, and the Government devolved upon the Senate, after several Inter-reges, at length Tullus Hostilius was created King by the universal confent of the City. His Grand-father was that Hoftilius, who most gallantly behaved himself against the Sabines at the Cittadel, and married of that Nation the Daughter of Hersilia. After much valour shown, he was slain in battel, and left a young Son, who at ripeness of age, of a noble Matron, begat this Tullus Hostilius, the third King of Rome; whose beginning, according to the account of Dionysius, was in the second year of the 27. Olympiad, wherein Eurybates the Athenian was Victor, A. M. 3333. when Leostrains was Archon at Athens, in the 83, year of the City, and the 31. of V.C. 82.0 Manasses King of Judah. At his first beginning he purchased the favour of the poorer fort, by dividing unto them, man by man, that portion of Land which the two former Kings had kept to bear their charges, faying, that his own inheritance would fuffice for his own expences. ' Lest these should want room, he took in the Hill Calius, where fuch as wanted habitation, and now had gotten grounds, built them houses, and he also dwelt himself. He was not onely of a different temper from Numa, but, as Livie describeth him, more fiery than Romulus, being as well moved by his proper inclination, as the glory of his Grand-father; so that he fought, and greedily imbraced, all occasions for War. It was not long ere one was presented from the Albans, who made Depredations in the Roman Territories, and were again robbed by the Romans. At that time Caius Cluilius governed Alba, who envying the growth of Rome, fought to stir up Division, and raise War betwixt the two Cities. Dionysius writeth, that for this end he privately procured fome to prey upon the Romans, knowing they would revenge the injury; and when they did so upon such as they could take, he perswaded the Albans that they had received a great affront, and excited them to take up Arms.

18. Embassadors were sent to Rome to demand Restitution, and such as had Dienystes 1.3: been Authors of the injury to be given up into their hands. This Hostilius being Livius I. 1. aware of, and knowing that they who first refused to make satisfaction would bear the Odium of the War, caused some of his friends kindly to entertain the Embaffadors, pretending he was by necessary occasions hindred from giving them audience, till he first sent some of his own to Alba to demand Restitution. They received a sharp repulse from Chilins; whereof Hostilius having notice, then gave audience to the Albans, told them how those that he sent had already received such an answer as argued the League quite broken: whereupon he and Christii.

SECT. 2. denounced a just and necessary War against the Albans, which he would carry on not onely with his domestick forces, but by the aid of his other Subjects and Dependents. Both parties then made all possible preparations, and drew out their Forces to a place afterwards called the Ditch of Chillin, some five miles distant from Rome. When they expected suddenly to decide the quarrel, Cluilius was found dead in his Tent, whether by some secret practice upon himself, by grief, or any other means, is uncertain. Into his place was chosen Metius Suffetius, a man of a turbulent spirit, and scarcely able for warlike matters, but thought fit for the place, because as great an Incendiary as his Predecessor. Yet sensible of danger that hung over his head from the Fidenater, (who gaped after the destruction of both) he drew out the War in length, and at last fearfull to lose all, was inclinable to a present Composure. Hostilius was now also not averse to a determination of the business, being desirous to punish the Fidenates and Veientes, who, formerly overcome by Romulus, had submitted to the obedience of Rome, and in the days of Numa taken occasion of his peaceable Government, to provide for the absolute shaking off of the yoak. This time they thought presented them with a fit opportunity; for, gathering together at Fidenæ, they were ready, when the Albans and Romans should in battel have weakened each other, to fall upon both.

19. This Plot discovered, wrought so upon both the Captains, that they came to a Conference, wherein much being alleged for the justice and right of both parties, at length it was agreed, that three persons on each side should by Combat decide the quarrel, and that City, whose Champions should have the better, obtain preminence and command over the other. Whilst every Officer defired to be one of the three, Suffetius bethought himself of two ternions of Brothers who were most fit, as he thought, to take it upon them. One Seguinius of Alba had two Daughters, whereof one he married to Curiatius his Fellow-citizen, and the other to Horatius a Roman. It happened that both being with child at the same time, brought forth each of them three Sons at the first birth, whom their Parents educated as the hope of their Families. To these it was that Suffetius thought the Combat concerning Principality was to be committed, being of equal years, strength, and courage. The motion was imbraced by the parties, who dispensed with their private Affection, (no whit unfuitable to their Confanguinity) now that the honour and welfare of their Country was concerned. In the Combat two of the Horatii were flain first, and the third lest to deal with three adversaries, spirited afresh by the great advantage they had of him; but warily retreating, so as he might have but one upon him at a time, he slew them all, and Rome in him remained Conqueror. As he returned into the City, he was met by his Sifter, who fell upon him with chiding and outrageous words, for imbruing his hands in the bloud of his Coufin-germans, whereof one was contracted to her. Now elevated by his fuccess, and transported with a certain kind of ecstatical love to his Country, he killed her in the place, as one that, preferring private respect before publick good, was unworthy to live. Hereof he was accused, and Tullus neither thinking it feemly to quit or condemn him, as some say, created the Duumviri for capital Judgement, who condemned him: but, if so, there lying Appeal from these Officers to the People, the Multitude granted his life to the tears of his Father, who not onely took not ill his Daughter's death, but esteemed it an heroick act, and gave her an ignominious Burial.

20. Hoftilius dealt moderately with the Albans; but Metius Suffetius, their Dictator, or King, thinking his credit much impaired by the event of the Combat, fought how he might betray the Romans, and wrest the Power out of their hands. He dealt therefore underhand with the Fidenates and Veientes, who now, called to account for their Double dealings, brake out into open Rebellion, and by promise of assistance, incouraged them in their enterprize. And when the Romans and the other came to ingage, he refolved to stand neuter till he saw which party had the better, intending then to close with it. The Romans were discouraged to see their Friends stand aloof, suspecting the Treachery; which Tullus also apprehending, gave out, that it was by his order, as meaning by some Strategem to surprize the Enemy: upon which report the Fidenates and their Companions were discouraged, and at length by the Romans, who resumed their courage, put to the rout. After the Victory Hostilius called the Albans together, and laying open the Treachery of Suffetius, (which savoured the more of Treason, because he had trusted him as his inward Friend, and kept him three years in his place) caused him to be pulled in pieces; having beforehand fent Marcus Floratius to Alba,

He overthrew them at the Wood called Malitiofa Sylva, and forced them to beg Peace. Now also the Latines and Romans fell out, because they refused to yield obedience to these, who challenged it as due to their City, which had conquered the Metropolis. The War was managed for five years with great moderation; onely, besides continual Depredations, Hostilius punished Medallia for an example, which in the time of Roznilus had re- Livie. ceived a Roman Colony. But at this time Tullus Ho-Plunarch. filius died, having reigned 32 years; some say by Lightning, with his whole Family, for neglect of the Religion instituted by Numa: but most believed him taken away by the practices of his Succeffor, though Dionysius holdeth their opinion to be improbable.

Ancus Marcius.

Olympiad, wherein Spherus the Lacedemonian was Victor, at what time Dams. For 115, fas was annual Archon at Albens. He (who, according to what Festus writteth, 79is 6, had the Surname of Anass from his crooked Arm, which he could not stretch out in length) was Grand-son to Numa, by his Daughter Pompilia. She was married to Livius 1.1: Marcius, the Son of that Marcius, who, being the Kinfman of Numa, came with Plutareth. in him to Rome, after he had earnestly perswaded him to take upon him the Kingdom; Nama. and being elected into the Senate, after the King's death, stood in competition with Hostilius for his place, and missing of it laid violent hands on himself. Marcius his Son marrying Pompilia the Daughter of Numa, (whether by Tatia or Lucretia, is uncertain) begot on her this Ancus Marcius, who was five years old at the death of both his Grand-fathers. Ancus confidering that much of the Superstition brought in by Numa was neglected, fet himself to restore the use thereof, alleging to the people, that the Difeafes Petitience, and other innumerable Calamities which had lately fallen upon the City, together with the difaftrous end of Hofilius, proceedings. ded from neglect of their Gods. He advised them to return to Husbandry, and other peaceable imployments, neglecting violence, and the profit that cometh by War. The State being thus restored, he thought, as his Grand-father had lived, so to pass his time free from all War and molestation: but he found his expectation croffed, for that he was compelled to be a Warriour against his will, and was never free from peril and tumult. Scarcely had he begun to reign, and modelled the Commonwealth, when the Latines, contemning him as a Sluggard, and unfit for military imployment, made Depredations upon the Roman Territories. Making preparation for War, Livie writeth, that he first denounced it, sending to the Latines beforehand, and now constituted the Office of the Feciales, the Rules whereof he took from the Equicoli, an antient People.

23. He furprized Politorium, a Town of the Latines, the Inhabitants of which Livius lib. 1. he translated to Rome, where (for that the antient Romans inhabited the Palatine, the Sabines the Capitoline, and the Calian had been given to the new Denizons of Diony, 1:3. Alba) to them was granted the Aventine Hill to posses, other Neighbours being added, when, within a while, Tilene and Sicania were taken. The Latines, much concerned at this loss, conspired against him for the Spring following; but at several times he defeated their united powers, and forced them to ask Peace: so did he the Fidenates, Volsci, Veientes, and such Sabines as, not yet having felt the strength of Rome, forely repined at the success of an upstart City. He laid a wooden bridge over the River Tiber, and fortified the Janiculum on the other fide with a wall, having by a bridge united it to the City: and in the middle of Rome he made a Prison for Malefactors. Neither did he onely extend the Pomærium or Area of the City, but inlarged its Dominion. For having taken from the Veientes the Messan Forrest, his Territories reached to the Sea, upon which, at the mouth of Tiber, he built a Town called Oftia, to secure the profit of Navigation unto his Subjects; for thither Commodities being brought by Ship, were in lesser Vessels

24. Ancw being dead, (of a natural death, as should seem by Historians, save that Plutarch, as was said, included him in the number of those four that came to untimely ends) the Senate received power from the People to order the Affairs of the Commonwealth, and created certain Inter-reges, who holding the Affemblies for election, L. Tarquinius was chosen King, and began his reign about the second year of the 41. Targainius Pii- Demaratus by name, of the race of the Bacchiada, who trafficking much into Hetruria, changed his Merchandise for Tuscan Commodities, and thereby growing very wealthy, when Troubles arose at home by means of Cypfelus his Tyranny, with all his goods failed from Corinth, and fixed himself at Tarquinia, a City of Hetruria; where marrying a noble Matron, of her he begat two Sons, called by the Hetruscan names of Aruns and Lucumon. Aruns died without hope of iffue; Demaratus for grief followed him not long after: fo that Lucumon, possessed of the whole Inheritance, began to elevate his deligns, and to look after some place of Magistracy in his Country. Here he received a repulse, not being able to procure any mean Office; at which forely diffaining, he heard that Rome received Strangers with great courtesie, and gave them free admission unto Honours. He then resolved to remove thither with his goods and friends, and after his arrival, was much made of by Ancus, to whom offering his Patrimony for the publick good, as exceeding that of a private man, he received Freedom of the City for himself and followers, with ground to build houses, and for their sustenance. Now he changed his name from Lucumon to Lucius, and his Wife from Tanaquil to Gaia Cacilia, and from the place Fefins in twee of his birth superadded that of Tarquinius. During the reign of Ancus, who chose Gaia. him into the Senate, he flourished in great esteem with him, and in the favour of the People; in War no man shewing himself more hardy, nor in Council more dextrous, prudent, or successfull: and his Integrity seemed such unto the King, that he left him Guardian to his two Sons, whereof both were under age, and one but yet an infant.

His Wars.

25. He took advantage at the Minority of the eldest, as yet scarcely fourteen years old, whom fending out of the way, under pretence of hunting, he made a Speech to the People, faith Livie, wherein he plainly begged the Kingdom, drawing to his private interest the example of Tatius and Numa, whom, being meer Strangers, they had chosen to reign over them: whereas He was not absolutely such, having lived a good space in Rome, and been trained up both in civil and military Affairs under Ancus. He urged then his Liberality towards them. Which things not being meerly pretended, he obtained his end, and was the first that came to the Government through his own ambitious feeking. His first War was with the Latines, from whom he took several Towns, and amongst the rest Collatia, over which he placed Governour his Nephew Aruns Tarquinius, the posthume issue of his Brother, and surnamed Egerius from his poverty, (having no Patrimony) and Collatinus from this place, which Surname continued to his Posterity. Having forced the Latines to beg Peace, notwithstanding their supplies out of Hetruria, he turned his Arms against the Sabines; whom after he had also forced to submit, all Hetruria combined against him, because he retained such prisoners as he had taken of the Auxiliaries fent by them to the Sabines. It was decreed amongst them, that what Town foever refused to joyn against him should not be accounted of their Body; and they presently possessed themselves of Fidena, a Roman Colony. But he so ordered the matter, that overthrowing them in fundry Battels, and preparing for another Expedition, they were humbled; to purchase Peace owned him for their Prince, and, as tokens of fealty and allegiance, fent him the Enligns of Sovereignty wherewith their Kings had wont to be adorn'd. These were a Crown of Gold, an Ivory Chair, a Scepter on the top of which was an Eagle, a Coat of purple wrought with Gold, and a purple Gown pinked; like to the Robes of the Lydian and Persan Kings, fave that it was not fourfquare, but of a femicircular figure. Some wrote also that they sent 12 Axes for so many Cities, it being their custom for every Magistrate in his own Town to have an Axe with Rods carried before him, and in a common Expedition twelve to be born before their General. Others contended that Romulus used these Axes and Rods as a badge of his Authority to punish Offenders; but Dionysius replieth, that Romulus might learn this custom of the Hetru-Scans, scans, and if not, yet might Tarquinius have these sent to him, seeing the People of SECT. 2. Sabines, (who alone contended with the Romans for Superiority) a warlike Nation, possessing a large and fertile Countrey not far distant from Rome. Over them he obtained his third Triumph, and providing for another Expedition, they prevented him by their intreaties, giving up themselves fully into his power, whom he received on the same terms as formerly he had done the Hetruscans. These were his Military actions. At the beginning of his reign, that he might bind the People to him, he chose out an hundred of the Plebeians, who for valour or wisedom were He encreafeth most eminent, and added them to the Senate, which now first consisted of 200. Romulus at the beginning chose 100 out of the first Planters, then added 100 more of the most noble of the Sabines, who with these of Tarquinius were called Patres conscripti, and the last Patres minorum gentium. Zonaras agreeth with Dionylius concerning the number of Senators made by Romulus, adding, that Tatius and he at first consulted with their Senators apart, but at length they were joyned together; so that those are not to be heard, who will have but 200 in all during the time of the Kings, and 100 afterwards added by Brutus. He increased the num-The Vestal Nuns. ber of the Vestal Nuns from four to seven, adorned the Forum, built the Walls of the City (before patched up in hafte) with four-square stones, whereof each was Chatta, or com a Cart-load. He caused the common Sinks to be made for voiding the filth of the City into Tiber; a work fo admirable, that Dionysius thinketh, from the magnificence of it, as from the Aqueducts, and the high Camfied ways, the Amplitude of the Roman Empire appeared. And this is manifested from what C. Aquilius wrote.

27. Tarquinius intended to adde three Centuries of Horsemen, named after himfelf and his friends, to the former three instituted by Romulus. That King first chose 300 out of the three Tribes, or Legions, and, after the taking in of the Sabines, increased the Legions, so that each contained 4000, whence it was called Quadrata, as Festus observeth. Yet afterwards a Legion comprised full so many men as were found convenient for the service of the Commonwealth. But he was Affins Navins. forbidden by Actius Navius to change the Constitution of Romulus, and therefore, without increase of the Centuries, doubled the number of the men. This Nevius was the most famous Augur that Rome ever knew, and so well versed in his Art, that he never missed in his Predictions. Tarquinius on a time, to try him, asked if that was possible to be done which he had in his thoughts; who answering, Tea, he laughed him to fcorn, faying, that he had thought of cutting a Whetstone with a Razor which he held in his hand: but Nevius still replying he should doe it, and bidding him to strike hard, he cut through it. This much inhanced the reputation of his skill, and he flourished thenceforth with great honour, till at length he was fuddenly miffing, and his body never could be found, which turned to the difquiet of Tarquinius. For the Sons of Ancus Marcius, now grown men, grudged him their Father's Kingdom, and often thought of thrusting him out, expecting much from martial men, who generally bore love to their Father's melbory. Now they accused him to the People of having made away the Augur, (because he had contradicted his devices) and created him some trouble; till Tulium his Son-in-law answered the objections, and cleared him of the Calumny. Missing of their design this way, they counterfeited repentance; and being eafily reconciled to the old man, out of respect to their Father, cloaked their malice for three years. Then they cloathed two of their Companions like Shepherds, who going to the Court, and pretending to be fall out, did beat each other, and called loud upon the King for Justice, having at their backs other Conspirators apparelled also in rustick weeds. Tarquinius mur. who offered to give Testimony on both sides. Being called in to the King they wounded him to death, and betaking themselves to their heels were caught, confessed who were authors of the Plot, and received their just reward. To this end came Tarquinius (furnamed Priscus, after his Grand-son of the same name had obtained the Kingdom) about 80 years old, when he had reigned 38 years, and done many and great good Offices for the Commonwealth.

Oerifus then was delivered of a Son in the King's houle, named Tulius, and furnamed Servius by her in remembrance of her Bondage. When being an Infant he lay in the Cradle, a flame of fire is faid to have appeared, and incompassed his head; which raifed great expectation of him in Tanaquil, a Woman skilfull in the mysteries of her Countrey. She brought her Husband into a great opinion of him, fo that he was educated by them, and answering what had been conceived of him. at length was made their Son-in-law: then abroad he had Command in the Army, and at home managed publick Affairs for the King when grown old; in all things behaving himself with such integrity, valour, and prudence, as purchased him the love of all the people. Now whereas Tarquinius had at his death no Sons (as Dionysius maketh most manifest) but lest two Grand-sons both Infants, Tanaquil having a defire that Tullius should succeed him, kept his death private for some time, till he had procured the people to banish the Marcii; giving out that the King, dangeroully wounded though not dead, had referred all business to him according to his custom. Being secure of the Faction of the Marcii, he then carried out Tarquinius to be buried, as newly dead; and, as Tutor to the young Children, executed the Office of King: which Tanaquil out of the window had told the people was her Husband's will, when yet she feigned him to be living. But the Patritians grudging Tullius this honour, conspired how, the next time he assembled the Senate, they might constrain him to leave off all the Royal enfigns, and then go to an Election, according to the usual manner.

29. He, coming to the knowledge hereof, affembled the People, and producing the two Boys, pleaded their cause and his own: he promised them to pay all their Debts, and divide to those that wanted the publick Grounds. Hereby retaining the power under the notion of Guardian. The Patritians were fore agrieved thereat, but the wifeft fort thought it not good to ftir, though they plainly faw the Authority of the Senste much infringed. For they confidered, that if they should make a King of their own Body, the people would not approve the choice; and if it were referred to the Multitude, Tullius would affuredly be the man: wherefore they thought it more wisedom to suffer him to reign in an unlawfull manner, that fo they might ever have some just pretence against him, than by stirring in the matter to procure him a legal Title. But he prevented this their defign, going with his Mother, Mother-in-law, and all his Kindred, in mourning habits unto the Forum; where he shewed the People how lamentable his condition was through the plots of the Patritians against him, which he deserved no otherways then by his good deeds towards the Commonality. He laid to their charge that they would call in the Marcii, that had murthered Tarquinius, and expose his Posterity, who had so well deserved of the State together with himself, to the same cruelty: and in conclusion, offering to lay down all, if such was the pleasure of the People, and undergo any hardship rather then be troublesom, he offered to descend from the Tribunal. A great clamour then arose mixed with prayers and tears of those that befought him to retain the Government: and prefently some, that were provided beforehand, began to cry out that he was to be chosen King, and the Curia were to be called the Vote; which thing was instantly resolved by the Multitude. He gladly took hold of the opportunity, thanked them that they were mindfull of the benefits received from him, promifed larger if he were elected King, and appointed a day for the Comitia, or Assembly, whereat he intended to have present those also that were abroad in the Countrey. At the day appointed for the Assembly of the Curia, (called Curiata Comitia) he was chosen King by the Suffrages of them all, and so, in despite of the Conscript Fathers, who refused to confirm the choice. as the manner was, obtained the Principality.

30. Presently after his settlement he accomplished his promise, concerning the A. M. 3427. division of the publick Land to such as were forced to preserve themselves by daily V. He added two Hills to the former five, viz. the Viminal and Esquiline, in the latter whereof he lived himself; and was the last man, if some rightly observe, that inlarged the Pomerium of the City, the Wall whereof was never any farther stretched out, though very large Suburbs were afterwards added. After he had compassed all the Seven Hills within one Wall, he distinguished SECT. 2. the City into four parts, and, in flead of three, made four Tribes. And as Romulus distinguished the People, according to their Seats and Communion in Sacrifices, into Tribes and Curia; so Servius, making every one give an account how much he was worth, according to their riches divided them into fix Ranks, or Classes. Of these, the first and highest consisted of such as were worth 110000 Asses (each of which answereth to ob. q. of our money,) the next four decreased in value a fourth part; and in the last were contained all such whose Estates were of little or no value.

31. The Classes he did also so subdivide into Centuries, that 193 were made in all: his defign herein being to know certainly how many were fit to bear Arms, and what Treasure might be supplied for Wars, or other occasions. He also first ordained the Lustrum (so named à Luendo, (from paying) saith Varro, as Flustrum De Lingua Lati-à Fluendo) to be celebrated after this Census, or value of each according to their na lib. 5. substance. On a certain day after the valuation, he enacted that all the Citizens should meet in their Armour in the Campus Martius, every one in his several Classis and Century; where by facrifice the City was expiated, or Lustrated. This Solem- Lib. 1. cap. 5. nity was termed Solitaurilia, (or rather Suovetaurilia,) because an Hog, Sheep, and Oxe were facrificed, as we reade in Quintilian. These things being performed. the Lustrum was finished, which, because of continual change of mens Estates, he ordained should be reiterated every five years; so that he (who begun it according to Lipsus, in his twelfth year) celebrated it himself four times, according to Valerius Maximus. Every fifth year the Tribute or Tax (called Census) was paid; and thence Lustrum seemeth to have had its name. After the Banishment of the Kings, Lib. 3. cap. 4: the Confuls managed this business, till the Cenfors (Magistrates proper to the work) were brought in. Lastly, Joseph Scaliger telleth us, we must distinguish the old Roman Lustrum from the later or Julian, which is onely a Systeme of four Julian years, whereof the last consisteth of 366 days absolutely without any overplus of hours. For the old and proper Lustrum contained five years compleat, which that De legibus 1. 2. cited by Cicero, concerning the Cenfors, out of the Laws of the Twelve Tables, Let them be two, Let them obtain the Magistracy for five years, maketh maniscst: so that this Lustrum cannot answer to an Olympiad, properly so called; of which beginners are to take notice. 32. divided into 98, the Equites or Horsemen being counted in; the second into 22, taking in Artificers; the third into 22, the fourth 20, the fifth 30; and the fixth and last, of the poorer fort, made up but one Century. Men and monies being levied

according to these Centuries, and not by poll, (each Century such a quantity) it came to pass, that the richest being fewer, yet divided into more Centuries, (here the word is not to be taken for 100 persons precisely, being made use of onely to express such a Division) were never free from warfare, and contributed also more money then the rest: they that were but moderately or meanly provided of wealth. being exceeded by the other in twenty Centuries, went to the War by turns, and paid but little Tribute: and they that had not any estate to speak on underwent no burthens. This feemed very just and equal to him, that they who were most concerned should take most pains, and bear the greatest charge; the Romans at that time maintaining themselves in the Wars without any pay from the publick. But the richer fort, something grieved to undergo all charge and danger, for the preservation of others as well as themselves, Servius sufficiently satisfied and requited, by giving them in a manner the whole prerogative in matters of State, the poorer being almost wholly removed from any power in the Commonwealth, though at first they did not perceive it. 33. This Secret lay in the Comitia or Affemblies, where the People refolved about the most important affairs; these three things being in their power, viz. Creation of Magistrates as well Military as Civil, making or abrogating Laws, and decreeing Peace or War: concerning which things the Suffrages of the feveral Curia were wont to be gathered, and the Vote of the poorest availed as much as that of the richest person; whence the poorer fort, being much more numerous than the rich, ever prevailed by their Multitudes. Tullius understanding this, in stead of those of the Curia, called the Comitia of the Centuries upon such occasions. First of all were called the Centuries of the first or richest Classis, viz. the 18 of Equites or Horsemen, and the 80 of Footmen; which being three more in number then all the rest besides, if they all agreed, they overcame in number, and there was no need of calling any of the others to the vote: if they difagreed, the 22 Centuries of the fecond Classis were called, and, if need were, the third Classis, and the fourth, till 97 Centuries

SECT. 2. 97 Centuries agreed in their Suffrages. If this happened not after the calling of the fifth, (192 Centuries being divided equally in number, and of feveral opinions) then was the fixth Claffer called, containing the last Century, free from Tributes and War; and to which fide it joyned, that overcame.

34. This rarely happened, and was almost impossible, the Comitia being ended most commonly by the first call; but however, seldom came it to the fourth Classis, fo that the two last were supervacaneous. By this Constitution the poorer fort were deceived, thinking it enough that every man, as well one as another, gave his Suffrage, and not confidering that the Suffrage of the whole Century was but one, whether it contained more or fewer persons in it. But at length, seeing themselves freed from danger and charge, they were content; and the richer, injoying fuch privileges for their pains and cost, were well satisfied. And this order was kept for many Ages; till afterwards, by the violent actings of some, the Common sort got more power, as Dionystus himself observed the Innovation to have broken in in his time. At the first Lustrum were found 84700 Citizens; but to increase their number, he brought in the custom of making Slaves free of the Commonwealth, whom being before manumitted or fet free, he distributed into the four Tribes of the City.

35. These Slaves were either made, or born such, as Justinian the Emperor distinguilheth them. The former fort were either taken in War, (then properly called Mancipia) or as such bought of the publick, or of some private man. The latter were those that were born either of both Parents being fuch, or of the Mother onely. At first they obtained their Liberty gratio, by well deferving some way of their Masters, or some by payment of money earned by their honest labours, they having a certain Peculium, though all was faid to belong to their Masters. But in process of time, when the Romans degenerated from their former worth and honour, some by Robberies, others by breaking of houses and other villanies, got money, whereby they purchased their Freedom. Some by helping their Masters in these things obtained Liberty as a reward; others on condition to let them enjoy the monthly allowance of Corn out of the publick purse, or other Largesses conferred by Princes upon poor Citizens. Sometimes they were manumitted through the levity and vain-glory of their Lords; some having by their Testaments set at liberty all their Slaves, to obtain a fame of clemency after their death, and that their Funerals might be celebrated by a great train of fuch as wore caps upon that occasion; in which pomp a thoufand Rogues have been feen, who much better deserved hanging. This was laid to the charge of the Mistress of the World, that challenging the Empire over all, she should defile her self with such impure Citizens: which custom might have been reformed, as Diony lius observeth, by the care of the Censors, who, inquiring into the lives of Senators and Knights, never confidered what persons were unfit to be admitted Free-men.

Talling clippeth 36. Tulling not onely clipped the power of the Patritians and Senate, but took the King's Pow- away half of the King's Prerogative alfo. Whereas the former Princes called before themselves all Controversies, and took cognisance of crimes as well committed against particular persons as the publick, he separated these Causes, making himself Judge of fuch as respected the Commonwealth, and referring the quarrels of private persons unto others, to whom he prescribed Laws and Rules to go by. After he had thus ordered the Commonwealth, he caused the Latines to build a Temple at Rome to Diana, upon the Aventine Hill, whereat they should meet and feast every year, and so preserve themselves as one body politick in unity and concord. If any controverly arose betwixt particular Towns, it was to be decided by the judgement of others, in such a manner as the Amphit yones in Greece were wont to proceed, the Council of the Ionians at the Temple of Ephesis, and that of the Dorienses in the Temple of Apollo, built by common confent at Epitropium. These things were done by Tullius at home, according to Dronysius, Livie, and others: to which we may adde from Pliny, that he first stamped money with the image of Cattel, whence it was called Pecunia, whereas the Romans before his time used it in a rude lump or Mass. As for his actions abroad; he warred with the Hetruscans 20 years, who refufed to obey him, as an obscure man, and renounced the League formerly made. In all Battels, both with the united Nation and particular Cities, he ever had the better, triumphed over them thrice, and at length forced them to fubmit to the yoak on the same terms as formerly Tarquinius had imposed it, except that from three Towns, that had been principal in the Revolt, he took part of their Grounds, which he di-Is murthered by vided to those that had newly been made free of the City. Having done these things at home and abroad, when he was grown old and not far from the natural period of his life, he perished by the devices of Tarquinius his Son-in-law, and of his own

37. Tullius had two Daughters by his Wife Tarquinia, which he married to their SECT: 20 two Confin-germans, the Grand-fons of Tarquinius, joyning them in wedlock according to their age, as he thought it most equal and convenient. But it happened that they were matched together with those of dispositions clean contrary to one another. Lucius, the elder, a man of a hold, arrogant, and tyrannical nature, had an honest, modest Wife, and one most dutifull towards her Father: on the contrary, Aruns Tarquinius, the younger, being of a mild and sweet disposition, lighted on a wicked Woman, one of a bitter spirit against her Father, ready to attempt any thing. Lucius breaking out into passion against his Father-in-law, for keeping the Kingdom from him, was still appealed by his Wife: but Aruns being content to stay his time, and averse to any thing that might savour of disrespect to Tullius, was importuned ever and disquieted by his Wife's earnest and tedious solicitations, to attempt the utmost, though with the destruction of her Father, for the obtaining of the Sovereignty. This Woman being impatient of her Husband's backwardness, and bewitched by the fury of Ambition, resolved to change Husbands, if it might be, and match her felf to the other Tarquin, who fuited well with her own humor. She brake her mind to Lucius, telling him of what a fordid spirit they were, to fuffer an Ulurper fo long to posses their Patrimony, railing against her own Husband, as a man of a poor and degenerate disposition; and at length made a profer for them two to dispatch out of the way their present unequal Yoak-fellows, and then unite themselves in that relation, thereby to bring about their noble and gallant Defign. He was not backward to a compliance, and the device was accordingly brought about. After which, they refolved by force to expell Tullius from the Kingdom, if he would not give place on his own accord, raising a Faction of the Patritians, that were discontented with the King's new modelling of the State, and the poorest Plebeians, whose assistance they purchased openly, without any respect to right or modesty. Tulius was not ignorant what they intended, and seared also to be destroyed ere he could provide for his defence; yet thinking it an unseemly thing to make War upon his Son-in-law and his own Daughter, and punish them as Enemies, he indeavoured by fair means to take them off; before their Friends, blaming, admonishing, and dehorting Tarquinius from the intended injury.

38. Effecting nothing hereby, but the other faying, that he would plead his cause in the Senate, he called together the Fathers, and gave him liberty to speak. Tarquin laid his claim to the Kingdom, as his Grand-father's Heir, and alleged, that Tullius kept it from him unjustly, having got all his preferment from their Family, and obtained the place illegally, without the consent of the Senate. Tullius replied, that the Kingdom was in the power of the People, to dispose of it to whomsoever they would; which he proved from the Example of Tarquinius Priscus, who, being a Stranger, was preferred before the Marcii. He mentioned how well he had deserved of him, by protecting and taking care of him in his Minority; and as for his coming to the Government without the ordinary affent of the Senate, that concerned the Fathers, and not him. He then appealed to the Senate, whether ever he had wronged or carried himself arrogantly towards any of them, that they should conspire with his Son-in-law against him; and in conclusion told them, that if they thought Tarquinius the fitter man, he should not be against the profit of the Commonwealth, but retire to a private life, and let the World fee, he could as readily obey as be obeyed, after he had restored the Honour to those from whom he had received it. Having struck a great reverence of him into the Senate, he assembled the People, to whom, after a great complaint against Tarquin, and a recital of what good things he had performed for the Publick, he offered to refign his place; but was confirmed therein, and after he had refused to give ear to such as would have Tarquin dispatched, with great acclamations brought home to his house by the

39. Tarquin thus prevented of what he expected from the Patritians, counterfeited repentance, and a defire to be reconciled to the King, which was eafily obtained. Covered with this Cloak he laid his deligns anew, and being continually folicited by his Wife to attempt something worthy of a Kingdom, took his opportunity on a day when most of the people were out of the City, with the Robes of Estate, and all Royal Ensigns as King, to go to the Senate-house. There he pre-fumed to call together the Fathers, and, such being assembled as were appointed beforehand, he took possession of the King's Seat. Tullius having notice hereof, unadvisedly with a few followers hasted thither, admiring the young man's impudence, whom feeing in his Chair, he fell of rating, and received as bad language; then going about to thrust him out, Tarquin took him up by the midde, and haling

SECT. 2. him to the door, threw him down the stairs into the Comitium. The old man hardly recovering his spirits was led homewards, when his Daughter, Tarquin's Wife, being come in her Chariot to see the event, saluted her Husband as King, but told him his Principality would be but uncertain, except, perfecting what he had begun, he would send some who should overtake and dispatch Tullius. He took her advice, and the feat being done, she presently returned home the same way. In her passage when she came to the place where the body lay as yet almost gasping, her Chariot-driver stood still, confounded at the fight, and not having room to pass besides it. Hereat she reviled him, and caused him to drive her over it, after the had first thrown her footstool at his head. The place, formerly called Cyprises Dionys & Fester Vicus, was afterwards named Sceleratus, from that occasion. To this end came Ser- in vece Scelerazius Tullius, after he had reigned 44 years, a man just and moderate, who abolished the envy contracted in his illegal affumption, by his after acts, and was thought, if he had not been prevented, to have intended to lay down his Office, and restore absolute Liberty with the care of the Commonwealth to the People; which some of the Patriti urs perceiving, took in the interest of Tarquinius, that they might preserve their own power. 40. Lucius Tarquinius obsained the Kingdom by violence in the fourth year of Dionyl. lib. 4. 40. Grand-father. He would not suffer his Father-in-law's body to be buried publickly, for fear it should give occasion to the people to rife against him, saying, that Romulus died without Burial. He murthered such as he suspected to favour the cause of Tullius, and fearing what end his wickedness might bring upon him, got to him a strong Guard which construally attended his person. He reigned onely by his A. M. 3471. a mong Guard which consumants accurate in periods. All Controversies he decided himself, affifted by his intimate frience, and took cognizance of all Offences, so as he might kill, banish, or fine at his pleasure. He sought to establish himself and confirm his Tyranny by great Alliance, marrying his Daughter to Ostavins Mamilius, the greatest man amongst the Latines, (being descended from Telegonus the son of Ulysses by Circe;) and by false accusation and a cunning device caused them to stone Turnus Herdonius, who had discovered to them his baseness and villanies. He began a War with the Volsei, which ended not with him, but lasted above 200 years; and subdued the Sabines, who resused to obey him. From the Volsei he took Suessa Pometia, (where getting much plunder, he first cast in his head the design of building a Temple to Jupiter, which his Grand-father had formerly vowed) and afterwards the City Gabii by treachery, making Sextus his eldest Son to counterfeit flight from him for hard usage, whereby he was made their General, and having, according to the fecret advice of his Father, (who, in imitation of Thrashbulus the Milesam, carried the messenger into the field, and cut down the tallest Poppies, difinifiing him without any other message) put to death the most principal Citi-zens, at length easily betrayed it into his hands. After this he made peace with the Equi, and renewed the League with the Tuscans. Then went he forward with the work of the Temple formerly defigned. 41. Tarquinius Priscus, in his last War with the Sabines, made a Vow, that if he got the Victory, he would build Temples to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva; and with great cost had in his life-time levelled the Rock, and formed a plot for the Building; but died before he could finish the work. Tarquinius his Grand-son, resolving to perfect what he had begun with the plunder of Suessa, set on all sorts of workmen; at which time, as they were digging to lay the foundation, a man's Head was found bleeding afresh, which belonging to one called Tolus, thence the building had the name of Capitol. He perfected a great part of the Temple, but could not confummate the work, being prevented by Exile; which was finished by the City in the third Confulship after its Freedom. It was seated upon an high Cragge, eight Acres in compass, almost two hundred foot wide on every fide, and almost of the same length and breadth, as differing onely in fifteen feet. After it had stood 425 years from its Dedication, it was confumed by fire in the days of Sylla, when L. Scipio and Cains Norbanus were Consuls, as Tacitus writeth: Yet it rose again with greater cost and ornament on the same foundation. Its front looking toward Hist. 1.3. c. 14. the South had a Porch, or Gallery, with three rows of Pillars: on each fide were also a double row. The three Temples were contained within the same Walls, the S E C T. 2. middle belonging to Jupiter, and the other two to Juno and Minerva, under the 42. In the time of this Tarquinius, another great bleffing, as it was counted, happened to the Romans. A certain strange Woman came to the King, offering to fell nine Books of the Oracles of Sibyl: which when he refused to buy at her rate, the went away, and burning three of them, returned; and demanded as much for the fix. Being dended for a mad woman, she departed, and burning half of them, returned with the other three, still asking as much as at the first. Whereat Tarquin aftonished, sent for the Augures to know her meaning; who answered, that the Nine ought to have been bought, and the Three were to be purchased at the fame Rate. The Woman after the fale and delivery vanished, and never after could be seen. Tarquin chose two men out of the Nobility to keep them, to whom he allowed two publick fervants. After his Expulsion the people elected most noble persons, who all their lives executing this Office were freed from all other burthens, both Military and Civil, to whom onely it was lawfull to look in them. No facred thing was so carefully kept as these Sibylline Oracles. They were consulted by decree of the Senate when the Commonwealth was disturbed by any Seditions, when any great Overthrow was received in War, or any Prodigies happened. They were kept by the Decemviri, or Ten men appointed to this Office, within a Vault under the Capitol, in a stone Chest, till they perished at the burning of the place. Those that the Romans used afterwards were copied out of such as belonged to other Cities, and private persons, wherein were some supposititious things, which they distinguished by the difference of the Acrosticks. 43. The Woman that brought those Books to Tarquin having the name of Si-

bylla, and there being many found to whom it hath been given besides, something is to be faid of those Women, for distinction. The first Sibylla, or Woman-Prophetes, (to which the * Counsel of Jupiter was communicated, as the word im- * Elde Guis porteth) was a Persian, according to (a) Varro, or else a Chaldean, or an He- (a) Vide Ludell, brewess, born at Noe, a City near the Red-Sea : her name was Sambetha, her fa- fin. de Civitate ther called Baroffus and her mother Erymantha. The second was a Libyan. Themis Dei, 115, 161 of Delphos was the third. The fourth was called Cumea, because she was born at cap. 23. Cimerium, a Town of Campania in Italy, near to Cuma. The fifth of Erythre, a City of Ionia in Asia, at this day called Cabo Bianco. The fixth was of the Island Samue, her name being Phyto. The seventh of Cuma, and called Cumana, her proper name being Amalthea, according to some; but Herophile and Demophila according to others. Suidas calleth her Hierophile, and faith the brought nine Books to Tarquinius Priseus, and demanded for them 300 Philippines, being Gold Coyn of Philip King of Macedonia. Pliny, contrary to the common account of Writers, mentioneth three books, not nine, and writeth that she burnt two of them. But the eighth was called Hellespontiaca, being born in the Trojan Country upon the Helle-Spont, in a Village named Marmissus near to Gergetium, which Heraclides of Pontwo affirmed to have flourished in the days of Solon and Cyrus. The ninth was a Phrygian, and prophefied at Ancyra. The tenth was of Tybur, by name Albanea, being worshipped for a Goddess at that place, near the Banks of the River Aniene, wherein her Image is said to have been found holding a Book in one hand. These ten are reckoned by Varro. There were several others also. (b) Strabo maketh (b) Lit. is two to have lived at Erythra, whereof the latter flourished in the time of Alexan- Pag. 633.

der. There was another of Colophon, a City of Ionia. Elissa, and Cassandra the Daughter of Priamus, were accounted Sibyls. There were also a Theffalian, Manto the Daughter of Tirefias the Theban, and another of Epirus. Moreover, Carmentis the Arcadian, the Mother of Evander and Fauna, or Fatua, the Sister and Wife of Faunus, King of the Aborigenes in Italy, might be reckoned in the number. 44. In the work of the Capitol Tarquin employed the people, and in other ba-

The Quarrel he pretended to be, for that they received the Roman Exiles, and endeavoured to restore them: but the true cause was his thirst after the Riches of this most flourishing place, once the Metropolis of the Rutuli. While he lay before this Town, taking great pains to gain it, and the other as eagerly relifting, (yet so as he seemed to have hope to carry it) an act of his eldest Son Sextus occafioned both the freedom of the one and other City. Dionysius writeth, that he was fent to Collatia about some business concerning the War, and going to the

SECT. 2. house of Tarquinius Collatinus his Kinsman, (Grand-son to Egerius the Nephew of Priscus) he ravished his Wife Lucretia, the Daughter of Lucretius a Noble Roman. Livy and Aurelius Victor relate, that the Courtiers drinking together in the Camp before Ardea, and with them Tarquinius Collatinus the Son of Egerius, they fell feverally on praising each one his own Wife; infomuch as proceeding to an earnest dispute, Collatinus said there needed not many words, for that they might see within a few hours how far his Lucretia excelled them all; and he defired them to ride to the feveral places, and judge according as they should find. Being well heated with wine they agreed to this motion, and away they rode. They found not Lucretia junketing, and idlely spending her time as the King's Daughters-inlaw, but late at night hard at work amongst her Maids; so that by consent of all the far excelled the reft, and Collatinus nobly entertaining his Guests returned with them to the fiege. 45. Now was Sextus Tarquinius inflamed with a lustfull desire after Lucretia, because of her Beauty, and, as it happeneth towards difficult or forbidden things, the more because of her eminent Chastity. Within few days, without the knowledge of her Husband, accompanied onely with one fervant, he returned to Collatia, where being kindly entertained by her, he was brought to his Bed-chamber: but when he thought all afleep, having observed where she lay, with a naked Dagger he went to her, and laying his hand on her breast, threatned her with death if she offered to stir. He mixed threats with fair words, but yet could not prevail, till he told her he would first kill her, and then his Slave, whom laying by her fide, he would report it was for having surprized her in Adultery with him; whereby obtaining his prey, in the morning he departed. When he was gone, the fent for her Father from Rome, and her Husband from the Camp, (or fay fome, went her felf to the City) defiring they would call together some friends, for that a matter of great importance had befallen her. With Lucretius came Publius Valerius, and with Collatinus, Junius Brutus; who finding her in her Chamber in a fad and afflicted condition, the told them the whole matter, refused to admit any comfort, and intreating them to revenge her cause upon the Author of her forrow. stabbed her self to the heart before them, with a knife she had kept close about her for that purpose.

Junius Brutus.

46. Lucius Junius, furnamed Brutus, was the Son of Marcus Junius, who being descended from one of the Companions of Eneas, and, for his Vertue, very eminent amongst the Romans, married Tarquinia the Daughter of Tarquinius Priscus, of which he begat this Lucius. This Lucius was nobly educated, instructed in all disciplines of the City, and of a pregnant wit. But after that Tarquin had privily murthered his Father, (not for any offence, but to possess his great estate, as he did several others) and with him his eldest Brother, who seemed to bear such a mind as would revenge the injury, he being young, and destitute of any af-fistance from his kindred, counterseited himself a fool, which he acted all along, and thence had the furname of Brutus; this being the fole remedy against the cruelty of the Tyrant, who thinking his folly not feigned but real, despited the man, and having spoiled him of his Patrimony, kept him as an Ideot in his house, and suffered him to converse with his Children, not out of respect as a Kinsman, but to make them fport by his ridiculous words and actions, as true Ideots are wont to doe. On a time a great Pestilence having seized on the City, he sent him to Delphos with his two Sons Sextus and Titus, to confult the Oracle. They were glad they had him to make them merry, and laughed at him for offering to Apollo a wooden staff, wherein yet he had secretly put some Gold, having made it hollow for that purpose. Having privately enquired which of them should be Prince of Rome, it was answered, he who first of all should kiss his Mother; which the young men misunderstanding, agreed betwixt themselves, that at their rettrn they would doe it, and so reign, joyntly together. But Brutus, as soon as they arrived in Italy, knowing the meaning of the Oracle, fell and kissed the Earth which is Mother of all. When, under the Vizard of a Fool, he waited for an opportunity to revenge himself and Family upon Tarquin, this disaster of Lucretia at length presented it self.

47. Being sent for beforehand, or coming in with Collatinus his Kinsman after the death of Lucretia, as Dionysus writeth, while her Husband and Friends were lamenting over the dead body, he told them it was not time now to weep, but to fludy how to revenge the injury. He acquainted them with the cause of his affuming the name and behaviour of an Ideot, and manifelting himfelf to be a most cunning man, defired they might unanimoully joyn for the Expulsion of Tarqui-

nius and his Friends from the City, speaking many things efficacious to perswade S E C T. 2. them to it. Finding every one very ready, he faid there was no need of words and promises, but real deeds, if they meant to perform any thing, and that he first would begin. Then went he to the dead body, and taking the bloudy knife in his hand, fware by Mars and the rest of their Gods, to cast out Tarquinius Superbus with his wicked Wife and Progeny, to profecute them or their Friends with fire and sword, or any other way, and never after that to suffer the Tarquins, or any other to reign in Rome. He made them all successively take the same Oath; then for the way how to bring the matter about, said, the Gates of the City should be fafely kept, that the King might not hear the least word, till he who was Prince of the Sacrificers, should, as he might by his place, affemble the people, to which the dead Body being exhibited, and Lucretius with Collatinus deploring their condition, they might procure the Banishment of Tarquin by a publick Decree, that should be presently dispatched to the Army for its concurrence. 48. But before Tarquinius should be removed, they thought it Wiledom to consider what Magistracy was fit to succeed his; lest they should pull down the prefent dwelling before another house was prepared. Some were for Monarchy, as indeed the best of Governments; others for Aristocracy, or the Rule of the Senate; and others would have the whole Power put into the hands of the People: each party bringing examples of good Government in the several kinds. Brutus said the time was short, and these matters required mature deliberation, which neither at length could produce such a form as would be void of all inconveniencies. He faid, he hoped that after the expulsion of the Tyrants, they should have leifure to confider how they might best reform the Commonwealth, if any better way could be found out than what Romulus, Pompilius, and the other Kings had chalked out to them, wherein proceeding, till Tarquin for fook the path, the City had been happy and famous, both for its Acts abroad, and Constitutions at home. This he could not procured the Kingly power to degenerate into Tyranny; and therefore were at Dimplian.

deny: yet however, he thought those incommodities, as he called them, had present to be abolished, and to be taken heed of for the time to come. As first, because some men made a great matter of very Names, he thought that of a Kingdom was to be left off, and the other of Commonwealth to be affumed; and that for the Title of King and Monarch, some more modest and popular was to be invented. Then the Regal power he judged not fafely to be intrusted with a fingle person; but that two were to be chosen, who should Govern with equal command and authority, and so be a counter-poize each to other. Of all royal Enfigns or Ornaments, such as procured the envy and grudge of the People were to be laid aside, viz. Scepters, golden Crowns, and purple Robes of Cloth of gold, except upon Festival days, and in triumphal Pomps; which rare use of them would not be at all spoken against: but as for the Ivory Chair in which they sate in Judgment, with the white Robe edged with Purple, called Pretexta, and the twelve Listors or Sergeants, bearing Rods and Axes, they were to be continued. He added, that the main thing to keep these Magistrates in order, was, to prevent their perpetual Power, which would keep them from giving account of their Actions: wherefore he thought fit their Magistracy, after the manner of Athens, should be but Annual, that so each one might learn as well to be subject as to govern, and this would preserve the mind from being drunk with too much liberty. Lastly, that the name of King might not utterly perish, (whence may be concluded, that his judgement was not against the Office, though his passion was) he would have the title given to one who should be called Rex Sacrorum, and having this honour for his life, with immunity from warfare, should meddle with nothing else but these superstitious Rites, of which the Kings had charge before.

49. Having first got a Decree of the Senate for the King's Banishment, according to the custom of publick proceeding, the Comitia were assembled by Brutue, and the Body of Lucretia brought in her gore into the meeting place, where it was fet for a spectacle to all. Brutus then discovered himself, told them why he had seemed what he now appeared never to have been; and then declared the occasion of their meeting to be, that the Patritians might have their aftent for banishing Tarquin, who, having obtained the Principality illegally, had abused it more than any Tyrant that was ever heard of. He illustrated his affertion by a relation of his Crimes: as of his poyloning his own Brother before he was King, together with his lawfull Wife, and marrying the other Sifter that was partaker with him in his wickedness; his killing Servius Tullius, and strangling his Wife whom he ought to have respected as Parents; then his invading the Government, without Decree

SECT. 2. of Senate or Suffrages of the People, by force of Arms. He reckoned up the injuries received by the Patritians, most of whom he had made away, and reduced the rest to the estate of beggars; how from the Plebeians he had taken Laws, Religious Meetings, the Comitia and Suffrages, and used them no better than Slaves bought with money. He then demanded how long they should endure this bondage; whether no longer than till the death of Tarquin: whenas he had three Sons more wicked and mischievous than himself, especially the elder, which he proved by the spectacle before their eyes; telling them then the whole story. This advantage he improved to the utmost, shewing how the King being now absent, and the Patritians refolved, nothing could be wanting to them, if they had but courage for the enterprize; not Men, Money, Arms, Captains, nor foreign aid: urging, that it was a shame they should think of commanding the Volsai, Sabines, or others, and be Slaves to others at home; or maintain so many Wars for to serve the Ambition of Tarquin, and undertake none for their own Liberty. As for the Army now at the Siege, there was no fear, but that for their own freedom and accommodation, they would readily close with them; and if any should be found to intend the contrary, they had their Wives and Children as Hostages in the City, whereby they might eafily draw them off.

50. The Multitude being varioully affected with hope of Liberty, and fear to miss of it, during his Speech, yet made acclamations to the particulars, and at the end, with one voice defired he would give them Arms. He faid he would, if first they would confirm what was offered from the Fathers, as the beginning of their Liberty; and therewithall recited the form of this severe Decree, that the Tarqui-

nii Should be banished with all their Off-spring, and be capital for any one to Speak or att for their return. The several Curia being called, confirmed it by all their Suffrages; which being done, he acquainted them how it was agreed, that unto two men the Government should be committed, whom they should elect in their Centuriata Comitia, which was also passed. Then according to the custom, by vertue of his Office formerly mentioned, he named Sp. Lucretius to be Inter-rex for holding of the Comitia or Assembly; who adjourned the meeting to the Campus Martius, where it was the cultom for the Romans in their Armour to elect Magistrates. There he named Brutus and Collatinus (as was formerly agreed on betwixt the Conspirators) for to have the Regal power, and the Centuries consirmed them by their Suffrages. In the mean time, whilft these things were done in the City, Tarquinius, having heard by such as escaped out ere the gates were shut, that Brutus called the people to their Liberty, making none acquainted but his Sons and some trusty Friends, with them rode away in all hast, to prevent the general defection; but finding the Gates fast shut, and the Walls full of Armed men, in great grief he returned to the Camp. There now he could not be received; for Brutus forefeeing his fudden coming, fent Letters to the Army, (or went himfelf by another way than that he knew he would come) wherein he acquainted them with the Decree of the People, and defired that they would revolt from the King. The Letters were read to the Souldiers by T. Herminius and M. Horatius, whom Tarquin had left to govern the Army; and they being called to give their Suffrages also by Centuries, all thought that what their Friends at home had done was to be approved, and would not admit the King at his return. Frustrated of this hope, he went to Cære in Hetruria, saith Livie, to Gabii saith Dionysus, where he had made his Son Sextus King, now gray-headed, having reigned 25 years. Herminius A.M. 3456. This was somewhat above twenty years after the beginning of Cyrus, and the destruction of the Babylonian Empire.

But whether he lived past the third year of Crrus or no is uncertain.

3. Concerning the end of Cyrus many and feveral things are written. According to Herodotus, Trogus and others he invaded the Massagetes, and perish-The end of ed in their Countrey. The Queen of this Scythian people named Tomyris he Gyrus variously first made a pretence to sue to for marriage, but she being aware of this defign to entrap her forbad him entrance; whereupon betaking himfelf from wiles to force he laid a Bridge over the River Araxes, and provided for the passing of his Army over. Whil'st he thus employed himself, she was so hardy as to fend him a meffage, offering him either to invade her Countrey, or elfe to permit her a passage into his. Amazed at it, he referred the matter to his Council what should be done therein, where some advised him to suffer her to pass the River, but Crafus stifly opposed it, shewing the danger in case he were overthrown but in one battle, and advised him after he had set over his men, and discovered the Enemy, to leave the weakest fort amongst his Army there in the Camp plentifully provided of strong Wines, with which liquor being utterly unacquainted, they would make themselves drunk, and so might be easily destroyed. This advice succeeded accordingly, and amongst the rest Spargapifes the Queen's Son was taken prisoner, who as soon as he came to himself desired to be loosed, and put an end to his life with his own hands, out of a deep fence of his condition. His Mother knowing nothing of his death, with threatning language required Grus to dismiss him, and when she faw he returned not, gathered together all her forces, wherewith counterfeiting flight she trained the King into streights, and by an ambush laid in the Mountains. cut him off with his whole Army to the number of 200000 men. His bread fhe cast into a Bason of Blood, upbraiding him with cruelty in these words: Satisfie thy felf with blood after which thou hast thirsted. To this story Diodo- Lib. 2, rus addeth that the nailed his Body to a Cross.

4. But Ctesias wrote that the last War he made was against the Derbines, a people also of Scythia, whom though he overcame, yet he received a wound in fight, of which he dyed three days after. Xenophon faith he died aged, and in peace, and how finding himself almost spent, he called to him his friends, with his two fons Cambyfes and Smerdis, or Tanaoxares, whom (after a long Oration, wherein he discoursed much concerning the immortality of the Soul, and the punishment and reward which is due to things committed in this life he exhorted by the strongest arguments to perpetual concord and love. If so, he acted like one that had received the knowledge of the true God, which he had opportunity also to know from Daniel and others, being by them instructed in the Scriptures. Some think that the variety of these reports proceeded from the study of the Persians to conceal the shame of his being overthrown by the policy of a woman. Others observe, that had he lost his whole Army in Scythia, it is scarce probable that his Son would have transported all his remaining Forces into Egypt so soon, and hereby leave that side of his Kingdom destitute and naked, when the Scythian Nation bordering upon Media was so victorious: not to add that Cambyfes would not have been able to undertake, and perform such a Conquest in so little a space. Considerable certainly is that which the Writers of Alexander's Acts have committed to memory, as Curtius, Plutarch, Arrianus, and even Aristobulus (who by command of the King was an eye witness of it) as he is cited by Strabo: That he was buried in his own City Pasa Lib. 15. 2.730. gardis in Persia, where his Epitaph was plain to be read, in which after telling the Traveller who he was, he defired him not to grudge him that Earth wherewith his Body was covered. The Coffin wherein he lay Alexander caused to be covered with his own Roab, and a Crown of Gold to be fet thereon. These things something weaken the credit of that opinion which Herodorus relateth as the most probable of those that were held in his time. Some reckon ten years, or thereabouts, and others but three, of which number was once Foseph Scaliger, who afterwards retracted it as an error; but Ludovicus Cappellus hath renewed the affertion, making it probable by arguments drawn from Scripture, who therefore is to be confulted in his facred * Chronology. 6. Cambyfes presently after he came to the Government, made all possible proch War upon vision for a war with Egypt, the cause wereof is to be enquired after. Herodotus telleth a story how he sent to Amasis King of that Countrey to desire his Lib. 3, cap. 1. daughter Nitetis in marriage, which he not daring to deny because of the then formidable Power of the Persians, and not willing to gratise him absolutely, for that he conceived his daughter would be entertained but as a Concubine, he found out a way as he thought to fatisfie Cambyses, and yet keep his olymp. 6.2. daughter. There was one of Apries his predecessor's daughters yet unmarried, and V.C.225. her he fent to him under the name of his own, who when the had fufficiently in- cambific 1. gratiated her felf with Cambyles, told him how indeed she was nothing a kin to Amasis, but begotten by his Lord and Master; whereat the Persian conceived fuch indignation, that, to be revenged on him, he invaded Egypt. But that which moved Cambifes to fend for this woman, feemeth something strange, He had formerly defired from Amasis a Physician for the Eyes, the best that could be procured in Agypt, wherewith he gratifying him, the man took it for ill of Amalis to be lent out of his native Country, that in way of revenge, he moved the matter to Cambyles, concluding with himself, that the King of Report would not fend his own daughter: This was the faying of the Persians; which Herodotus rather approveth than what the Egyptians alledged, that Cambyfes was fon to Niteris the daughter of Apries, and that the Persians ascribed that to the Son which belonged to the Father, because they would have Cambyles born Vide Polyanum of Cassandane the daughter of Pharnaspes, of the noble race of Achamenes; and yet he confesseth there was a report, that besides Cassandane, Cyrus kept Nitetis as his Concubine, whom he most affected, and that to revenge his Mother upon her, Cambyses when but young threatned, and after his Father's death made War upon Agypt. Howeven things might go in reference to the daughter of Apries, Cambyles feemeth to have invaded that Kingdom, upon pretence of the right he had to it as Heir by conquest to Nebuchadnesar, who subdued it, though it revolted from his Successors; which might be concealed from Herodotus by the Priests, who spared not to invent lyes for a cover to the disgrace of their Country.

7. While Cambyles was yet busie in his preparations, one Phanes an Halycar vide Horod 1.31 nassan by birth, taking something in distaste from Amasis, whom he served, as 40 to fled out of Egypt by Thip, and coming into Persia, advised this King, that for his better passage of the sandy Desarts, he should fend to the King of the Arabians for fafe conduct, who being no good friend to the Agyptian, came and met him with Camels bearing abundance of water, which was necessary for the fultenance of the Army in that hot and dry place. Ere Cambyfer could arrive in Agyps, Anafii had prevented captivity by a natural death, and Planmenius his Son having succeeded him, nexpected his cothing at Pelusium one unough the Sandie Defarts, of the mouths of Nile. Here a Battle being fought, the Agyptians were over-

Psammenitus had his Son put to death before his eyes, to try his patience, though the Conqueror too late repented of it, and had given him his life with the Kingdom to govern, as a Province, had he not attempted new matters, for which he was forced to drink Bulls blood, and fo died, having reigned fix months after his

8. This work done in Ægypt, Cambyfes betook himself to extravagant His extrava- practices. The dead body of Amasis he caused to be brought forth, to be beatgant practices, en, pinched, and then burnt, contrary to the practice as well of the Persians as Egyptians, who abhorred such a thing, because the former accounted Fire a God, and the latter a ravenous beaft, perishing with the thing devoured by it. Then resolved he to make a three-fold War: One upon the Carthaginians, another upon the Ammonians, or the Inhabitants of the place fituate about the Temple of Fupiter Hammon, and the third against the long-lived Athiopians, who inhabited Africk, near to the Southern Sea. He refolved to fend a Fleet against the Carthaginians, an Army of Foot against the Ammonians, and as for the Athiopians, he would first send to discover their Country. While his Messengers were dispatching towards Æthiopia, he gave order to the Phanicians (who having vielded themselves, were his only strength at Sea) to fight against Carthage, which they flatly refused, because that City was a Colony of their own, and thereby this defign was dashed. After the return of his messengers, who brought him word how he was flighted by the Athiopian King, in great rage and hafte he fet forwards against him, without all thought of victualling his Army, commanding all his foot to follow, except the Gracians. When he was come to Thebes, he fent about 50000 men against the Ammonians, with command after they had spoiled them to burn the Temple; and so he marched on with the rest of the Army. But ere he had passed the fifth part of his journy, all provisions failed, and all the beafts that carried burthens were eaten up yet did he not now recollect himself, but proceeded till they were constrained to eat up every tenth man, and then returned he with great loss and difgrace to Memphis, where he dismissed the Greeks from his service. The forces sent against the Ammonians, never reached thither, neither ever returned, being all overwhelmed, as was reported, in the Sandy Wilderness. 9. Cambyfes at his return to Memphis, found the Citizens in great mirth and jollity, for that Apis their god had appeared to them lately; which he interpreting as an expression of Joy for his bad success, wounded the beast in the thigh (thinking to strike him into the belly) of which he died. He derided much the Ægyptians for fuch deities; those that were found rejoycing, he commanded to be flain, and the Priefts to be beaten with rods. For fuch impiery they accounted him stricken with that madness, which afterward appeared. For not long after, he fent his brother Smerdis back into Persia, having conceived great indignation against him, because he alone of all the Persians, could draw a Bow that was brought him by his messengers out of Athiopia. After this he dreamed, that one came and told him how Smerdis sate on the Throne, and with his head reached to Heaven, whereupon, he fent Prexalpes his greatest confident to make him away, who murdered him in a pretended hunting, or as some said, drowned him in the Red Sea. To this he added the murther of his own Sifter, whom, without any example, he had married, because she upbraided him with their brother's death. Memorable is the answer of his Judges, who, when he demanded, whether there was not a Law among the Perlidouble. 10. To this rage and madness against his relations, he added fury towards those that were nearest about him. Asking Prexaspes the Minister of his paricide, what his people thought of him, and receiving this answer, that they thought him too much given to Wine, that it might be feen how fober he was to do mischief, he said it should be a demonstration, if he could shoot with an arrow the Son of Prevalues right into the heart, which accordingly he did. The day after he buried quick twelve other Perfuns for no fault at all, and commanded

His fervants notwithstanding preserved Crafus alive, expecting a reward if he should afterwards repent of his deaths. And he really rejoyced in his preservation, when he returned to himself; but put them to death for their disobedience. Many more such like things he did whilst he remained at Memphis, and raged against the Images and Temples of the Egyptians.

The Magi

CHAP. I.

11. But whilst he thus spent his time, two of the Magi, Medians by birth. conspired against him. One of them he had left Overseer of his houshold affairs, named Patizithes, who having certain knowledge of the death of Smerdis, though it was kept very fecret, took occasion thereat to rebel, because most of the Persians thought this Prince yet living. For, having with him in the Kings house a brother as like him in the lineaments and proportion of body as in name, him he placed in the Throne, and fent up and down through the Empire, to perswade every one rather to obey Smerdis the son of Cyrus than Cambyles. One of these messengers coming down to the Army towards Egypt, found it at Ecbatane in Syria, where standing in the midst, he proclaimed what was enjoyned. Cambyles being much startled, blamed Prexaspes for having neglected to execute his commands; but he protesting his obedience therein, and that he had buried his Brother with his own hands, the messenger was persued and fetcht back, out of whom Prexaspes getting out that he had not himself seen Smerdis, but Papizithes had given him instructions as from him, easily conjectured what was at the bottom, and therewith acquainted the King. Then too late did Cambyles bewail his Brother, and refolving with all speed to march for Susa, as he mounted on horseback his Sword fell out of the Scabberd, and wounded him in the Thigh. Demanding the name of the place, he gave himself for lost, for that it had been told him he should die in Echatane, which he had ever interpreted of the place in Media so called, where he hoped it would be in his old age. Twenty days after, he revealed the whole matter concerning his brother to the Nobility about him, conjuring them not to fuffer the Empire to return to the Medes, but rather recover it the same way it had been betrayed. Not long after his thigh-bone being putrified, he died, when he had reigned seven years and five months. He left no iffue, and so the direct line of Cyrus in him received it's period.

From the death of Cambyses to that of Xerxes.

Merdis the Magician (called alfo Mardus, Sphendadates, and Oropaftes) Let Hirod. 1.3: reigned those seven months which were wanting to complear the eight cap. 67, 67. year of Cambyfes, whom the Persians believed not as to his brothers death, but thought that indeed he was alive and reigned, because Prexaspes feared to confess that he killed him. In this time he, or rather his brother. wonderfully pleafed all men, except the Persians, remitting to other Nations their A. M. 3483 Tributes, and excusing them from War for three years. But in the eight month v. c. 232. he was discovered by the means of Otanes, a man of highest rank in Persia, who suspected him for a counterfeir, because he never would appear in publick, nor admit any of the Nobility into his presence. He having a Daughter then at Court, which had been Concubine to Cambyles, and now was in the fame quality to him that reigned, as all the reft of his wives; to her he fent to know, The imposture whether it was indeed the Son of Cyrus with whom the lay. She having had no acquaintance with that Prince, could give him no answer, and neither could she come near Atoffa, who being Sifter to Smerdis might eafily know him, for that

Sect. 2. the Magician to prevent intelligence, kept them severed one from another: This increasing the suspition, Otanes sent to her again, charging her as he lay afleep to know whether he had any ears; for Cyrus had upon some account cur off the ears of Smerdis the Magician. She obeyed her Father when it came to her course, notwithstanding the danger, and the day following confirmed him fully in what he had suspected.

2. Otanes presently discovered the matter to Apathines and Gobryas, two men of prime rank also among the Persians, who easily giving him credit, as having A conspiracy suspension of them one, against them change themselves, agreed to take three more, each of them one, against them into Council about it. Otames brought Intaphernes, Gobryas chose Megabysis, Aspathines took Hydarnes, and Darius being then arrived at Susa from Persia, which his Father Hystaspes governed, they also thought fit to add him to their number. Darius when admitted, fignified, that he had been affured of the cheat, how he was come to Town upon no other account than to kill the impostor, and urged them to joyn with him and attempt it speedily. Otanes was much against fuch hafty proceedings, defiring further to confult about it, but Darius alleging the danger of delay, for which cause, if they would not attempt something that very day, he would go and discover rather than be discovered, at length they agreed.

3. But while they were thus debating the matter, the Magi knowing that Prexalpes had made away Smerdis the Son of Cyrus, and confidering how nearly in concerned them to make him their own, had fent for him, and by vast promifes endeavoured to purchase his secrecy in that private affair. He seemed to complie, and defired that the Persians might be called together under the wall, that he might perswade them, that he who now reigned was the true Smerdis. But after he had mounted the Turrer, he began to reckon up the Pedigree of Cyrus from Achamenes, related his kindness and good turns done to the Persians, and then telling the whole matter concerning Smerdis whom he had murdered, after he had laid many curses upon them, except they recovered the Empire, and revenged themselves upon the Magi, he threw himself down headlong and died. The seven Conspirators utterly ignorant of this, arrived at the Court, at such time as the Magi were consulting concerning what had happened, where the Porters eafily admitted them, because of their dignity, nothing being suspected of them. But coming into the house, they were stopped by such Eunuches as there waited, whereupon they forced their passage with their Swords, and were encountred by both the Magi, who having taken the Allarm, and perceived the matter, betook themselves to their weapons. One of them wounded Aspathines in the Thigh, and put out the eye of Intaphernes: the other retired into another room, whither he was purfued by Darius and Gobryas. Gobryas grapling with him, Darius stood idle for fear of wounding his friend; but Gobryus bidding him strike though it were thorow his sides, he did it at adventure, and flew the Magician. Both of them being flain, they cut off their heads, and carrying them out, acquainted the Persians with what they had done. Then fell they upon such Magicians as they could meet, which the Persians taking as an example, did the like, so that if night had not intervened, all that fort of men had perished, and this day was observed annually as a great Festival, in which none Palo, Max. of the Magicians stirred abroad. This was the end of the usurpation, wherein lib. 9. cap. 2. feven Magi are faid by some to have been partakers, but if so, those two bro-damias. 1, 23. thers are to be accounted the chief, one of them counterfeiting the right

Otanes spake for the takeing away of Monarchy, which he urged, from the example of Cambyfes and the Magician, was apt to degenerate into Tyranny, and would have had the Government renitted to the people in a Democratical way; Megabyzus was for Oligarchie; but Darius of all the three forts preferred Monarchy, as that into which at length the other would pass, through seditions and the ambition of such particular men as should be able to advance themselves above their Neighbours. The other four subscribed to his opinion as best, which therefore being agreed on by the major part, several capitulations were made in order to the election. Otanes defired that both himfelf and Capitulations. family might be exempted from the regal jurisdiction, which was granted, and all possible honour further decreed to him for his pains taken in the discovery. It was agreed amongst the other fix, that it should be lawful for them at any time to come into the Palace, except the King were with his wife, and the King was prohibited to take a wife any where but out of their Families. As for the election, it was resolved, that all the next morning by Sun-rise riding into the Suburbs, he whose Horse first neighed, should obtain the Empire of Cambries.

This translation of the Kingdom is faid to have been first revealed to Cyrus, at such time as having pasfed the river Araxes, he was marching against the Massageres. For he dreamed Hood L. 11 that he saw the eldest Son of Hystaspes (which was this; for he had three young-

7. In the second year of Darius the building of the Temple which had been of the Temple interrupted, began again and proceeded. The Samaritans bribed the Courtiers in the time of Cyrus, to hinder the work, and Cambyfes having been formerly no friend to it, when he came to reign flopped it by express command, through the calumniation of such as bore the Jews no good will. The Magician also forbad it upon the same account, it being clear from Scripture, that two several Princes named Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes withstood it; and that betwixt the reigns of Cyrus and Darius. But when the adversaries now betook themselves to Darius, expecting from him a countermand to the Jews (who being reproved for their remissness by the Prophet Haggai, were fallen again to build upon the foundation formerly laid) he instead of any such inhibition, sent them an express commandnot only not to hinder, but at his own coft to further the Structure, allowing alfo to the Priefts expenses for the daily Sacrifices. The Jews therefore incouraged by this new Edict, and confirmed by the Prophecies of Haggai and Zachariahi proceeded prosperously in the building.

8. In the same year had the Prophet Zachariaha Vision, in which the Angel interceding for Ferulalem, and the Cities of Fudah, mentioneth the Lord's having had indignation threescore and ten years. The rise or beginning of these years Ludovicus Cappellus fetcheth from the destruction of the Temple. For from the first Edict of Cyrus, and the end of the Captivity, to this time, passed about eleven years (Cyrus according to his account, reigning but three after the taking of Baby-

Hence is observable, that as the State and Policy of the femili Commonwealth was broken, and much impaired eleven years before the destruction of the Temple, so was it renewed at the end of the Captivity so many years before the re-edifying of it, which hitherto had been attempted without fuccess, but now renewed, was happily finished in the fixth year of Darius, as to the house it self, though three years more seem to have been taken up in the building the porches and other appendices to it. And as the greatest part of the holy Vessels were carried away in the Captivity of Fechoniah, eleven years before the destruction of the Temple, so were they sent back again so many years before the restauration of it. Lastly, this also is observed, that as from the destruction of this typical Temple to the rebuilding of it. passed Seventy years, so from the Conception of Christ the true and spiritual Temple, to the final desolation of the shadow or typical one at Ferusalem, so many years passed, precisely Seventy.

The Empire divided into

o. Darius after his setlement in the Kingdom, divided it into twenty Provinces which the Persians called Satrapies) over each of which he constituted a Prefident, withal appointing what tribute each Nation should pay. For, hitherto, under the two former Kings, nothing was appointed concerning tribute, the feveral people contributing money by way of benevolence, whereupon, because of this new imposition, they stilled Darius an Huckster, Cambyles a Lord, and Cyrus a Father. Cyrus was mild, and used them as children, striving to deserve well of them; Cambyses was sharp and morose, and Darius by all ways possible pur-Interpret put veied for mony. Having an intention to go to the King, they that kept the gate flopped him, faying that he was with his wife, which he thinking to be alve, drew his Herodellis. 3. He caused many ashes to be laid betwixt fome walls, over which laying a rafter, thereupon he feafted them very nobly; but being fast asleep the floor fell, and they therewith into the ashes, where they perished. If he destroyed them in this strange manner, probable it is, that he defired to be rid of them, because of some power to which they might pretend by virtue of a previous agreement, not enduring any incombrance or reftraint upon his prerogative; for that Soveraignty is impatient of any competition in the Throne.

Babylon rebell-

10. About the tenth year of his reign the City of Babylon rebelled against him, having of late recovered that greatness of mind which sometimes possessed at print it's Inhabitants. Cyrus demolished not their walls, but left them intire with the capitson gates standing, which putting them in a posture of defence, they took courage at the forein Wars of Cambyfes, and the stirs that happened about the Magi. He gathered his forces together, with all fpeed, and laid fiege to it; but they being resolved to stand out to the utmost, chose every one a woman to make ready their meat, and to fave provisions, killed all the rest of that Sex except their Mothers. Then, as if they had made themselves impregnable, they derided the Persians, saying, they should be overcome when a Mule foaled: And above ninteen moneths they held out, notwithstanding all their attempts and devices. At length in the 20th, Zopyrus Son to Megabyzus, one of the chief Commanders in Darius his Army, being incouraged by his Mule that fooled, mangled his face, cutting off his ears and nose, and in gore Blood counterfeited a flight to the besieged, as thus abused by the king. The Babylonians believed, and according to his expectation chose him for their General, after which, he made several sallies, and the besiegers according to the former agreement fled, but within a while he betrayed the City to Darius. He demolished the walls, and nailing 3000 of the principal actors unto croffes, pardoned the rest, for whom 5000 women were sought out, by whom they might repair their decayed flock. Zopyrus was rewarded, as with other things in greatest account amongst the Persians, so with the City of Babylon for his life. The fon of this Zopyrus was Megabyzus, who afterwards conducted Sect. 2. the Persian Army against the Athenians and their companions; and son to this Megabyaus was that Zopyrus, who revolted from the Persians to the Athe-

Darius caused a bridge to be laid over the Bosphorus into Europe half a mile long, and thereon passing his forces crossed the Sea himself by ship, and gave charge to the Ionians his Subjects (who together with the Eolians, and others that lived upon the Hellespont, A. M. 3497. made up the Navie) to fail up the Sea as far as the River Ister (which parted 0), 62, 62, 646, Scrthia from Thrace) over which he also enjoyned them to make a bridge. In David 14 his march through Thrace all submitted to him except the Geres, who out of Ignorance withstood him. The Ionians prepared the bridge against his coming, whom, after he had transported his forces, he commanded there to expect him Sixty days, at the end of which if he came not, he permitted them to return into their own Country.

12. The Scythians had no constant dwelling or habitation, removing with their wagons, wherein they lay, and cattel, from place to place, according as they were furnished with grass, living upon milk and raw flesh, without Towns or corn, and taking their conduct from the Pole-Star, as the Chrim Tartars their posterity at this day also live, the great Chrim himself having no other City than an Agora, or one of Carts. Having intelligence of his coming, they fent their wives, children, and cattle towards the North; then stopped all the Wells, destroyed all Fruits of the Earth, and sometimes appearing to the Persians, again retired on purpose to deride them. Darius seeing himself thus mocked, and despairing to come at them by reason of their perfect knowledg of the Country, and his ignorance therein, fearing also his provisions might fail, and especially left the Ionians should for sake him at the Bridge, now that the Sixty days were expired, bethought how he might make a fafe retreat. The Scythians getting knowledg hereof, laboured to remove the Ionians from the Bridge, telling them how good it would be for them to returne home in fafety; for that now the time prefixed by the King was expired. They fell into confultation hereupon, and Militades Tyrant or petty Prince of the Cherfonefus belought them, that, having this opportunity, they would not let it slip, but free themselves from the Persian Yoak. But Histiaus Tyrant of Miletus a City of Ionia, and others, who had enslaved their own Citizens at home, fearing, left if the power of the Persians, by which they were maintained, were broken, they should be reduced into a private condition or worfe; by their own Country-men, refolved, that nothing more concerned them, than that the greatness of that Empire might be established. Yet it was judged convenient to break the Bridg fo far, as to be out of bow-shot from the Scythian fide, therein to comply with that People, who perhaps else might force them to do it. Beginning therefore to break it, the Scythians believed their promise of performing the whole, and returned to hunt out the Perfians. Expecting them to retreat that way which was best for Provisions, they missed of them; for Darius returned the fame he went, and with great difficulty recovered the banks of Ilter. Here he arrived by night, and was much discouraged when he found the bridge broken; but upon the first shout Histiaus came with all his Veffels and made it up for the transportation of the Army.

13. Darius passing over his Army marched through Thrace unto Sestus, and thence failed over into Asia, leaving Megabisus in Europe with an Army of 80000 men. Megabyzus, according to order, subdued the Perinthians and Paonians, whom he translated into Air; and having reduced to obedience all the Maritime Head have to Coast, sent into Mucedonia to demand Earth and Water of Amyntas the King. ev. But Gobryas conftrued the meaning to be this: Oye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, dive under the water, or creep into the holes of the Earth, for elfe our Arrows will overtake you; which expofition was accordingly verified. Amyntas doubting of his own ftrength, kindly entertained the Messengers, and granting what they came for, magnificently feasted them, in so much that being well heated with Wine they desired that women, according to the custom of Persa, might be brought in to them. He replied, that it was not the sashion of Macedonia; but yet he would gratifie them therein, which being done, they began to be uncivil towards the Women, whereat he inwardly fretted, but for fear suppressed his indignation, But his eldest Son Alexander being present, a young man of prompt boldness and little experience, defired him to quit the room, and let him alone to entertain the Guests; and though he suspected him for his courage, and disswaded him from any rash attempt, yet did he withdrew accordingly. Alexander then told the Perlians they might have liberty to enjoy those women, but for that it now grew late, he defired they would let them go out to wash, and make themselves ready, which done, they should come again. They affenting, he dressed so many bare-faced young men in women's Clothes, who, being brought in, when the Persians began to dally with them, according to his command stabbed them with Daggers hid under their Clothes for that purpose. Megabyzus hearing nothing of his Messengers, sent one Bubares a Persian down with an Army to make diligent search after them, but him Alexander easily took off by giving him his Sifter Gygaa in marriage, with whom he had fallen in love; fo that he fuffering the matter to rest in silence, no farther inquiry was made after it.

14. The year following, being the 16th of his reign, Darius fent as succesfor to Megabyzus, Otanes the Son of Sisamnes, who took in the Cities Chalcedon. Byzantium, and Antander, with the Islands Lemnos, and Imbrus. He himself was now returned to Sufa, whither he carried along with him Histiaus, who stood fo much his Friend at the Bridge of Ister. Histiaus having begun to build a City of his own in Thrace, Darius out of colour of doing him honour, and using his advice in his most important affairs, drew him away from it, knowing his great abilities, and fearing his reftless Spirit. There he continued for some years, till not being able to hear so much talk of Empire, and Rule, wherein he himself had no share, he much preferred his antient Dominion though but over one City, before this Real, though plaufible imprisonment, and therefore fought how he might kindle a Fire in Ionia, that for his interest in that Country he might obtain to be fent thither to quench it, and fo with his liberty get some notable advantage for a great atchievement. It happed that his endeavours did but tend to the blowing up of that Spark, which was already kindled without his knowledge, in Aristagoras his Son in Law, who Governed Miletus in his absence. The first rise was occasioned by the inhabitants of the Island Naxos, who having hanished some of their principal Citizens, the Exiles fled to Anaxagoras for projection and fuccor. He knowing not well of himfelf how to reftore them, lent to Artaphernes the brother of Darius, and his Lieutenant of Ionia then re-Horadi, 5.130. fident at Sardis, proposing the Conquest of that Island to him, and offering to &c. Subdue both it, and all the rest of the Cyclades to the obedience of the Persian Empire. Artaphernes acquainted the King with the business, and he approving Empire. Zeraphernes acquamics and many most of Megabates his Kinfman. They of it, he lent him 200 Ships under the conduct of Megabates his Kinfman. They favled together towards Naxos, and it happed in the way that Megabates harfin, Olyapolista, ly used one of Arifagoras his followers, for which he sharply rebuked him, as V.C.20. having no authority to punish those under his command. This the Persian Dati 17. took to hainoufly, that he gave intelligence underhand to the Naxians of their coming, who being forewarned were forearmed, so that no good could Aris stagoras do, but spending his time to no purpose, was forced at length to raise his Siege. For this fruitless attempt, fearing difgrace, on worse from the Perfins, that he might prevent it, he studied how to revolt, and draw the Ionians into Rebellion.

15. While he consulted with himself, a Mossage came from Histians, who be the state of the state cause the ways were so watched that he could send no Letters, shaved close the head of his trufty Slave, and thereon with an hot iron engraved fuch marks as served to make out his sence, and after his hair was grown sent him to Miletus. Aristagoras shaving his head again as he was commanded; (which was all the message that the Slave carried by word of mouth) presently and gladly apprehended the matter, viz:

that he should excite the Ionians to rebel. Going now more chearfully about his Sect. 3. work, that the Milesians might more readily receive the motion, he restored them to a shew of Liberty, and to oblige the rest of the Cities by one means or other abdicated the power of their petty Princes or Tyrants, as they were called. But knowing how little able this strength would be to grapple with the whole power of Asia which presently would be upon them, he sailed to Lacedamon, there to desire affiftance from Cleomenes the King; who refusing to intermeddle, he thence went to Athens, where, as before, he laid open the riches of Asia, with the imbecillity of the Persians the present Masters thereof; and added, that the Milesians, as a Colony of the Athenians, might justly expect relief from their hands.

16. The conjuncture of Affairs at present were such at Athens, as he could not have had a more convenient opportunity: It happened that Hippias the Son of Pi- Heradot, 1. 5.6; fistratus, being expelled thence had withdrawn himself to Sardis, where he 96, 97, 98 laboured with his whole might to make the Athenians odious to Artaphernes, and bring the City into the Command of Darius, that so it might return to his own Dominion. They fent their Embassadors after him, praying Artaphernes that he would give no credit to their Exiles; but he urging them, that if they meant to fecure themselves, they would receive Hippias, they chose rather to become Enemies to the Persian, and therefore complied with the motion of Aristagoras. They The Minimans agreed to fend out twenty Ships under the Command of Melanthius, a man of principal note amongst them, with which the Eretrians (out of way of requital for aid formerly received from the Ionians) joyned other five. This was the beginning of those many evils, which afterwards fell both upon the Greeks and Barbarians, and of fuch wars as ended not till the destruction of the Persian Empire. It fell out in the nineteenth year of Darius, the second of the fixty ninth Olympiad, 301 before the Era of Christ, A.M. 3502. 17. Aristagoras with this force went against Sardis, which he easily took all but of the City, which was all turned into Ashes by the means of a Soldier's burning the Castle, wherein Artaphernes secured himself: A Fire prevented the plundering

one particular house. The Confusion being great, the Persians and Lydians met cap. 99, 50. together in the Market place, through which ran the River Pactolus having Golden Sands, and imbodying themselves prepared to charge the Enemy; which when the Grecians perceived they fled for fear to the Mountain I molus, and thence to their Defeated in his Ships lying at Corefus in the Territories of Ephefus. The Persians in the pursuit flew a great part of them, amongst whom fell Enalcides Captain of the Eretrians, fo much Celebrated by Simonides the Ceian Poet, and other eminent men: Those that escaped dispersed themselves through the Cities. Aristagoras could not by any means perswade the Athenians from returning home; notwithstanding, for what had happened to Sardis, Darius was exceedingly incenfed against them, infomuch that he commanded one of his Servants wherever he fate at meat, thrice to found

Though the Ionians were forfaken by their friends of Athens, yet they proceeded, and croffing the Hellesbont took Byzantium with the Towns adjacent, and thence went into Caria, a great part whereof they drew into Society with them in the War. But the scene of Affairs was presently altered: Artybius the Persian with a numerous Army was sent against Cyprus, and the Ionians followed with a Fleet to the Aid of Onefilus, who first procured the re- cap. 108, 206 volt, and now lay before Amathusia. Both Parties being well appointed by Sea and Land, they engaged with their Fleets and Land Armies: The Ionians had the better by Sea, but on Land the Cypriots were betrayed by Stefanor, Tyrant of the Curienfes, and by the Salaminians, fo that being utterly routed, Onefilus was flain, and Aristo-Cyprus Prince of the Solians, and Son to that Philo-Cyprus whom Solon commended in his Verses above other Tyrants, or Reguli. The Ionians receiving intelligence of this overthrow, and how all the Cities in the Island, were belieged except Salamis (which the Inhabitants had already given up to Gorgus their And is recove- ancient Prince) hasted away. Of all Towns Soli stood longest out, but in the fifth Month was taken by the Persians who undermined the Walls; and thus Cyprus was

Hecataus the Hiltorian, who had formerly diffwaded him from Rebellion, now advised him to build a Fort in the Island Lerus, where he might continue for some time till it were convenient for him to return to Miletus; but his resolution being bent for Myrcinus, a Town built by Histiaus in Thrace upon the River Strymon, and amongst the Edones, thither he foon after departed with as many Volunteers as would follow him, leaving the Government of Miletus to Pythagoras, a man of the most approved Fidelity amongst the Townsmen. He obtained the Countrey thereabout without much trouble, but besieging the Town, was cut off by the Thracians with all his

Fearing therefore to stay with him, whom he perceived sufficiently to understand the matter, he fled the night after, and conveyed himself into the Island Chius, where the Inhabitants supposing that he came to promote the affairs of Darius, cast him into Prison, but upon farther advice restored him to liberty. Then fent he to some Persians lying at Sardis, who were partakers of his Conspiracy, willing them to Rise; but Artaphernes having timely notice thereof prevented it, by putting them to death. This device failing, he procured the Chians to convey him to Miletus, but there he could not be received, the Inhabitants rejoycing that they were rid both of him and Ariftagoras; so that endeavouring to get in by Night he was wounded in the Thigh, and forced to retire himfelf again to Chius. Here now not being able to procure any Ships by all his intreaties, he went over to Mitylene, where he perswaded the Lesbians to furnish him with eight Veffels, with which he failed to Byzantium; and at this Port he intercepted all fuch Ships of the Ionians as, coming from Pontus, refused to obey

Subdued all the Ionians that lived upon the Hellespont, were now ready to go against Miletus both by Sea and Land. They ranged themselves in order of Battel near Leda, a little Island lying over against Miletus, the Wing that look'd towards the East the Milesians themselves made up with eighty Sail; to them joyned the Prienians with twelve, and the Minsians with three: By them stood the Teians with seventeen; and by them the Chians with an hundred Veffels. Beyond these were placed the Erythraans with eight Ships, and the Phoceans with three: Next to them stood the Lesbyans with feventy, and in the last place were seen the Samians making up the Western Wing with fixty Ships; the whole confifting of three hundred fifty three Gallies with three Ranks of Oars: But the Persian Navy contained fix hundred of Phanicians,

21. The Persian Generals having much weakned the power of the Carians, and

Cyprians, Agyptians, and Cilicians. 22. Though the Persian Fleet almost doubled the other in number of Vessels, yet the Captains feared both the skill and valour of the Ionians, and therefore betook themselves to politick Councils. They sent for the several Reguli or Tyrants of the Cities, whom Aristagoras had deposed at the beginning of the War, and defired that every one would endeavour to draw off his own Citizens. While they were using their utmost endeavour herein, Dionysius the Phocian Captain, and General of the whole Ionian Navy, exercifing his men continually for the Fight, they being unaccustomed to such Discipline, were after seven days weary of it; and pitching their Tents in the Island therein shaded themselves, and could not be got to their Ships. The Samians doubting whitherto their fluggishness might tend, thought it wisdom to hearken to the Propositions made from the Persians, by Aces the Son of Syloson their Prince, who advised them by a timely Repentance, to save their estates, rather than expose themselves to the anger of the Persian, who though he were beaten at present, was able to bring another Fleet five times as big, so that their labour and danger would know no end. Their Captains therefore took occafion at the disorder of the Ionians to deny any further obedience, and, when the Phanicians began to tow their Fleet together to fall on, they hoifed up their Sails and departed. After this pattern the Lesbians and a great part of the Ionians with-and thus enriched failed into Sicily. 23. The Persians having thus done their work at Sea, presently laid Siege to Miletus, which by undermining the Walls, and using all forts of Batteries, they utterly destroyed in the fixth Year after the Rebellion was first begun by Aristagoras. Samians, transported themselves into Sicily; the rest being brought to Susa before 18, 00. Darius, he, without any punishment inflicted on them, placed in the City Ampia, fituated where the River Tygris falleth into the Red Sea. As for their grounds, the Persians took to themselves the Campagne Country, and gave the Mountainous Parts to the Carians of Pedalus. Histians seeing what was befallen Miletus, with fome Lesbyans subdued Chius easily, being weakned before, and thence with many Ionians and Eolians, he undertook an Expedition against Thasus; but hearing that Capp. 26, 40. the Phanicians were gone from Miletus into the other parts of Ionia, he returned back to Lesbus. Here his Forces not trufting themselves, he went over into the Province of Atarnes, as it were thence, and from the Territories of the Mylians ad-

joyning to gather Forrage, where Harpagus the Persian then lying with a considerable Force, engaged with him in a Fight at Malena; and having cut off the greater Being carried to Sufa unto Artaphernes, they nailed his Body to a Cross, and sent his Head as a Present to Darius, who was displeased that they had not presented him alive; and caused his Head to be buried, as of a Friend, and one that had well deserved of the Persians. Now not only Caria, but all the Islands and Cities on the Continent were also recovered without much trouble: the most beautiful of the Boys being made Eunuchs, and of the Girls sent to the Persian Court. And thus the Ionians were subdued the third time, once by the Lydians, and twice by the Persians; the Tributes were established by Artiphernes, according to Darius his former prescription, and all things settled at the cost of the revolters.

24. Two years after the destruction of Miletus, and in the 26th of his reign. Darius recalling the Commissions of all his late Captains, sent Mardonius the Son of Gobryas, who had married his daughter Artozostra, with a great power to the Sea. Mardonius coming into Cilicia, fent away all his Land Forces capp. 43, 44; towards the Hellefpont, and passing by Sea into Ionia, there dissolved all the Tyrannies, as they were called, or powers of fingle men, and brought in the Democratical Government into the Cities. Then quartering his Foot in Macedonia, the Thracians called Brygi, fell in upon him by Night, and, killing many, wounded him also: whereupon he turned his Forces upon them, and fubduing them, carried back the Army into Alia. The year following Darius conftrained the Thalians, who were capp. 46,676. accused by their Neighbours of having an intention to revolt, to pull down their

Earth and Wa! Walls, and carry all their Ships to Abdera. Then to try of what Temper the Grater demanded cians were, he fent throughout Greece to demand Earth and Water. The Lacedemonians and Athenians threw the Messengers into Pits, bidding them thence to take Earth and Water to carry to their Master: But the Inhabitants of Agina and other Islands out of fear complied, for which they were accused by the Atkenian Embaffadors at Sparta, as intending with the Persians to Fight against Athens. Hereupon Cleomenes, one of the Kings, was fent to Chaftile the Principal Revolters, but fuch a Contention fell betwixt him and his Colleague Demaratus about it, as ended at length in the deprivation of the latter, who thus unjuftly outed of his Patrimony, betook himself to Darius, by whom he was bountifully entertained. 25. When Darius sent into Greece to demand Earth and Water, he gave order to the Cities upon the Sea-Coasts to build long Ships and flat bottom'd Boats, for the Daily lendeth Transportation of Horse. The burning of Sardis by the means of the Athenians and Eretrians, was thrice every time he went to Meat still sounded in his Ears: Hippias the late Prince of Athens was yet provoking him against that City, and at length

Under colour of reftoring him, Darius intended, if possible, to subdue all Greece, and therefore removing Mardonius, under whom the Fleet had of late miscarried, he put in his room Dates capp. 94,95,96, a Mede, and Artaphernes his Brothers Son, to whom he gave in charge to lay wast on Athens with Eretria, and bring the Inhabitants thereof Prisoners into his presence. In their paffage they burnt Naxos, took some Forces and Hostages out of the Islands,

They take Ere. and landed their Horse upon the Coasts of Eretria: They prepared to Fight, but the Enemy keeping himfelf within the Walls, they ftrongly attempted the ftorming of the City for fix days, and on the seventh had it betrayed into their hands by Euphorbus and Philagrus, two of the Principal Citizens. The Athenians hearing of their approach, fent Phidippides a famous, though ordinary Foot-Post, to Lacedamon. to defire that State to haften their Succors. They refolved to fend aid, but faid it was impossible speedily to do it, for that they could not break the Law, which forbad them to go forth on the ninth day of the month Or, except the Moon was at the full. Whilst they expected that season, the Athenians made choice of Ten Captains for the War; and by this time the Persians, now Masters of Eretria, failed into Attica, wherein they were conducted by Hippias to the Plains of Marathon, as most convenient for Horse. After the Athenians had taken the Field, the Plateans came into their Aid, but a great dispute there was amongst the Captains, whether they should stand to the hazard of a Battel: Those that were for the Negative had carried it, but that Miltiades who was all for fighting, drew over Callimachus one of the Polemarchi to his Party. The major part of the Votes then paffing on his fide, each Captain affigned his day to him, (who had formerly been Prince of the Chersonesus, and thence was expelled by the Persians) committing the management of the Fight to his difcretion. 26. Miltiades accepted of the Charge, yet thought good not to Fight till his own day (which was the tenth) should be arrived. : Then fet he the Army in order, and being at a miles distance from the Enemy, led very fast upon him, which the Perfians attributed to madness, seeing the other so few in comparison of themselves, and badly provided both of Horse and Arms. The Fight continued long, wherein thrown at Ma. in the middle Battel the Perfians put the other to flight; but in both the Wings the Gracians prevailed, and turning themselves upon those that worsted their Fellows, made great flaughter of them as far as the Sea fide, where they also seised upon seven of their Ships. Concerning the number of the flain, Writers do not agree: Herodotus writeth of fix thousand four hundred of the Barbarians, and an hundred ninety two of the Gracians. On the one fide fell Hippias, as Fustin delivers Lib. 2. c. 9. out of Trogus, and Callimachus on the other. What year the Battle was fought is not certainly known, but in the fecond or third of the feventy fecond Olympiad, and four or five before the Death of Darius.

Darius placed the Eretrians in Anderica in Cissia, a Country so called, at two hundred and ten Furlongs distance from Susa, the Possession whereof their Posterity held a long time together with their own Language. Notwithstanding the defeat at Marathon, he left not off thoughts of Conquering Greece, making all possible provision for another Invasion. But in the fourth year after, more work fell into his hands; for though Diodorus telleth us that the Agyptians much honoured Identity, a. 1, him as one of their Law-givers, they now rebelled. The year following he was &.

provided for both Expeditions, and was about to undertake them when the custom of the Country first required that he should name his Successor. He had three children before he was King by the Daughter of Gobryas, whereof the eldest Artobazanes, (by others called Artemenes and Ariamenes) challenged the Kingdom by virtue of his Birthright: But it was judged due to Xerxes his eldeft Son by Atoffa Cyrus his Davids declar Daughter, who was Founder of the Empire, and he accordingly was declared at this time; although fome make this civil and loving Context betwixt the two Bro- vide Jafin. Mardonius his Kinfinan stirred him up with earnestness not to give over the War which he had begun with Greece, promifing to himfelf great command upon the Conquest of Europe, which he made Xerxes believe would be as readily performed as spoken. He, though ambitious enough, was not at first of himself very forward, but as it concerned him, thought first of recovering Ægypt, for which all things were left in readiness by his Father, and in the year next after his death, turned his Forces thither with present success: For he reduced that Country under the yoak, which he laid heavier upon it than formerly, and committed the Government thereof to his Brother Achamenes, who was after many years flain by I.

29. Ægypt being thus fortunately recovered, he was therewith much elevated and now had refolved to follow on the War with Greece, but to hear what his Captains would fay, he called them together to advise about it; to whom with vanity enough he opened his mind, and was feconded by an indifferent flattering Speech of Mardonius, who feemed with words to be able to blaft the prefent Condition of consulteth a- Greece. His Uncle Artabanus, a grave and long experienced man, strongly urged bout renewing the contrary, shewing how vain Humane Confidence is, how brittle and unstable the Fortune of Princes and others, which appeared fufficiently in his Fathers expedition against the Scythians first, and since that against the Athenians; that the Greeks were not so weak a Nation he proved by the Battel at Marathon; that the thing which he attempted was most dangerous; to be thought on again and again; that without mature deliberation the Attempt would be rash, however the fuccess should happen; that God many times pulls down the highest things, and humbleth the haughty that trust in their own strength, by making them to fall into fudden Calamities: And as for Mardonius, he chaffifed his youthful and ambitious heat with a sharp reprehension, foretelling him what would be the reward of his rashness. But this wife Council could not be heard from a grave man, the Ears of Xerxes being stopped by the suggestions of one more agreeable to his head-strong and youthful humour; fo that he imputed to his Uncle baseness of mind and cowardife, inflicting this punishment upon him for it, that staying at home, he should not partake of so glorious an expedition. To this enterprize he was also flirred up by the Alenada, or Princes of Thessay, who grudged at the Liberties of the Greeks; by the Son of Pisssay also banished Athens, who living in his Court, a bused his credulity by the help of a Wizard or Fortune-Teller. 30. Yet not long after, confidering what Artabanus had faid, he changed his purpose, and calling his Council together again, after he had commended his lincles opinion, fignified the same unto them, at which all the wifer fort much rejoyced; but the thing running in his mind, so that he was disturbed in his fleep, he returned to his former resolution, and concluded on the expedition. In the preparation for it three years (Herodotus faith four) were taken up, all Mia being concerned therein so far, as to seem to be removed out of its place. A Navy he provided out of all the Sea Coasts of his Empire to the number of about twelve hundred Vessels, which he commanded to meet at Cama and Phocaa, and having out of all his Provinces gathered great multitudes of Horse and Foot, at length he moved from Sufa in the fourth year of the seventy fourth Olympiad, and in the fifth year (not after the Egyptian Expedition, as Herodotus hath it, but) of his Reign. All the Land Forces met at Critala, with which he paffed the River Halys, and came to Celana, a City of Phrygia, where Pythins the Lydian (or Bythinian, as Pliny will have him. entertained him and his Army, and presented him with a vast sum of mony, which he returned with advantage: And so at length he came to Sardis, whence he sent into Greece to demand Earth and Water, as Symboles of Subjection. And wintering this year at Sardis, he commanded a Bridge to be laid over the Hellespont (a mile over wanting an eighth part) which being shattered and broken by a great Tempest, he took so hainously, as he commanded three hundred Stripes to be given the Sea, and a pair of Fetters to be cast

Sect. 1. (being no true Eclypse) Pythius, who formerly entertained him, was so terrified, that of his five Sons lifted in the Army, he defired the eldeft, as the comfort of his old age, might be left to him, at which the King was fo angry, that he commanded the young Man to be cut in two, and the parts fo to be laid afunder that the Army might pass betwixt them. When he was come to Abydus he had an extream defire to viewall his Forces, for which purpose he had an high afcent raifed for him, where he also defired to see a Sea-fight, which in shew was performed, and wherein the Sidonians had the better: with the fight whereof, and of all his Land Forces on the Shore, he was elevated into a great passion of Joy apprehending of how many thousands he was Master, and then presently again into another of weeping, the cause of which Artabanus his Uncle demanding (who had thus far accompanied him) he told him, it was in confidering that of fo many thousands not a man should be alive a 100 years after. Hence that wise old Man took occasion to discourse to him most gravely of the vanity, and miseries of this life, and being again importuned to tell his opinion concerning the expedition, did it with the same faithfulness as formerly, after which he sent him back to Sufa to govern as his Deputy in his absence.

Euxine, passed over his Horse and Foot, and by another inclining towards the Ægean, his Slaves and Beafts; seven days, and as many nights being taken up in the passage. The Fleet sayled Westward to the Promontory of Sarpedon, the Land Forces marched through the Chersonesus of Thrace to Agora and so bore down towards the Bay of Melana, where a River of the same name failed them A.M. 3526. in drinking, as Scamander, and feveral others in Afia are faid to have done be 015mg 75.40.11. fore. 33. The greatest number of Men it contained that ever were seen listed under Herodotastio, 8, the Banners of one Man; but yet great is the variety found in Writers about the Disdays 1. 11. true number. Herodotus writeth of 1700000 Foot, and 80000 Horse, besides ad Olymp. 75. Camels, and Chariots, Diodorus Siculus not half fo many Foot, viz. 800000. 22 coops and yet what he alligns to the Foot, Ctess attributeth to the whole Army, which compiles he writeth to have confifted of 80 Myriads, besides Chariots. Fustin from Tro- trossus lib. 1. gus, and Orofius out of him, reckons 700000 men out of his own Dominions, clin 10, 15 and 300000 Auxiliares. Elian writeth of 700000 in all, Cornelius Nepos of cap. 3. 700000 Foot, and 400000 (perhaps rather 40000) Horse. Pliny 788000 (for Corn. Mp. is the name of Darius, Xerxes being to be read) and Ifocrates agreeth with Eli- Plia, lib. 33. me name of parms, Across being to treat, and system were found 1207 co. 10 mg, mentioning only 700000 in all. As for the Navy there were found 1207 co. 10 beaked Ships, and other Veffels for carrying of Horfes, and for other uses 3000 beams to be beaked Ships, and other Veffels for carrying of Horfes, and for other uses 3000 beams to be beaked Ships, and other veffels. according to Herodotus, from whom Diodorus little diffenteth as to the number of the Gallies, writing, there were found above 1200 of them, to which he addeth 850 Horse-boats, and other Vessels of burthen of 30 Oars apiece 3000. with the former agreeth Ctessas (though often dissenting) and Cicero: with the later Ifocrates and Lysias. Orosius mentions 1200 beaked Gallies, and 3000 Vesfels of burthen; and as for that place in Fuftin, which encreafeth the number of the Fleet to 10000. there is no doubt of its corruption. Herodotus by giving 200 men to every Gally, and furnishing all the other Veffels, conjectures 517610 men to have been bestowed in the whole Fleet, so that at this muster the Land and Sea-forces being added together, with the 20000 Arabians that drove Carrels, and the Libyans the Chariots, at this rate would amount to 2317610. besides Slaves and others that followed the Camp.

34. Notwithstanding all this number, he commanded all the Nations in his passage, from Doriscus towards Greece, to march along with him, so that hereby came an accession of 120 Ships to his Fleet, to which giving 200 men a piece, the number will amount to 2400. and to his Land Army another of 30 Myriads, or 300000 men, as Herodotus gathereth (though Diodorus thinketh less something then 20 Myriads) and so the whole number of his Asian and European Souldiers would on this account amount to 2641610, and yet he thinketh the number of Slaves and attendants to have rather exceeded this, fo that if it only be doubled, the number of those persons that by land came to Thermopyle, and by Sea to Sepias, amounted to five millions two hundred eighty three thouland two hundred and twenty. As for the number of women that baked meat, and of Concubines and Eunuchs which followed, no man can affign them, of carriage beafts, and for the Waggons; and of Indian Doggs no man could count; fo Secti 2: that no wonder it is that to this ftupendous multitude fome forts of Rivers failed to afford drink, or that Plutarch and Isocrates should write five millions to have followed Xerxes into Greece; the wonder is, that no greater Plague raged amongst them, that any concord could be preserved amongst so many Nations, and that provisions could be procured for the preservation of the lives of so many

35. The Greeians all this while having had intelligence; first of his design all along from Demaratus the Spartan Exile, and then of his motions, were according to their feveral interests variously affected. Some, as the Thebans, and the rest of the Baotians (except the Thespians, and them of Platea) and many Thesfalians (perswaded by the Alexade) and several others, out of fear, had un-The preparati- certain in their refolutions, not knowing what to do. The reft meeting at the saddle for Illimus, and confilting for the publicle for the filter. der-hand fent Earth and Water, as Symboles of Subjection: Many also were un-Ishmus, and confulting for the publick safety, resolved, and swore to joyn to-gether in War against the Persians, and with United power to defend the liberty of ciass for de-Greece, at the present to wave all their private differences for that purpose, and to remit the monies owing to each other; to devote the tenth to Apollo, i. e. to do to death the tenth man of all those that had already given up themselves to the Enemy. The War which had often been patched up, and still brake out again, betwixt the Athenians and them of Ægina, was composed. By occasion of this War the Athenians of late had strengthned themselves exceedingly at Sea, through the procurement of Themistocles the Son of Neocles, a very wife man, who had brought the people to lay out the mony, which iffued out of the golden Mines of Lamio, and was to be divided amongst the multitude man by man, upon shiping, whereby the Fleet was encreased to almost two hundred sayl, and Greece came to be preserved. About the same time it hapned that the Athenians asking Counfel at Delphos, the Oracle answered, that wooden Walls alone would be security to them; which feveral interpreting feveral ways, he expounded Ships to be meant by it, and pressed hard that a Sea Victory was promised them at the Island Salamine, which being received by the greater part, they fet themselves with all their might to the strengthning of their Navy.

36. But those of the League finding it convenient to call in the help of their Friends, and Allies, fent into Sicily, Corcyra and Crete, to defire aid and affiftance of the Greek Colonies against the publick Enemy; and to Argos to excite them to joyn against him with the rest of their Neighbours. But all was to no purpose; for Gelon, who then had all Sicily in his power, and was thought to have more Ships then all the affociates put together, refused to give any aid except he might be declared Captain-General of the whole Army; the Coreyraans promiled great matters, confessing their safety to be involved in that of Greece; but refolving to make use of the success of their party, when danger threatned Greece from Xerxes, they fent fixty Ships, under shew of supply, but commanded the Fleet to hover about Laconia, and apply it felf to Xerxes, if Conquerour, as coming in to his affiftance; which being observed, after the Fight the Officers excused themselves for being absent at the Battel of Salamine, because the Etesian Winds blowing contrary, they could not double the Cape of Malea. The Cretans very powerful at Sea put off the matter under pretence of hearing an answer from the Oracle at Delphos, whither they faid they had fent: and the Argives out of hatred to the Lacedemonians, proposed such conditions as could not be admitted, and pressed them fore with the rest of the affociates.

37. The Athenians then and Lacedamonians being most ingaged (against whom the design of the Persian was most bent) applied themselves with all their might to make refistance. Xerxes being about to pass over into Europe, the Thessalians fent to them, demanding help to fecure themselves, as else being unable to fland out. The Council General at that time being affembled in the Ifthmus, thinking it wisdom to withstand him at the first entry into Greece, rather than to defend it in broken parts, fent prefently away by Sea ten thousand men into Theffalia, under conduct of Evenetus a Spartan, and Themistocles the Athenian, who in conjunction with the Thessalian Horse, at the River Peneus; flowing betwixt the Straights of Offa and Olympus, might hinder the passage of the Persians; but afterthey came there, it being shewed to them to be but a vain thing there to oppose themselves against so great a multitude, (especially seeing there were other passages into Thessalie,) by Alexander King of Macedonia;

CHAP: I.

Sect. 2. they returned back again to the Isthmus, and the Thessains thus forsaken, gave themselves up to the Persians. Afterwards the Council again deliberating what should be done, resolved to seize upon the Straights of Thermopyla, being the only passage out of Thessalie into Greece, and better to be maintained by far than the other, and concluded on fending fix thousand Foot thither under command of Leonidas the valiant King of Sparta. Sea-matters were committed to the care of the Athenians and Æginatans especially, and it was resolved, that the Fleet should fail to the Artemisian Shore, towards the North part of the Island Eubera, and not far from the Straights. Xerxes drawing near, this was done according ly, both as to Land and Sea Forces; but the Navy receiving an Alarm, through a milchance of three of it's Ships, retreated into the Straights betwixt Euber and Baotia, where Euripus floweth betwixt Chalcis and Aulis; but understanding of a great Wrack suffered by the Persian Fleet, wherein by tempestuous weather were loft four hundred Veffels, with a great multitude of Men, and much treafure, it returned back after a few days; in the mean while Xerxes drew down with his innumerable multitudes to the Straights.

38. He feat before a Spie to look how Leonidas and his men behaved themfelves, who bringing him word how he found the Spartans, who then kept watch, exercifing themselves in gymnick Games, and dreffing their Heads as on some Festival, he demanded of Demaratus their Country-man the reason thereof. He told him they were fully resolved to die for their Country, and ready to fight it out to the last man, if need required; whereat he derided him as before when he fpake of the valour of his Country-men, thinking they would be so skared at his multitudes, as not to dare to come to hand-frokes. But finding no such matter, but Demaratus his words to be true, on the fifth day after, he commanded a party of Medes to fall upon them, who being with great flaughtter repulsed, he sent his Band of Persians, which being invincible as was thought, lie named were Immortal, and they, though wanting no courage under the eyes of the King, who from an high Throne beheld the Fight, came off with the fame fuccess; whereat he was aftonished, and grew melancholly, as being now follicitous for his whole Army. The next day the Fight was renewed, but with the same Issue, great slaughter being made of the Persians, so that the way being more narrow by the Carkeiles, there was no room for a multitude to Fight, which being driven one upon another, the confusion and consequently the Slaughter was the greater. At this, Xerxes was struck with great consternation, not knowing what to do.

39. There was one in the Army, a Trachimian, named Epialtes, or Ephialtes (as Paufanias writeth it) who understanding his trouble went to him, and offered to shew a way over the Mountains, by which, though with much difficulty, he might fend a Party to come about, and fall on the backs of the Gracians. Being cheared with this, he fent as many as shewed themselves most forward, with him, under the command of Hydarnes, who paffing over the River Alopus, got in the dark of the night up into the Mountain, where beating down the Guard of Phocians which there watched, they began to come into the more plain and easie way, when the thing was carried by some fugitives to the Grecians. They were stricken with great terror at the report, all but Leonidas with his Spartans, Julia, who for that the Lacedamonians were told by an Oracle, that they must either lose their City or one of their Kings, was very ready to abide to the utmost. Wherefore he willingly gave way to his affociates to depart, bidding them referve themselves for the better condition of their Country, who all prefently falling off, except the Thespians, and such Thebans as the rest of the Gracians had forced thither, not so much to help them, as to keep them as Hostages; with them and his three hundred Spartans he prepared himself to fight, with a mind devoted already to death. When the Sun was up, and the Persians not yet got down, those resolute Grecians passing the Straights to redeem their lives at deerer rates, fell in upon the multitudes of their Enemies, with which being compaffed about, they were all cut off, with Leonidas, except fuch as retiring back into the Straights took an hill, and fighting valiantly with those Persians whom Epialtes had led down upon them, fold their lives as their fellows very deer; twenty thousand of Xerxes his Army with this handful of men being slain. The Thebans alone lifted up their Targets begging quarter, crying out they were brought thither against their wills, and that they were Xerxes his Subjects; yet were they flain, or being taken were stigmatized for disgrace. The body of Leonidas being found was nailed to a Cross. These things hapned at Thermopyla in the middle of Summer, while some of the Gracians in Peloponnesus were Celebrating the Games of the feventy fifth Olympiad, in the beginning of its first year, wherein Callias was Archon at Athens, as we are told from Diodorus Siculus, of whose History digested according to the years of their Solemnities, that part now extant beginneth with this Expedition; at which time also Philosophy was translated out of Ionia to Athens by Anaxagoras the Clazomenian, Scholar to Anaximenes the Milessan, who now being twenty years old began to profess it in that City, way being Lamtiss in vite made for Learning there, by the Library collected through the Industry of Piff. mat.lib.i.

40. Xerxes having now had experience of what Demaratus had faid to him, asked his advice for carrying on the War; being in great doubt what to do, after he had heard how they of Sparta were able to Arm well nigh eight thousand men of fuch temper as the former, and that the other Lacedamonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant. Demaratus being of this opinion, that all the Land forces would affemble together at the Ishmus, to defend that entry into Peloponnesus, advised him to send three hundred Ships well mann'd to spoil the Country of Laconia, thereby to keep the Lacedamonians and their Neighbours entangled at home while having subdued the rest, he might afterwards fall upon them, who would be then too weak of themselves to sustain his power: He farther also advised, that three hundred Veffels should seife upon Cythera the Island, which lying near the Coasts of Laconia, might serve as a place of Retreat or Rendezvouz for their own fecurity, and indamaging of the Enemy; Chilon the Lacedamonian having been wont to fay, that it were better for them to have it drowned in the Sea, than to stand so as it did for their disadvantage. But Achamenes the Brother of Xerxes stiffly impugned this advice, left by the fevering of the Fleet after fuch lofs by the Tempest, they might prove too weak for the Gracians at Sea; and to this out of fear the King submitted, hoping his Land Army and Fleet should stand each the other in good flead, both holding one course and not lying far asunder.

41. The Fleet of the Gracians stood all this while at Artemissum; as a Bulwark Horodotus 1.8. to Eubera, Commanded by Eurybiades the Lacedemonian, to whom the Athenians for quietness and safety gave place. But now the Peloponnesians having every one an eye upon his own Country, longed to go farther into Greece, and were only stayed by the cunning of Themistocles, till such time as the Eubaans could secure their Wives and Children, with the principal of their Goods. In the mean time, the Persians thinking to incompass them, sent two hundred Sail to come behind about the Island, they lying in the Straits betwixt it and the Main. They had knowledge of this device, and not ignorant of the loss sustained by the Persian Fleet in the last Tempest, set sail at midnight and met these two hundred Ships with a counterfurprise, took and funk thirty of them, and forced the rest to take the Sea, where by foul weather they were driven upon the Rocks, and all caft away. The news of this was brought to the Gracians by fifty three Athenian Ships, fent in to increase the Fleet, which doubled the joy thereof; so that elevated with new hopes, they fet next day upon some Ciliaiun Ships which were severed from the rest of the Fleet, and, damnifying them much, returned to Artemisium.

42. The Persians taking this in great indignation, and fearing the anger of Xerxes; refolved to redeem their credit with some notable exploit, and for that purpose the next day in the form of a Crescent invaded the Grecians. They cheerfully gave them battel, and the Fight endured from Noon till Night, ending with equal loss to both parties: For though more of the Persian Vessels were lost, yet the lesser damage fell as heavy upon the other, which being smaller could less bear it, though they fought most manfully for their Liberty and Country; the Athenians deserving best amongst them and amongst the Athenians, Clinias the Father of Alcybiades, a famous man in the next Age. Amongst the Persians the Egyptians sought most froutly, and these things happened at Sea those same three days in which the Land Action was at Thermopyle, in both the Straits the Greeks endeavouring to hinder the Enemies accels into their Country But shortly after that they had intelligence by one lent out on purpole, what was become of Leonides and those with him, they would needs depart from Artemisum, and draw their Navy, much battered in the former Fights, more inwards and nearer home. Themistocles seeing this resolution, idea ibid. Pla before they weighed Anchor, perswaded them to kill up the Cattel of the Euborans, sons in the and bring the meat on Shipboard, rather than to leave them a Prey to the Enemy, for and engraved upon stones upon the Shore, and at the watering places where he knew the Jonians would come, an Exhortation to Revolt to the Greeks and fide with their Mother Country; or elfe fland neutral in the Fight; or Fight coldly. This he

43. From Artemisium they sailed to the Coast of Attica, and at the desire of the Athenians took up their harbour at the Island Salamine: The Persian Fleet removed to Artemisium and the Coast adjoyning to Historis. Xerxes now having passed the Streights of Thermopyla, marched through the Country of Doris into Phocis, which being forfaken of its Inhabitants he wasted, and when he came to Panopaa a Town thereof, he divided his Army into two parts. With the one he invaded Greece, and the other he fent to rifle and burn the famous Temple of Delphos: but AParty sent by as it's faid, this party was almost wholly destroyed without humane help, by xoxis to de Thunder and Lightning, and two Rocks, which breaking off from the Mountain nroy the 1cm-ple of Dilphos, Parnassas, overwhelmed it: Those that escaped were generally killed by the Phoconfum'd with cians, who having fled into the Mountain for fear of Xerxes, fell upon them, fo Thunder and that few remained and escaped to their Friends in Baotia. Xerxes now marched through Baotia, the Country of his Allies, into Attica, with intention to do his utmost against the City of Athens it self.

44. In the mean time, the Gracian Fleet lying at Salamine, though strengthned with a new accession of Ships at the Coast of Trazene, could hardly be contained there; for every one being follicitous for his own Countrey, and despairing of Attica and the rest of Greece without the Ishmus, was busie in fortifying this neck of Land, and labour'd thither to bring the Navy, whence there might be fafe retreat into Peloponnesus if need were. This the Athenians understanding, were fore troubled, as having justly expected that the Petoponnesians would joyn with them, and the rest of the Affociates in defending Attica, as they had fought for them at Artemisium; but making the best use of it they could, they begged of them so long to stay there till they could provide some way for themselves. Having obtained this, they publish-The Athenians ed an Edict by the procurement of Themistocles (who improved the Oracle formerly mentioned to this purpose, and invented other devices) that all fit by Age should come aboard, and transport their Wives and Children out of the City with their Slaves, and what they could; which was done, most carrying them to Trazene, where they were kindly entertained; and that Arifides, a man famous for wildom, justice, and integrity, but lately banished for a time by the Oftracism, by the potent faction of Themifocles, might return home; by the fame procurement another Plutgib at fit-Order was made to recall all wholoever were banished, that they might now in time praof need ferve their Country, and out of fear, left they should joyn themselves to the

45. In the Fleet now at Salamine were three hundred fifty eight armed Ships, befides other Veilels of less importance, of which an hundred and eighty were provided and furnished by the Athenians; fixteen only by the Lacedamonians; the Corinthians fent forty; the Inhabitants of Agina thirty, which were notable for fwiftness; the Megarians twenty; they of Chalcis furnished as many, having the Vessels of the Atheniam; the rest were supplied in lesser numbers by the Chians, Naxians, Melians, and Seriphians Islanders. Whilst the Officers were in Council about the place of Battel, News came that the Enemy was entred Action, wasting all with Fire and Sword; for having in Baotia burned the Towns of the Thefpians and Plateans, who had forfaken their Habitations, he hafted into Attica, where confuming all things he entred Athens, three months after he had paffed over his Forces into Europe. The Caftle, fome few who would not leave their ancient Seat held out to the last, and were all pur to the Sword; having refused quarter upon a vain confidence of the Oracle, that the City should be defended with wooden Walls, and thinking they fulfilled the fame by fortifying themselves with Boards and Pallifadoes : the Temple of Minerva in the Castle he burn'd to ashes. The Message being brought, the Captains departed every man to his Ship, decreeing nothing, and all the rest of the Peloponnesians determined to fail to the Athmus.

46. This resolution might have proved fatal to all Greece, had it not been preunder ovented by the willow of Themistocles, who being threed up by Musiphilas of the plants upin thens, followed Eurobindes the Admiral into his Ship, and obtained of him again in to affemble the Council. Here he overcame him by his mildness, who lifting up his Rod in an hear to ftrike him, he bad him ftrike fo he would but hear. When he came to speak of staying at Salamine, one Adymantis upbraided Bill with the loss of his Country, faying; It was not fit that fuch an one should give Council to them, that had theirs remaining to them: To whom he boldly replied, that though they, the Athenians, had left their Houses and Walls, dead things, and not to be valued with their liberty, yet they had a City left them, then which there was none greater in Greece, viz. two hundred Ships which as yet was present, and ready to help their Affociates: But if they would depart and betray them, he would have them know they should presently hear, that the Athenians had both a free City and Territories as good as that they had left, meaning Siris, a Town in Italy, in their power. Eurybiades hearing this, and fearing to be deprived of the Athenian Fleet, fo necessary for their support, inclined to his opinion, insomuch that the Gracians refolved to ftay and prepared themselves for the Fight; but the Persian Fleet drawing down to Phalerus the Athenian Port, and the Land Army to the Sea fide, the Peloponnesians were so affrighted thereat, that having all their minds upon the Isthmus. the advice of Themistocles was not at all regarded, and they resolved to weigh Anchor and to be gone that night, and notice hereof was given to the Mariners.

47. For now Xerxes his Fleet was drawn down fo repaired, and increased by a new accession of Ships, that it was altogether as considerable as before the Shipwrack at Sepias, and taking all Nations as he paffed along with them, his Land Army contained as great a number as heretofore at Thermopyle. The King came down from Athens to Phalerus the Port, and called a Council to deliberate what should be done. All the Captains were for a Sea Fight, the Kings of Tyre and Sidon being first asked their opinions by Mardonius; only a woman, Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassus, a wise and valiant Person, who had followed Xerxes in this expedition with five Ships, with grave and important Arguments diffwaded a Sea Fight, and advised him to enter Peloponnesus with his Land Army, for thereby he would prefently diffolve the Greekish Fleet, and finish the War. Though this advice followed would have been enough, and Xerxes could not but commend it, yet the major and worse part carried it, and it was resolved to fight the Gracians out of hand at Salamine. The Anchors then were weighed, and the Fleet made thitherwards; but Night coming on, fuffered them not that day to reach the Island.

48. At this time were the Peloponnesians ready to depart homewards, and there-plate in by the Estate of Greece to be ruined, by their breaking their united Power, and Themister. reducing themselves into their particular and inconsiderable Conditions, had not Themistocles, born for the preservation of his Countrey, relieved it by his wisdom in its great necessity. There was one Sicinus a Persian, who, taken Prisoner, was a great lover of Themistocles, and taught his Children: Him he fent privately to the King, to tell him that he, preferring his good before that of the Gracians, gave him now first to understand that they were about to flee, and advised him not to fuffer it, but prevent them and fet upon them whilft they were difordered, and the Fleet was severed from their Land Army. Xerxes gladly hearing the message, as believing it to proceed out of Themistocles his affection to him, communicated it to his Officers, and while the reft could be furnished with Soldiers, fent two hundred Ships about the Island to block up the Streights, so that none of the Enemies might escape. Themistocles communicated what he had done to Aristides, who approving of it, went to perswade the Greeks to Fight; when presently, while their minds hung in suspence, came a Ship of Tenedos from the Persian Fleet, and acquainted them with what was done in the Streights; fo that Necessity completed what was but half effected by the speech of Ariftides.

49. Then prepared they themselves unanimously to the Battel. Themsslocles made Iden & Hood a speech unto them, wherein he shewed where their concernments lay, exhorting at prints them to Fight manfully for their Country and Liberty, for their Parents, Wives, Children, and whatfoever was dear to them; with which, being provoked, they applied themselves to their Ships, and put forth the Fleet into the Main. Xerxes placed himself on an high Throne to behold the Fight over against Salamine, and had some with him to write down the particulars thereof: A bloody Fight indeed was fought with great earnestness on both sides, the one fighting under the eyes of their King, who marked every paffage and accordinly was affected, and the other for as much as could be dear to them in fo dangerous a condition. Herein the Greeks had the advantage, that they were more exercised in Sea matters, and having all they had lying at the stake, they did it with the more earnestness, and in that they fought with greater order: The Persians, with so great a multitude of Ships, fought in disorder and hindred one another, and if the Vessels sunk, were all lost; whereas their enemies, by their skill in swimming, faved themselves. At length the Ionians, follicited as was faid, by little and little withdrawing themselves from the Fight, the rest what by that discouraged, and overcome by the pertinacious valour of their enemies began to flee, the Athenians pressing hard upon them, and destroying many of their Ships: Of such as fled towards Phalerus, many were intercepted by the Agenetans, the Emulators of the other in deserving well of Greece;

50. Of all the Gracians, the Athenians and Æginatans deserved best, and amongst them Themistocles; the Captains of the Fleet each one, when upon their Oaths they pronounced who merited most, naming him after themselves. Amongst the Persians the valour of Artemisia the Queen was most conspicuous, acknowledgeed by Xerxes himself, who thereupon said, that his men were surned women, and women became men: She was faved as it happened, and escaped to Phalerus. Many Noble Persians fell, amongst the rest Ariabignes the Kings Brother; but few of the Gracians. Xerxes exceedingly discouraged with this great loss, considered of his fafe retreat out of Europe, fearing the Ionians might break the Bridge laid over the Hellespont; yet that he might colour any fuch intention, he began a new project by caffing earth into the Streights, to joyn the Island Salamine with the Continent. But Mardonius knowing his temper, and bethinking himself in what case he himself might stand for being the first adviser to the War, went to him, and extenuating the loss, the Land Army being left intire, at length proposed to him to leave him three hundred thousand men, with which he would engage to revenge him upon Greece, and reduce it all under his power if he pleafed to depart himself into Alia, being nothing tainted in honour for that things had not so well succeeded in this Encounter, because the miscarriage was procured by the Cowardise of the Agyptians, Phanicians, Cilicians, and others no better than Slaves; the Persians having gallantly enough behaved themselves; and he, their Prince, having subdued already the greater part of Greece, and taken Athens it felf, against which the War was principally intended.

gr. He liked very well the motion, but still dissembled the matter, answering that he would refer it to his Council, which he accordingly called, and asked the advice particularly of Artemisia. She approved of Mardonius his Opinion, for that if he should subdue Greece it would be to the King's advantage, and if he miscarried it would be no disgrace to him, who in his own person had accomplished the main defign of the expedition, in taking and wasting Athens. He was pleased therewith, fent her before hand away with his Sons he had brought with him, and gave liberty to Mardonius to make choice of what, and how many forces he pleafed; all this being done the same day with the Fight at Salamis. The Night following, in great fear and disorder, the Fleet loosed from Phalerus, and fled amain towards the Helle-(pont, which the Gracians seeing pursued them as far as Andros one of the Cyclades, and took in there, for that they could then no more differn them, and that Island had been of the Persim Faction. Here it being debated in the Council of Officers whether the Enemy should be any further pursued, Eurybiades the General, for several grave and urgent reasons disswaded it, a Bridge being rather to be laid for him: infomuch that he convinced the rest; and Themistocles, who as Herodotus saith, was formerly for the pursuit or else diffembled, for reasons which followed, changed his opinion, and restrained the Athenians. 52. And further foreseeing that through their inconstancy and known ingratitude, he might have cause in time to come to use Friends; that now he might make Harddon, Platant, Dadant one of Xerxes, and therein also further provide for the good of his Country, he be- at sural took himself to his wonted crast and policy. He dispatched away to him his former trusty Messenger, to acquaint him how careful he was for his safety, in disswading the Gracians from pursuing him, and to advise him by all means to make towards the Hellespont, e're the Bridge should be broken down, which he thought would be within a small time. He being much affrighted hereat retreated presently with all his Forces the same way he came into Thessay, where delivering to Mardonius three hundred thousand men picked out of the whole Army, and settling other matters, with a small and obscure Train sittest for hast (all the rest being commanded to follow) he hafted through Macedonia and Thrace to the Hellespont, where he arrived after forty five days. Here, whether he found the Bridge whole and fo passed over it, or (what the Gracians have believed) broken in pieces by Tempests, and so pass fed over obscurely in a Fishers Boat, observable is the great change upon him, who with so great pride had formerly beaten the Sea, and cast Fetters into it. His Army following was a great part confumed by the Plague, Famine, and other cafualties; fo that the Fowls of the Air continually followed it, the way being full of Carkafes. And being shipped over to Abydus, very many died by intemperate use of dyet, and drinking too much in the dysentery, wherewith they were forely grieved. Those that remained, by flow Journeys reached their King, lying at Sardis.

53. Artabazus, a man of prime note amongst the Perssans, accompanied Kernes to the Hellespost, with a partie of fixty thousand men taken out of Mardonius his Sect, 2. Army, who finding at his return the inhabitants of Potidaa in Macedonia to have revolted, fearing the Pallenians round about would do the fame, and fuspecting also Olynthus, which then was inhabited by the Botticans, he belieged both Towns, of which the latter he took, and killing the Towns men gave it to one Critobalus of Chalcis to govern, after which, they of that place inhabited it. He then more strongly besieged Poridan, but after three months having layn before it to no purpole, many of his men being loft in the Sea, which broke in with an unusual Tide, he role up and departed to Mardonius, who, for that Winter was at hand, had raken up his quarters in Theffaly, and the adjoyning places of Macedonia. The Persian Fleet being returned to the Coast of Asia, wintered at Cuma, for the greatest part, onely some Ships at Samos, whither in the Spring they all failed, being increased to the number of three hundred by the addition of the Ionians, on whose Coast now they lay to keep them in obedience, being little defirous of failing any more Westward, for the experience they had lately had of the Gracians at Salamina; and yet being in as little fear of their coming to them, whom they expected to be kept in awe, fo as not to ftir far from home, because of Mardonius.

54 They stirred not indeed about providing any Land-forces wherewith to oppose Mardonius; but very busie they were at Egina in rigging their Fleet, over which Leutychides King of Spares (iffued from Procles, and put into the place of Demeratus,) was made Admiral : Xanthippus Father to Perioles being General of the Athenian Fleet, which contained the most Ships. While they abode here, came fix men from Chios, who having conspired against Strathes their Tyrant, upon discovery of the Plot, fled, Befeeching them that they would undertake the freeing of Ionia; and so far they prevailed, as to get them to fail to Delus; but no further would they go, because unacquainted as yet with the affairs of Asia, they seared the Persians; so that both parties stood in awe of each other.

55. Mardonius thinking of his promife made to his Mafter confulted the Oracles: but they refusing to answer, he fent Alexander King of Macedonia, now in great grace with the Persians, through the marriage of his Sister to Bubares, in ambalage to the Athenians, to take them off from the society with the rest of Greece. He knew they gave the most mortal blows in the Battle at Salamina, and thought, that if they could be taken off, the rest would be conquered with little or no difficulty. The fame of this Ambaffage flying abroad, came to Sparta, which netled the Lacedemonians, and made them with all speed to dispatch away Ambassadors of their own, to prevent the alliance so dangerous to all Greece, and the Athenians refused to give audience to Alexander, till they were arrived, that they might also be present thereat. Alexander told them that Xerxes had given order to Mardonius to fignifie to them how willing he was to remit what was past; to restore them their Territories, and more than them if they would; to leave them to their own freedom, and repaire their Temples at his own charges, if they would enter into a League of amiry with him; otherwise they could not be ignorant how great inconveniences they drew upon themselves from so potent a Prince, able to send other Armies if they now with Mardonius should be overthrown: to these things spoken as from Mardonius, the Ambassador added as a friend, that they should not let flip fuch an opportunity. After him the Ambaffadors of Sparta spoke, and shewed how unworthy a thing it would be for the Athenians of all others to for fake the publick cause, they having been the Authors of the War, and their Ancestors so renowned for setting others at liberty; wherefore they hoped that they would not be accessary to the slavery of all Greece. Their answer was to Alexander, that fo long as the Sun should hold his course, they would never enter into alliance with Xernes, but refift his Forces with their own; and him they defired, whom they respected as a Friend, not any more to bring such an unwelcome mesfage, lest he might suffer something from the angry people. To the Spartans they answered to this purpose, that they would never any of them as long as they lived enter into confederacy with the Persian: they thanked them for their kind offer to maintain their Wives and Children in case of necessity, which they hoped they should not have much cause to need, so as to be troublesom to them; and defired them to haften away to them their supplies, for that they beleived the Barbarian would not lose time after the report of their answer, but presently invade them; and they thought it most convenient to meet him in Sect. 2. ed thitherwards out of Theffalie. When he came to Thebes, the Inhabitants advised him to go no farther, for that he should never subdue Greece united together, but flay there in a commodious place, and corrupt with mony those that were most prevalent in each City, whereby he might divide the Gracians into factions. and so easily mastering the differences, subdue the whole Country. But he not hearkening to this advice, proceeded, hoping by Fires made in the Islands, to give notice to Xerges still lying at Sardis, that he was again got into Athens, which the Inhabitants upon his approach, and the Peloponnesians deferring to fend their fuccors, again quitted and departed to Salamine. He entered Athens, the tenth Moneth being now compleated after Xerxes had the possession of that City. and having so done, fent to Salamine to the owners of it, once more offering them the same conditions he had formerly proposed by Alexander of Macedonia, hoping, that upon this extremity to which they were once again reduced, they might change their stubbornness for a more complying disposition.

57. But they were fo far from harkening to what he offered, that they stoned one Lycidas a Senator, for faying it deserved to be taken into consideration, and to be proposed to the whole body of the People, and his Wife and Children were used in the same manner by the women. Then sent they (together with the Megarians and Plateans) feriously to expostulate with the Lacedamonians for the non-performance of their promife, whereby their Country was again expoposed to the will and pleasure of the Enemy, and plainly to tell them, that except their affociates would better stand to their word, and dispatch away their fuccours in time, they must needs provide for themselves apart, for as much as yet a way was open for their entry into confederacy with the common Enemy. The Ambassadors found them celebrating annual Games, and understood that the Peloponnesians were only intent upon their prefecting the Wall at the Ishmus, having no regard at all to them, whereof they highly complained to the Ephori. They promifed them an answer the next day, but deferred from day to day, until after ten days the wall of the Isthmus was perfected.

58. After this time came a man of Teges to them, and blaming them for their neglect of their allies, convinced them of the vanity of the Wall, in case the Athenians should joyn with Mardonius; for they could with ease convey him otherwise than by the Isthmus into Peloponnesus, wherewith being startled, in the dead time of the Night, and without privity of the Ambassadors, they sent out five thousand men besides seven thousand of the Heilots or publick Slaves, under the conduct of Cleombrotus Tutor to Plistarchus the young King. In the morning the Ambassadors came again to them expostulating as before, whereto the Ephori answered, that their Succors were already on their way, whom then the other understanding the matter, followed, and with them other five thoufand gathered out of the places bordering upon Sparta. Mardonius having intelligence how things went in Peloponnesus from the Argives, who all this while, were of his party, was fomething abashed, having till now had some hopes of the Athenians their compliance, for which reason he had spared their Territories. But now he destroyed all he could both in City and Country, and forfaking Attica as a Region dangerous to his Army, by reason of the unevenness of the Ground, and hard to be quitted fodainly in time of danger, he returned into Baotia a Champain Country, and in alliance with him, where in the Territories of the Thebans he pitched his Tents at the River Alopus, bringing much dammage to his friends round about, in taking up such things as were but necessary to the sustenance of his Army. The Spartans in the mean time lying at the Isthmus, the other Peloponnesians after their example came also thither, whence they marched to Eleusine. Thither came the Athenians from Salamine, and joyned with them, whence they followed Mardonius into Baotia, and fate down over against his Camp at the foot of the Mountain Citheron.

59. The Greeks brought into the Field eleven Myriads or eleven hundred thouland, according to Herodotus, from which number (a) others take the odd (a) pintons, thoulands, and make them just one hundred thouland. The number of the Julia, Persian Army amounted to thirty Myriads or three hundred thousand, besides the Oresiat Greek Auxiliaries, which he conjectureth to have been about five Myriads more; the three hundred thousand are owned by Plutarch, another (b) numbereth but (b) com. Napor two hundred thousand Foot, and twenty thousand Horse; but Diodorus on the con- in Arifilds. trary faith, that besides these Forces drawn out of Xerxes his Army, Mardonius had out of Macedonia and Thrace, and the affociate States, about twenty Myriads, and that his whole Army contained fifty Myriads or five hundred thousand Sect. 2. Men. Mardonius when the Gracians were encamped, fent a party of Horse to affail them, which objecting cowardile to them, and provoking them, very light Harodottes at skirmishes ensued, wherewith the Megarians were fore put to it, being on difadvantagious Ground, but being releived by three hundred frout Athenians, all others refusing, a sharp encounter followed, in which Massilius who commanded the Party of the Persians was flain. A great contest followed about the Body, the Persians labouring with all their might to redeem it, all the Persian Horse coming into the Quarrel, and then the whole Army of the Gracians; but at length they were fain to return without it, and it was carried in triumph about the Greekilb Camp. This as it brought great Sorrow to the Persians, fo the other were much elevated in their Minds thereby, and removed their Camp into the Territories of Platae, whither Mardonius also followed them, and encamped over against them, both parties neglecting to fight (only excepting such Skirmishes as was made by the Persian Horse) for ten days.

60. On the eleventh, it being palpable that the Greekish Army daily wasted by the revolt of many of their Countrymen, and yet that the Persian groaned under its own Burthen, Mardonius called a Council of his Officers to consult what was to be done. Artabazus the Son of Pharnaces, a man of great Nobility, and an emulator of the General, contended with him, urging that the best was to decline the Fight, and march to Thebes, where they might have plenty of Provision, here wanting, and whence by fending Money into the principal Cities of Greece (according to the advice formerly given by the Thebans) they might difpatch the War with Eafe. But Mardonius being more hot and earnest, thinking his Army to be for the present stronger than the Enemy, resolved to fight, not fuffering himself by any perswasions to be removed from his Purpose, and because of his Authority the rest daring not contradict it, it was resolved to fall on the next morning by break of the day. Notice hereof was given by Alexander the Macedonian to the Athenians, who advised them in case Mardonius should not fight, to flay it out; for the Persians were straightned for Provisions. The Athenians bring this News to Paulanias the General, who being something struck therewith, he defired them to change places, because they were better acquainted with the Persian manner of fighting since the Battle at Marathon, and the Spartans were more used to the Thessalians and Baotians now opposed to the Athenians: they foon condescended hereunto, but Mardonius having notice of it, made his Perfians change place with the Buotians and the other; and though Paulanias again reduced his men into the former place, yet was neither this hid from Mardonius. who ftill to prevent him did the like.

61. Mardonius upon this sent and upbraided Pausanias and his Spartans with cowardize, especially seeing he had made a challenge to fight with them, with his Perlians, either a certain number of each, or all together, both which were refufed. Then fent he his Horse upon them, which with Darts fore troubled the whole Army, and most of all in that it hindred the fetching of Water, that the Gracians were constrained to change the place, and resolved to pass into an Island compassed about with the River, and neer the Walls of the City, which was very convenient for watering, and lay also well for Provisions. By night they removed, but most missing of the place went to the Temple of Funo in the Highway to Plataa, and there encamped themselves, whom the Spartans being commanded to follow, much trouble arose thereupon by the means of one Amompharetus a valiant man, who for some time would not flir with his Regiment, cry. ing out, it was contrary to the Laconick Discipline to fly from the Enemy, and suppoling Paulanias and the rest durst not forsake him. But towards morning he came off from his resolution, and so all marched to the Temple of Ceres, situate upon the River Molee, being followed close by the Persian Horse.

62. The Sun being rifen, Mardonius grievously inveighing against the cowardife of the Gracians, and Artabazus for his late opinion, marched with his whole Army, as to purfue the Enemy flying, and all his Horse began fore to press upon the Backs of the Spartans and Tegeatans, joyned with them at the Chappel of Ceres, so that then ensued a sharp Fight betwixt them, and betwixt the Athenians who came into their Succour, and fuch Greeks as were confederate with the Persians. The Tegeatans charged the Persian Infantry, in which after much toyl and Bloodshed, Mardonius fighting on a white Horse in the midst of one thousand choice men, was flain by Armnestus the most valiant Spartan. After his death, his men discouraged, were slaughtered in great numbers, and put to the rout,

The battle at

Sect. 2. which Artabazus seeing, shifted for himself with a party of forty thousand commanded by him, and fled towards the Hellespont: the Greeks that affifted Mardonius, though nothing inferiour to their Countreymen for valour, were put to flight: and three hundred of Thebans, who most stourty behaved themselves, were slain upon the place.

63. In the mean time the Corinthians, Megarians, Phliafians, and the rest, who had taken up their station at the Chapel of funo, hearing of the Victory of their Friends, hafted to the place all out of order, the Corinthians over Hill and Dale the nearest way; but the rest through the plaine, who were circumvented by the Theban Horfe, and many of them cut off. The Persans sled into their Camp, which they had fenced with a Rampire for security, whither they were followed by the Spartans, who laboured with all their might to storm the place, but were floutly repulfed by the Defendants, till the Athenians coming in, and better exercifed in fuch attempts, brake into the Camp. The Tegeatans followed with great violence, and took, and plundred the Pavilion of Wardonius with his brasen Manger; and then followed an unspeakable slaughter of the Persians, so that of those three hundred thousand left to Mardonius by Xerxes, excepting those forty thoufand, which fled with Artabazus, not three thousand remained, one hundred thoufand according to Diodorus, without mercy being put to death within the Rampire. Of the Gracians not many were flain, according to Herodotus, who reckoneth thirty one Spartans, fixteen Tegeatans, and fifty two Athenians, mentioned at large by him , but Plutarch mentioneth one thousand three hundred and fixty of the Greek- In Arigida. ilb Army to have been flain, and Diodorus increaseth the number to above ten thoufand. The Mantineans and Eleans came after the Victory, at which they were fo ashamed, that returning home they banished their Captains as Authors of the delay. The Conquerors thence marched to Thebes, where the Inhabitants gave up the Authors of their revolt to the Barbarians, whom being carried to Corinth, all but Attaginus that escaped, he there put to death.

64. Whilft these things were thus done in Baotia, the Greekish Fleet of which Leutychides the Spartan King was Admiral, harboured at the Island Delos: Hither came three Ambassadors from Samus, desiring aid against the Barbarians, and their Tyrant imposed upon them, shewing that it was most equal that Gracians should one vindicate the liberty of another, and that this Enterprise would be without difficulty, for as much as if the Ionians did but once fee their Fleet, they would revolt from the Persians, of whom such as were amongst them would either fly, or might eafily be made a Prey; Lastly, if the Ambassadors were mistrusted as not representing things according to their Commission, they offered themselves as Hostages, till the truth might be cleared. Leutychides taking an Oath of them that they came impowred from the Samians, retained Hegelistratus (because his Name he took for a good Omen) who had been the mouth of the rest, and fending the other two before, followed the next day to Samus. The Sea-men that were there, ftricken with great fear at the report of the Fleet approaching, difmissed the Phanician Vessels, and sled with the rest to the Continent, hoping to keep them fafe under the protection of the fixty thousand Foot left on the Coasts by Xerxes to keep Ionia in obedience, over whom Tigranes was General, a man of a most proper and amiable personage.

65. The Persians having drawn their Ships under the Foot of the Mountain Mycale, near the Temple of Ceres Eleufinian, and barricaded them with great Stones, Wood, and other Materials, came the Gracians with their Fleet prepared for a Fight. But understanding what was done, Leutychides coming near the Shore, by the voice of a Cryer aloud (as Themistocles had done before) endeavoured either to make the Ionians revolt, or at least to render them suspected to the Enemy: which being done, prefently he landed all his men, refolving to try the event of a Land Battel. The Perfisins suspecting the Samians, disarmed them, and sent the Milesians to keep the passages leading up into the Mountain. As the Armies were going to meet, a fudden Rumour was spread abroad through that of the Gracians, that Mardonius with his Forces were cut off, which elevated their Spirits, and made them to Charge with great alacrity, which was also increased; for that they were now to fight at the Temple of the same Goddess, as they heard their Friends had done with Mardonius in Baotia. Then charged they the Persians in a double Body, the Athenians with the Corinthians and others, on the Plain by the Sea-shore: the Lacademonians, and others joyned with them, through the mountainous and precipitous places, who whileft they were getting up, the Athenians fell on, and calling on one another to endeavour to deprive the Lacedamonians of

of the Lacedamonian; and the rest. Two of the Sea-Captains were slain, two efcaped, and with the rest fell Tigranes, the General of the Foot, and of the Greeks perished not a few. The Samians, though disarmed, and other Ionians came in and helped their Friends, and the Milesians fet to guard the Passages of Mycale. fell down upon the Persians another way, and made great slaughter of them. So was Ionia rent from the Persian Empire again, and joyned to the Gracians. After this performed by Land, the Conquerours burnt all the Persian Ships in the Haven, and being inriched with great Spoil returned to Samus. It was found out afterwards that this Victory at Mycale was obtained on the felf same day as the other at Plataa in Baotia, the later in the Morning, and the former at Evening, which caused the wonder how intelligence could be given to these that fought at Mycale of the success of their Countrey-men so far off. This hapned often in fol-Diodorus ad

Then were the Samians, Chians, Lesbians, and others, who had revolted, religioully and folemnly fworn to the observation of the League, and the Gracians departed towards the Hellespont to break the Bridge there, which when they found broken to their Hands, they consulted about returning home. The Athenians were for going into the Cherronesus of Thrace to recover it out of the hands of the Persians, and, though the Peloponnesians returned, proceeding in their resolution went and besieged Sestus an Aloian Town, situate in the Chersonesus, over against Abydus. Before this Town they continued till the Autumn was far spent. and then pined out the Inhabitants, who forfook the Town, but were overtaken. and either flain, or made Prisoners, amongst the later fort of which was Artagetes the Governour, who because he had violated the Sepulchre of the Chapel of Protefilaus, a great Saint in that place, faw first his Son stoned before his Face. and then was hanged by command of Xanthippus the Athenian Admiral. Then returned the Navy home to Athens, and nothing was done further this year, which was the second of the seventy fifth Olympiad, and the seventh of the reign of Xerxes, of the World three thousand five hundred twenty fix, and before Christ the four hundred and seventy seven.

Whilft he lay still at Sardis he fell in love with the Wife of Mafiftes, but she being too honest for his adulterous intentions, he married her, and his Brothers Daughter Artaynta to his Son Darius, hoping to enjoy her this way, which Ceremony being over, he returns home, leaving part of his Forces to continue the War with the Gracians. 69. Being returned to Su(a, he fell from the Mother to the Daughter too, being in love with Artanta his Daughter-in-law, whom inceftuously he used constant-She begged of him a Coat, which with much art and industry Amestris his Wife had made for him. By her wearing of this the Queen knew how matters went, and thence followed the destruction of the whole House of Massles; for on Xerxes his birth-day, when he used not to deny her any request, she asked Mafiftes Wife to be given up into her Power, which he doing, the cut off her Breafts, Nose, Ears, Lips, and Tongue, and in this case sent her home. Massiles inragedat this barbarous usage, conspired with his Children how to be revenged, and resolved to fly into Bactria, of which he was Governour, then to stir up that Province, and the Sace with whom he was very gracious, into rebellion against his Brother. But Xerxes coming to the knowledg of the matter, sent a party after him, which cut him off with his Children, and all his retinue. These things hapned about a year after his return, with which endeth the History of Herodotus the Father of history (as Cicero called him) feeing he is the most antient of all Heathen Writers now extant.

70. The same year being the third of the seventy fifth Olympiad, and the eighth Diodorus ad of the Reign of Xerxes, a year after the finishing of the Median War, so called Olymp.75.40.3. by the Gracians, the Lacedamonians sent Paulanias, famous for his Generalship at the Battel of Platea, to fet at liberty fuch Greek Cities as yet were under the Perfian, who accordingly with fifty Gallies fer Sail out of Peloponnefus, and taking thirty more out from Athens, commanded by Ariftides, first went to Cyprus, where he fet at liberty fuch Towns as were yet held by Persian Garrisons, and thence to the Hellespont, where he took Byzantium, and therein many Noble prifoners of the Persians, whom he delivered to one Gangylus an Eretrian, to be kept as he pretended, to be put to death, but indeed to restore them to Xerxes. For he fent this man fecretly to the King, and bargained for his Daughter to be given him in Marriage to betray Sparta and all into his Hands. He gladly received the Meffage, and wrote back again to him by Artabazus the Son of Pharnaces whom he fent to the Sea-Coasts to hold Intelligence with him, and for that purpose gave him the Government of Dascylis, recalling Magabates who was over that Province. But Paulanias growing more infolent, hereupon was fulpected, and afterwards at length discovered, and punished for his Treason, as farther is to be discovered in

71. In the third year of the seventy seventh Olympiad, and the sixteenth of Xerxes, Disdons 24 Demotion being Archon, or chief Magistrate of Athens, the Athenians made choice Olymp. 77of Cimon the Son of Miltiades for their General, and with a confiderable force fent him into the Maritime Coasts of Asia, with order to relieve the Associates, and fet at liberty fuch as were still under the flavery of Persian Garrisons. He bends his course towards Byzantium, and took Eione and Seyrus, inhabited by Pelasgians and Dolopians, and divided the Grounds thereof by lot; then casting in his Mind greater deligns, failed back to the Piraus, and furnishing himself with more Ships, increased his Navy to the number of two hundred, to which he added of the Affociates one hundred more, and with all this Power failed towards Caria. Here all the Maritime Greek Cities revolted to him, and what did not, he subdued by strong Hand, which having done, he failed to Lycia, where he had the same success, and now requiring Ships to be provided by such as had joyned themselves in Society with the Athenians, he thereby mightily increased his Navy.

72. The Persians now levied both a Land and Sea Army, the former with- Pide Plutarite. in themselves, and the latter out of Phanicia, Cyprus, and Cilicia, the General in Cimnus. being Tithraustes the base Son of Xerxes, who by some other is said to have only had command of the Fleet, and that Pharendates was over the Land-forces, though this place by another is given to Ariomandes the Son of Gobress. Cymon having made discovery that the Persian Fleet Rode nigh to Cyprus, sailed thither, and with two hundred fifty Ships made Head against three hundred forty, whereupon enfued a sharp Fight, both Parties fighting with great courage and animofity, till at length the Athenians overpower'd the other, and spoiling many of their Vessels, took about one hundred with the Men in them, the rest escaping to Land at Cyprus, the men saved themfelves by Flight, but the Ships fell into the Hands of the Gracians. Cimon not contented with this Victory, failed towards the Land-Army of the Persians, Sect. 2 then lying upon the River Eurymedon. Camp, whence enfued great fear and tumult, his men presently killing all they ultim. meet, and amongst the rest Pheredates Nephew to the King by his Brother. Of the common fort many were flain, others forely wounded, and shortly all put to flight, yet they knew not by whom, not suspecting the Gracians to have any Land-Army, and therefore concluding themselves surprized by the Pisidians upon whom they bordered. 73. Suspecting therefore this Storm to come from the Continent, they betook themselves to their Ships, and the Moon then not shining, and the Night being very dark, the Error was the more increased, so that not discerning any thing, they ran upon their own Ruine, and great flaughter was made of them on all fides. All things being thus in confusion, the Gracian General fearing the straggling of his Soldiers too far for Booty, according to former order, that when he fet out a Light they should all come back to that place, gave out that fign by the Ships, upon fight of which they withdrew themselves thither. Notwithstanding these two Victories, which in some sence seemed to excel those of Salamina and Platea, being fought on the same day, yet would he add one thing more as a Supplement to them. Understanding eighty Phanician Ships (expected as Plutarch faith, by the Navy at Eurymedon, which was the cause why he set Plutarch ited. upon it so soon, being unwilling they should joyn) to be arrived at Hydrus, he failed hastily thither, where as yet the News had not arrived, but now the Phanicians suspecting the truth, and thereby discouraged, he easily overcame, took and funkall their Ships, and therein the greatest part of themselves miscarried. Hereupon enfued a certain agreement betwixt the King and the Gracians. 74. The next thing confiderable concerning Xerxes, is his Death, placed in Diederated the fifth year after the former transactions, by Diodorus. There was one Arta-Olymp-78.m.4. hanus an Hyrcanian by birth, of great power about him, as Captain of his Guard, Julin. 11b. 3. who confulted about making him away, and transferring the Kingdom to himfelf, citigat, and for that purpose inveagled Mithridates the Eunuch the King's Chamberlain. by whom being let in by Night with his feven Sons, they ftrangled him in his Bed. He reigned twenty one Years, or twenty with odd Moneths, though some there be that cut off nine Years from that number. Their ground is, for that Themi- uhn; stocles the Athenian being banished his Country, came to Artaxerxes, then the new King of Persia, according to Thucydides, so that Xerxes must at that time have been dead. Now the fame Author placeth this flight of Themistocles betwixt the Siege of Naxus, which the Athenians subdued, and the former exploits of Cimon, so that his Expedition must have happened also not in the days of Xerxes as we have fixed it according to Diodorus, but in the reign of Areaxerxes his fucceffor: and Eulebius placing the flight of Themissocles in the fourth Year of the feventy fixth Olympiad (though Diodorus in the second of the seventy seventh) hence it must follow, that the beginning of the Reign of Artaxerxes must be placed higher by near to nine Years. The authority of that grave Author is in no wife to be despised, yet notwithstanding, this shortning of the Reign of Xerxes which must necessarily follow, is not agreeable to the Testimony of other Writers: especially it is to be confidered what difficulty will arise hereby to the Chronology of the facred Story, it being most probable, that the seventy Weeks of Daniel commencing in the seventh Year of Artaxerxes, and at the death of Fesus Christ; which cannot be, if their beginning be to be affigued nine Years higher. This may incline us to believe, that some reason Diodorus had (who could not but have opportunity to fee and compare feveral Histories) not to follow Thursdides, and makes us rather fubscribe to the number of Years by general consent ascribed unto the Reign of Xerxes.

SECT. III.

From the death of Xerxes, and the beginning of Artaxerxes Longimanus, to the death of Artaxerxes Mnemon, containing the space of one hundred and three Years.

1. VER XES left three Sons, Darius, and Artaxerxes, both of them at the Diodena ibid, time of his Death resident in his Court, and Hystaspes, who was absent in his Government of Bastria. Artabanus having murdered their Father, presently in the dead time of the Night went to Artaverxes, and made him believe that his elder Brother Darius had made him away, out of ambition to reign himfelf, counselled him to provide for his own fafety and honour, before he should establish himself, and offered him the Guard to rid him of him, whereby he being perswaded, sentand slew his Brother. When this was done, Artabanus called his Sons together, telling them this was the time of obtaining the Kingdom, and drew his Sword with an intention now also to kill Artaxerxes. But he being only lightly wounded, laid so about him, that he flew him upon the place, as we have it from one; though others with more reason defer the time of Artabanus his Death, to whom also seven Moneths in the Empire are attributed by * Eusebius.

2. It is probable, that for that time the Treason of Artabanus not being discovered, or for some reasons winked at, he might by a Vicegerency govern the Kingdom. By his means came Artaxerxes to it in his youth, a Prince of a great Spirit, and yet of a mild Nature, Sirnamed Μαμφόχεις, or Longimanus, because his right Hand was longer than the other, in the fourth year of the seventy eight Olympiad, or in the beginning of the seventy ninth, Lysitheus being then Archon at Athens. A. M. 3540, four hundred fixty three Years before the birth of Christ. Within a while Artabanus laid in wait for his Life also, communi-cusascating his defign to Megabyzus, who had married the Daughter of Xerxes, and for her loose life was fallen into a discontent, Megabyzus swore secrecie as well as he, but revealed the whole matter, fo that Artabanus finding not the same success as in his other Treasons, was sent the same way and by the same means with which he intended to dispatch Artaxerxes. Now came out the whole truth concerning Xerxes and his Son Darius; and, Spamitres (or Aspamitres) the Eunuch, who was accessary to the Murders, was tortured to Death. Fustin telleth us, how the King fearing the number, and power of Artabanus his Sons, commanded his Soldiers to be ready armed the next morning, both for a Muster, and to exercise them. Amongst the rest appeared he according to his place, with whom Artaxerxes defired to change his coat-armour, pretending his was too short for him, which to do, he first putting his off, the King took the advantage and ran

3. After his death, his party being strong, great troubles ensued, which ended at length in the destruction thereof, three of his Sons falling in fight, and Megabyzus who opposed them being forely wounded, for whom now great lamentation was made throughout the Court, till at length he escaped the danger by the skill and industry of Apollonides the Physician, native of the Illand Cos. The Battrians also, according to Ctessas, revolted, with another of the King's Officers nameed Artabanus, who seemeth to have had some other command than over Bactria. For we are told elsewhere, that Hylaspes the Son of Xerxes was Satrapas or Governour of that Province, and thence may almost conclude him to have been the principal cause of the Revolt, out of indignation that being the second Brother, the youngest of all the three should be preferred before him. Two Battels were fought in this quarrel, in the latter of which the Wind being full in the Faces of the Battrians, so disturbed them, that thereby Artaxerxes became Victor, and reduced all that Country into Obedience. Artaxerxes having thus revenged his duced all that Country into Obedience. Artaxerxes having thus revenged his Father's and Brother's death, and brought Artabanus and his complices to condign Objects of Objects o punishment, and recovered Baltria, settled the affairs of his Kingdom. He took care of his revenue, setled the Militia, displaced suspicious Governours of Provinces, and carrying all things with much moderation and Justice, gained great Authority from his Subjects. In the mean while the Egyptians hearing of the death of Xerxes, and in what disturbance the affairs of the Persians were, out of desire to recover their liberty, hearkned to the Counfel and perswasions of one Inarus King of Libys, the Son of Planmetichus, so that the greater part of the Countrey revolted, and making him their Prince, sent about to crave aid, and amongst others to the Athenians. They thought it their interest to impair all ways possible, the interest of Persia, and concluding it not amiss to get some footing in Egypt, refolved upon fending three hundred Ships, and prepared for the fetting of them forward with all earnestness. Artaxerxes hearing on the other, hand how things went in Egypt, determined to overmatch the Revolters in Provisions for the War. and for that end levied Forces throughout his Dominions, Rigged his Fleet, and omitted nothing requilite for an expedition of that moment. 4. He thought first of going down himself, but being overruled by his Friends fent Achamenides his Brother, according to Crefias, but according to Diodonus, Achamenides the Son of Darius, and his great Uncle, which an Army of above three hundred thousand faith Diodorus, or four hundred thousand Foot, and eighty Ships, who marching as far as the River Nile, there pitched his Tents, refreshed his Souldiers, and prepared all things for a Battel. The Egyptians affished by the Libyans expected the Athenian Fleet, which at length arrived, and got possession of the River. Presently after this a Land Battel ensued, in which, though the Persians for a time prevailed by their Multisudes, yet the Athenians, who were now acquainted with their manner of Fighting, preffing fore upon that Wing with which they joyned, did fuch execution as put it to flight, at which all the rest out of Fear betook them to their Heels. Great slaughters were then made in the pursue, the greatest number of the Barbarians fell, and the rest betook themfelves to a Fort called White-wall, whither the Athenians pursuing, took two parts of Memphis, and belieged them in the third division called by that Name; of four hundred thousand that came into Egypt, Ctesias writeth one hundred thousand to have been flain, and with them their Captain, killed by the Hands of Inarus, whose body was fent back to Arraxerxes. That Achamenes the Son of Darius was flain with many Persians, * Herodotus tells us by an anticipation of the * Lib.7.44.81.

5. Artaxerxes understanding what bad success his Affairs had in Egypt and Diodorus ad Knowing the main blow to have been given from the Athenians, fent Megalyrus Domona to knowing the main blow to have been given from the Athenians, fent Megalyrus Domona to with a great fumm of Mony to Lacedomon to hire that State to make Wat upon Thunds in facilities of the Month of the Mon them, and give them fomething to do at home, to divert them from the affiftance of his Rebels. The Lacedemonians would not be bribed to fall out with Athens, and refused to hearken to any thing else the Ambassador offered on his Masters behalf, so that he recalled him home, and gave in charge to Megabyzus the Son of that Zopyrus who recovered Babylon to Darius, to prepare for another expedition, with whom he also joyned Artabazus, making choice of them both out of respect to their great valour, and skill in Military matters.

They by the Spring having got together an Army of (above three hundred Diedorus ad thousand men, saith Diodorus, two hundred thousand onely saith Ctessas) march- Olymp. 80.212.15 ed down into Cilicia, where, and in Phanicia they rested their men, and caused Tonyd. the inhabitants of these places, together with the Cyprians, to provide a Navy, which being done, to the number of three hundred Ships, they furnished them with the ableft Souldiers, and all forts of Weapons, and whatfoever was requifite for a Sea-fight, and in this preparation, together with the exercifing, and training of their men, spent they almost all the Summer. In the mean while the Athenians laboured to storm the White-wall wherein the Persians were befieged, but they made fuch effectual refiftance as they kept them out all this year. When Winter was over, Megabyzus and his Colleague led down their Army through Syria and Phanicia, the Navy Coasting all along not far off; and at length came to Memphis, where the fear of them presently loosed the Siege of their Countrey-men, whom joyning to themselves they gave Battel to the Egyptians and their Affociates. Many fell on both fides, but most of the Egyptians, at cusas. length Megabyzus wounded Inarus in his Thigh, and put him to flight, who betook himself to Byblus, a Town situate in an Island of Nile, called Prosopitis, and with him such Greeks as had escaped the Fight, after which the Egyptians returned into Obedience, making their Peace with Megabyzus.

3. 6. Megabyens pursuing them, besieged the place, which yet was so defended Theyd. 1th., that they held it out a Year and six Moneths in despight of him. The Athenian Died. Bid. Fleet lay in the River before the Town, which the Persians at length considering. and how it was possible by Dirches to drain the Water, and derive that course thereof another way, fet about it, and to drained the Channel that the Island was now joyned to the Main, and the Ships rested on dry Land. Now Diodorus faith, the Egyptians for fook their Confederates, and returned to obedience, which the Athenians understanding, and how their Ships by this Stratagem of the Enemy were rendred useless, burnt them all, and nothing affrighted with so great a danger in which they were involved, called upon one another with exhortations not to commitany thing unworthy of their former noble Atchivements, fo that excelling those their Country-men, if possible, who lost their lives at Thermopyle, they resolved to fight. The Persian Commanders seeing their Courage, and confidering their own loffes already great, having loft many thousands, though they had recovered the Island, yet gave them these terms to return with safety out of Egypt. Their number being something above fix thousand, they returned home by Cyrene above their expectations, having confumed fix Years in the War to no good purpole, Inarus taken and Crucified; Artaxerxes then recovered all Egypt except some fenny parts, near which Amyrtaus reigned, who by reason of the difficulty of the place, and the fierceness of the People, could not be redu-

The Persian Empire.

In the mean time, whilft the Athenians travelled homewards, came fifty Ships Thursd, ibid. more to their relief, which being utterly ignorant of what had paffed, took up their harbour at Mendesium, one of the Mouths of Nile. Here they were set uppon by the Persians on Land, and the Phanicians by Sea, and lost most of their Veffels, a few only escaping home, and such was the end of this expedition of the Athenians with their affociates into Egypt.

7. Artaxerxes in the seventh Year of his Reign made a Decree in the behalf of Elia 7, 12, the fews, that who oever of them would, might go up with Ezra to ferufalem and inhabit it. He and his Counsellors contributed much Treasure, and gave them liberty to Collect what they could and commanded his Treasurers beyond the River Euphrates to furnish him yearly with what he wanted, as far as one hundred Talents of Silver, one hundred Measures of Wheat, one hundred Baths of Wine, one hundred Baths of Oyl, and Salt without measure, for the Sacrifices and other Uses, according to the discretion of Esra. He commanded that all things should be done according to the mind and will of the God of Heaven, left his Anger might break out against the Kingdom of him and his Sons: the Priests and Levites he made free from all impositions, and gave Power to Esdras to Constitute Judges and Governours over the people, for the lettlement of the Politie or Commonwealth.

8 Now though here in this Edict be no express mention of repairing the Walls of Ferusalem, or of the Request of Esta in that behalf, yet is it probable enough that he would defire it, because of the often incursions of their Enemies, the Samaritans, and others, neither could their habitation in the City be fecure, nor the work of the Temple go on with fafety: and in what could all that Treasure be foent but in Fortifications? So that we may even conclude fufficient Licence and Authority to be included in this Decree, and that Efra began to build the Walls, but was either hindred by other occasions, or the negligence of the Fews, or (more probably) the moleftations of their Enemies; who because the Licence was not expressed, took thence occasion to interrupt the work till thirteen years after it was renewed, and perfected by the procurement and industry of Nehemiah, who obtained a confirmation rather of the former Edict, than any new Decree; So though Cyrus had first of all granted Licence for the rebuilding of the Temple, yet because the work was hindred by the Enemies of the Fews, there was need of another Edict granted out by Darius. As the decrees of these two Kings were in effect the same, so also those were only put in execution afterwards by Nehemiah, because the execution of it, as to the rebuilding of the Walls, was either remitted by negligence, or by malice of the Bor-

9. If fo, the beginning of the feventy weeks of Daniel, fitly may be taken Daniel 9.24 hence, ending most probably in the death of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Seventy weeks faith the Angel, are determined upon thy People, and upon thy holy City, to finilb the transfers[flow, and to make an end of fins, and to make reconciliation for Iniquity, and to bring in everlasting rightcoulness, and to seal up the Vision and Prophecy, and to anoint the most holy. Know therefore, and understand, that from the going forth of the Command, to restore, and rebuild Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince, shall be seven Weeks, and threescore and two weeks: and the Street (hall be built again, and the Wall, even in troublous times. And after fixty two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself: and the people of the Prince that shall come, shall destroy the City and the Santtuary, and the end thereof shall be with a Flood, and unto the end of the War desolations are determined. And he shall confirm the Covenant with many in one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the Sacrifice and the Oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be powred upon the desolate. Thus the Oracle, in which is contained a Prophecy concerning the rebuilding of Ferufalem, and the coming of Christ, who should bring unconceivable benefits along with him, and yet at length be put to death. not for himself, but others, and this should be all accomplished within seventy weeks of years, which contain four hundred ninety. Laftly, it foretels, that for that horrible fin of the Fews in murdering the Meffias, they should lose both Principality and Priest-hood, and be punished with perpetual Exile, and the utter and unreparable desolation of the City.

10. Many are the opinions concerning the beginning and end of these seventy weeks amongst Chronologers. 'Some begin them in the first year of the Empire of Cyrus, and end them in the Nativity of Christ. Others fetch their rise from the second of Darius Nothus (Successor to Artaxerxes) and conclude them with the destruction of Ferusalem, by Titus Vespasian. Some make them Commence from the twentieth of Artaxerxes (when Nehemiah obtained another Decree of him) and to conclude with the passion and death of Christ; and others will have them begin in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and end in the desolation of the City by the Romans. But many there are who rejecting all these, with best reason, fix the beginning of them in the feventh of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and their conclusion in the death of Christ, in which termination most of the Learned, both ancient and modern.

CHAP. I.

11. For if we feriously consider the account of time, and judge of it according to The beginning the best approved Authors, the three former opinions will be found either to or Daniel's Ite-tency weeks, exceed, or come fhort of the number. From the beginning of the Persian Empire to Christ's Nativity passed about five hundred thirty years. From the second of Darius Nothus indeed to the destruction of Ferufalem, neer upon four hundred ninty years intervened; but concerning any Edict made by that Prince. there is not a word in Scripture. From the twentieth of Artaxerxes Longimamus, to the death and pattion of Christ, are found four hundred seventy fix, or four hundred feventy feven, which come too short by thirteen of the four hundred ninety, and betwixt the twentieth of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and the defiruction of Ferusalem, are found but about four hundred fifty, which come far fhort of the true account; as also the Chronology of such as would fetch the rife of the four hundred ninty from the first of Darius Medus; and the second or fixth of Darius the Son of Hystaspes. And although the Angel mentioneth the Punishment to be inflicted on the Fews, yet doth he not comprise it in the four hundred ninty years, the end of which he signalizeth by the anointing and fufferings of the Meffias, but affigneth half a week or of seven years for the accomplishment of those Plagues, which in such a quantity of time were to be inflicted upon his murderers.

12. But if we reckon from this feventh of Artaxerxes Longimanus, down by Vide Ludovic, his Successors in the Persian Empire, the Ptolomies of Agypt, after that of Alex- les in cleren. ander the Great, and then by the Assamonaans or Fewish Princes till we come at Sacra. length to Hered the Great, and to to Christ, the just number of four hundred ninty we shall find accomplished at his death, with such small difference, as is pardonable to fo many Authors handling fo many things. Or if we reckon by the years of the Olympiads and the building of Rome, we shall find Christ to have died in the four hundred nintieth year after the promulgation of this Decree. The seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus fell in with the second and third of the eightieth Olympiad, according to Eulebius, and the two hundred ninty fifth, or the two hundred ninty fixth of the City, from which continuing to the fecond year of the two hundred and fecond Otympian, and the feven hundred eighty fifth of the City, (in which Christ was crucified.) four hundred eighty nine years, or four hundred ninty are precifely found; fo that farther we shall not enquire about these seventy weeks, having therein already satisfied what this design and

Sect. 3. work requireth, leaving the further inquiry thereof to the studious Reader, and the judgment to the Learned.

13. In the fifteenth year of Artaxernes the Athenians having recalled Cimon, tousyd. lib. 1. whom for ten years they had banished by the Ostracism, sent him with a Fleet of Dioderas ad two hundred Sail against Cyprus Subject to the Persian. Sixty of these Ships he sent into Agypt to the aid of Amyrtaus, who still was up in the marishes, and with the reft he fet upon Citium a Town in the Island. At this time were Artabazus Plutarch, in and Megabyzus still Generals of the Forces of Persia: the former lav with three cimon. hundred Ships in the Road of Cyprus, and the other with a Land-Army of three hundred thousand men quartered in Cilicia. Cimon when he had besieged Citium fent some Messengers to Delphos to enquire something of the Oracle, but ere they got to their Journeys end, he died before the place, either of Sickness, or by some Wound, both which are affirmed. When he faw he should dy, he councelled his men forthwith to depart, and conceal his death, and they doing fo, it hapned that neither the Enemy, nor Affociates knew any thing of it. At this time came back the Fleet fent into Egypt, so that all joyning together again, they sailed to Salamine a Town in Cyprus, where they fought with the Phanicians and Cilicians, who were come to aid their Friends of Cyprus. In a Sea-fight they funk many of their Vessels, took one hundred with the men in them, and pursued the rest as far as Phanicia. The Persians with that part of the Fleet which yet remained, fled into Cilicia, where Megabysus lay, but the Athenians followed them with speed, and landing fell upon them, and making great slaughter, amongst

The King understanding what loss he had received in Cyprus, called a Coun-Diadons ad cil to deliberate what should be done thereupon, at which, when all was conside- Olymp. ejadin red, it was refolved that it was requifite to procure a Peace if possible. He wrote then to his Captains about Cyprus, to make peace upon as good terms as might be ; according to which order Artabazus and Megabyzus fent to Athens to treat about it. The Athenians not being averse from hearking to them, both sides fent their Commissioners with full Power to conclude; at which time also the Argives sent Hiredilly 1400. to Artaxerxes to demand of him whether the confederacy into which they entered ioi. with his Father remained, or they were accounted by him as Enemies; to which he answered, that he did not doubt of it's continuance, and as for his part he accounted no City more friendly to him than that of Argos.

the reft flew Anaxierates the Sea-Captain, who most galantly fought whilst life lasted. Then the Greeks victorious got them to their Ships and sailed home.

The Articles of Peace concluded with the Athenians were, That all the Greek Plant & Di-Cities in Asia should be free: though in the Peace with Lacedamon it was agreed olders at pile. they should be under the Persian; that the Persian Generals should not come within three days journey of the Sea, that none of Persian Subjects should come with a long Ship between the Cyanian and Chelidonian Islands. The Athenians on the other part took an Oath, not to invade the King's Territories. For the Joy conceived about this Peace, they built an Altar of Peace, and graced Callias the principal of the Embassie with the greatest Honours. Cimon was dead, and with him in a manner the true gallantry of the Greekilb Nation; for none of their Captains after him did any thing to purpose against the Barbarians (as they termed all ex Diod, ad Olymp. cept themselves) but being drawn by their Orators to intestine differences, and 84-3none after him being left to take them up, they fell one upon another, and so afforded an happy occasion to the Persian to breath himself, and for a good time to effect his own fecurity with the imparement of their interest. For though Agestlaus afterwards (as will be feen) paffed over his Army into Afia, and made a fliort War with the Persian Commanders on the Sea-Coasts, yet without doing any thing of much consequence, was he recalled by Sedicions at home, leaving the Persian Officers behind him, who exacted Impolitions from the Cities confederate with Greece: whereas whilst Cimon was in command, not so much as a Carrier appeared in these quarters, nor an Horse came within four hundred furlongs distance of the

15. In the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, Nehemiah his Cup bearer the Son of Nehem 1. Hachaliah the Few received a meffage, that the remnant of the Captivity left in 11, 60. Fuden were in great affliction and reproach: that the Wall of Ferulalem was broken down, and the Gates thereof burnt with Fire. Because of this he wept, fasted, and mourned certain days, and praying to God to make the King favourato repair Jira- ble to him, obtained to be fent with ample Commission to build up the Walls. Now was no new Edict promulgated in behalf of the Fews, which had been done sufficiently thirteen years before by the consent of the Princes : only Lefwood fufficient for building of the Gates and Walls of the City, for the Temple, and an house for himself; and the Governours beyond the River were ordered to convey him over till he came into fudah. By virtue of this Authority he came to Ferufalem, and notwithstanding the indignation and opposition of the Enemies of the Fers, by his great diligence and valour, finished the work of the Wall in fifty two days. From the new Moon of the moneth Nifan, which followed this repairing of the Walls, to that new-Moon of the fame Month in which Christ suffered, passed four hundred feventy five Fulian years, which make up four hundred ninty Lunar years, confifting each of twelve Lunar Moneths. This being not without a providence, that as from the going out of the decree to the death of Christ intervened four hundred ninty Salar years; fo also from the rebuilding of the Walls to his death, should intervene so many confisting each of twelve Lunary Moneths. This gave occasion to many eminent men both Antient and Modern to follow the opinion of this King, and concluding them with the death of Christ: although he reck-

Nehemiah not thinking it sufficient to repair the Walls whilft the frame of Nehem. 5. the State was out of frame, restored both the Ecclesiastical and Civil Polity, thereof. Taking notice how all ranks of men, and especially the Priests were out of order, no certainty being of their Pedigrees; he caused to be sought for, and read, the Register of those who returned with Zorubbabel, from which whose ever could not prove his descent from some Priestly Family was cast off from the Priesthood. Twelve years staid he at Fernfalem, governing with great moderation, and self-denial, and reforming abuses both in Religion and State. The Rulers of the People dwelt at Ferufalem, the rest of the People cast lots to bring one of ten to dwell therein, for that it was little inhabited, and nine parts to dwell in other places, the People blessing all such as willingly offered themselves to dwell in Ferusalem. Then return'd he to the King, from whom he yet obtained leave to come again into Fudah, where he seemeth to have lived until the sixteenth year of Darius Nothus, in which the first part of the seventy weeks endeth, confifting of fourty nine years, viz. feven weeks, which are thought to be those of which the Angel spake, that the Street should be built again and the wall, even in troublous times.

17. After Artaxerxes had made peace with the Gracians, he fell into civil and intestine Broils with Megabyzus, who had done him such service in Egypt and elsewhere, if credit be given to Ctesias, from whom we have a relation of these transactions. This Megabyzus, after he had quieted Egypt, and committed it to the Government of Sartamas, departed thence and went to the King, leading along with him Inarus and some Greekish prisoners, after he had obtained a promife from him, that no punishment should be inflicted on them, though Amytis (or rather Ameliris) the King's Mother had so layn upon him to deliver into her hands not only them, but Megabyzas himself her Son in Law, being inraged for the death of Achamenes, who in the former Expedition was flain by the Ionians. For five years he endured her importunity without yielding, but at length being wearied and overcome, he gave up the Greeks and Inarus into her power. His Body the nailed overthwart to three croffes, and beheaded fifty of the Greeks, which were all she could take. That Inarus was crucified Thucycides witnesseth, though nothing of this time or manner; and Herodotus reporteth, that his Son Lib. 3. cap. 15. Thannyras was reftored by the Persians to the Principality of his Father.

18. Megabyzus being forely moved with the usage of his prisoners, concealed his displeasure for a time; but getting leave to depart to his Government in Syria. whither he had privately fent fome Greeks beforehand, broke out into open Rebellion, and got an Army together of one hundred fifty thousand men. Against him then was fent Ofris with two hundred thousand, who joyning Battel with him wounded him in the Thigh, but received two wounds from him, one in his Thigh and the other in his Shoulder, with the anguish whereof, and loss of Blood. he fell from his Horseand was taken prisoner; and though his men well behaved themselves, yet were they overthrown, and Megabyzus getting the Victory used him very curteoully, and fent him back to the King who defired it. After this was fent more Forces commanded by Mexistenes Nephew to Artaxerxes, by his Brother Artarius the Governour of Babylon. He also giving battel to Megabyzus, was

19. Things going thus, Artarius dealt with him by Messengers, then Artoxarer the Eunuch Governour of Paphlagonia, and Amestris also advised him yet to be reconciled to the King, afterwards Artarius himself, Amytis his Wife, and Artoxares (now twenty years of age) were fent to him to perswade him to go to him: being perswaded, after his return the King fignified to him by a message, that he freely pardoned him all that was past, but going on a time a hunting with him, when a Lyon fet upon the King, as he railed himself up Megabyzus slew him, whereat Artaxerxes was in a great rage, that he had stricken him before he could touch him, and commanded his Head to be cut off. But by the interceffion of Amestris, Amytis, and others, his life was spared, yet was he banished to Cyrta, a Town upon the red Sea, and Artoxares the Eunuch into Armenia for. fpeaking freely to the King in his behalf.

Five years he then continued in exile, at the end of which feigning himself to be a Pifagas (which in the Persian tongue fignifieth a Leper, at whom no man might come) he fled away and came to his Wife Amytis at his own house, by whom scarcely being known, he was by her means and the help of Amestris reconciled once again to the King, who made him eat at his own Table as formerly, and so continued in great favour till his death at seventy six years of age, for which the King was much troubled.

20. Whilst the Gracians were busie with one another in the Peloponnesian War, Toursd. 1. 4. of which now several years had passed, Artaxerxes sent Artaphernes a Persian to the Lacedamonians, with a Letter written in Affyrian Characters, in which, amongst other things, he defired to know plainly of them how they stood affected, for that he was utterly ignorant of what they thought, many Ambassadors coming, and no one of them agreeing with another, wherefore he defired, that if they intended to declare themselves, they would send some of their own back with Artaphernes. What was effected hereby is not known, but we find elsewhere, that the Lacedamonians entred into a League with him in one main matter, con-Diodorus at trary to that formerly made with the Athenians. For whereas it was provided first olymp. 84. 42.33 in the one, that the Greekilb Cities in Alia should be left to their own liberty, in the other they were expresly left under his Dominion; such influence had then the Civil Wars of Greece upon the matters of Afia; perhaps because the Lacedamonians were jealous of the Ionians, as the Colony of their adversaries the Athenians, who, if not now, entred into War with them, were much suspected, lealoufies abounding betwixt them. Not long after this Message, Artaxerxes died, Ad Olymp. 82. having reigned according to Diodorus fourty years compleat, according to Sulpi- 41. 4. cius Severus forty one, but after Ctesias forty two, amongst which opinions tis probable that he died in the beginning of the fourty fecond year, after the death of Xerxes, in the second year of the eighty ninth Olympiad. 21. Artaxerxes had only one legitimate Son by his Wife Damaspia, named custis in Ex-Xerxes, but seventeen by Concubines, amongst which were Sogdianus Ochus, and copiis History Arsites. Xerxes succeeded his Father, but was slain by Secundianus, as he was Prife. drunk, in the fourty fifth day after his death. Secundianus then became King, but causing Bagorazus the Eunuch to be stoned for something done about his Fathers Body, incurred the displeasure of the Army, which because of this, and his Brothers death, could never be taken off by all the gifts he bestowed on them. Being jealous of his Brother Ochus, whom his Father had made Governour of the Hyreanians, he fent for him; but he refused to come, and so did several times, till he had got a confiderable Army. For Arberius General of the Horse revolted to him, then Arxanes the Viceroy of Egypt, and Artoxares coming out of Armenia caused him to take the Cidaris (or Citaris) a Cap peculiar to the Kings and Priests of Persia.

Ochus thus taking the Royal Enfign and Title of King, changed his name into Dariaus, and was also most commonly called Darius Nothus. By the advice of 11cm. Parylatis his Wife, he enticed by all means Secundianus to come to him, not sparing Oaths, or any other ways to get him into his Hands, and fo far prevailed, that though Menostanes the Eunuch counselled Secundianus not to trust himself, yet he came to him, and being cast into Ashes he died the same way as Darius the Son of Hystaspes formerly made away his Emulators, though some think Facilities Capthis Darius to have been the first inventor of this Punishment, and that it is pellus. faifly ascribed by Valerius Maximus, to the Son of Hystaspes. dren, Amistris a daughter, and Arsaces a son (called afterwards Artaxerxes) before he came to the Kingdom. Afterwards he begot of her another fon, called Cyrus, from the Sun; and others to the number of thirteen. But all the reft died young, except these two and his fourth son named Oxendras.

22. After this Arfites his own brother, both by father and mother, and Artiphius the fon of Megabyzus revolted from him. Artasyras was sent with an Army against them, who falling upon Artyphius, was worsted in two battels; but in the third overthrew him, and corrupting the Greeks that fought for him, drew away all his Company, except three Milesians; so that upon the Oath of Artalyras for his fecurity, for that Arsites could not be found, he vielded himself to the King. He was minded to put him to death, but Paryfatis his wife perfwaded him to spare him for a time, for Arsites seeing him unpunished would also be moved to yield himself, and then he might rid himself of them both together, which accordingly came to pass, both being cast into the ashes; though Darius was hardly brought by her perswasions to make away his brother now also Pharnacyas, who with Secundianus had flain Xerxes, was put to death. and Menoftanes being apprehended shunned the same punishment by laying violent hands upon himself.

This Rebellion was followed by the revolt of Pifathnes the Governour of Lydia, against whom Tissaphernes and others being sent, he met them, having in his Army Lycon the Athenian, with fuch Greeks as he had brought with him, who being corrupted by the Kings Captains revolted from him, fo that with fair words he was drawn in, and carried to the King, who cast him into the ashes, and gave his Government to Tiffaphernes, and the Cities with the regions adjoyning to Lycon for a reward of his treachery. After this followed the treason of Artoxares in great power with Darius, who conspired about killing him, and transferring the Kingdom to himself. For this purpose being an Eunuch, he caused his wife to make him a beard, that he might seem, no other than a perfect man; but the matter being revealed by her, he was delivered into the hands of Parafytis, who put him to death.

23. Arfaces (afterward called Artaxerxes) the eldest son of Darius, married Statira, the daughter of Idarnes, a man of prime rank amongst the Persians : and Terituchmes the fon of Idarnes, who after his death succeeded in his Government, married Amiltris daughter to the King. She had a fifter named Roxana, who being very beautifull, and well skilled in shooting, Terituchmes fell in love with her, and having to do with her detefted his wife, infomuch as he refolved to murder her by the help of three hundred men, with whom he practiced to revolt. Whilest he thought hereof, one Udiastes, a man in great power about him, being promiled great matters if he could deliver the Kings daughter from fo great a danger, flew him; but the fon of this Udiastes, who was Armour-beares to Terituchmes, and was not prefent at his death, after he had notice thereof curied his father, and feizing upon the Citie Zaris delivered it up to Terituchmes his son. Then did Parysatis bury alive the Mother, Brethren, and Sisters of Terituchmes, and commanded Roxana to be cut in pieces alive. Darius would have had her to have made away Statira his daughter in-Law together with the rest; but through the importunity of Arfaces her husband, she spared her; of which Darius told her. that afterwards she would forely repent, as it came to pass.

They must needs allow the work now to have been carried on by the sollicitation of the Prophets Haggai and Zachariah, which had been interrupted for one hundred fifteen years, ever fince the second year of the return of Zerubbabel and Feshua, at which time they begun to build. But now at this time, and before this, lived Malachias the last of the Prophets, who exhorts not the people to the building of the Temple as the others did, which is an evidence of the finishing of it before; but reprehends those corruptions which * Nehemiah in his second Government had observed amongst the Fews, viz.

And because the succession of Prophets was no more to be expected; in the later end of his Prophecie he exhorts the people to keep the Law of Mofes, untill fuch time as the great Prophet the Messas should be revealed, before whom Fohn Baptist was to come, in the spirit and power of Elias. The ending of the Canon of holy Scripture is by Eusebius placed in the thirty second year of Artaxerxes Longimanus. After these Prophets the Hebrews held the men of the great Synagogue to have succeeded; but the latter Fews reckon the three last Prophets amongst them, and Esra as the President of the Council.

24. Against this Darius the Medes rebelled, but were after some time reduced again into obedience. At this time the States of Greece being plunged deep in the Peloponnessan War, he made his advantage thereof as much as he could, siding with the Lacedamonians against the Athenians, who didhim most hurt in Ass, both by their great skill and practice in Navigation, and being allied to the Ionians, whom as their Colonies they helped against him; fo that much entercourse, and great transactions passed betwixt Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, and those of Sparta, which are involved in the affairs of Greece. In the seventeenth year of his reign he sent his son Cyrus (born this libid, fince he came to the Government) down to the Sea-fide as Satrapa, or Lieu- & Exped. Cyri tenant, with a kind of power over the other his Lieutenants there, and Cap. When he had continued in his charge a year or two, he grew so high that he killed his two Cousin-Germans, Autobesaces and Mitraus, because they came not to him with their hands folded under their Clothes, which middemeanors Ceremony was onely observed in the presence of a King. Their Parents of this complaining highly to his father, and alledging how unjust it was to connive at fuch practices, he fent for him to come to him, alledging he was not well, lying then incamped in the Country of the Medes, against the Cadusians, bordering thereupon, who had revolted,

25. Leaving the command of the Cities, with all his Treasure, and the asfignment of his Tributes to Lylander the Spartan, he went up, taking along Kinoph. 1914. with him Tiffaphernes as his friend, with three hundred Greeks, under the leading of Xenias the Parrhasian. His father lived not long after he came to him, whom in his fickness, Paralytis his wife having ruled him all his life, loving Cyrus above her eldest son, urged him to leave him his Successor, as Darius the fon of Hystaspes did Xerxes, for that he was born to him being a King, and the A.M. 3600.00. other but a private person. But he thinking it not just refused to do it, but 23.00.11. left him those Cities over which he had made him Governour, and his King-Ochus death; dom to Arfaces, or Artaxerxes his eldest son, and so died after he had reigned nineteen years, in the fourth of the ninety third Oylmpaid, the twenty seventh of the Peloponnesian War now ending. A. M. three thousand fixty; four hundred three years before the birth of Christ. Arfaces then, by the pleafure of his father, or his interest in the great ones, obtained the Kingdom, and changed his name into Artaxerxes, being for the Artaxerxes excellency of his memory firnamed Mnemon. When he had made fure his poffefficed the on, his wife Statira thinking it time then to revenge the death of her brother, cufus. and the rest of her kindred, caused Udiastes, who slew Teritachmes, to have his tongue drawn backwards through his neck, and cut off, and got his fon Mitridates, who had delivered the Citie Zares into the hands of Teritachmes his son, to succeed in his Government. Not long after his fathers death Artaxerxes went to Pasargada, there to be initiated by the Persian Priests in the royal mysteries. There was a Temple dedicated to some warlike God deffe, thought to be Diana, whose Temple he that was to be initiated entring must put off his own Clothes, and put upon him a Garment worn by Cyrus the Great, before he came to the Empire; there was he to eat fuch a quantity of Figs, to drink Milk mingled with Vinegar, and perhaps used some other unknown Ceremonies. Whilst the King was about these things came Tissapconsatiempt hernes unto him, and with him a Certain Priest, who having been appointed the instructer of his brother Cyrus, had taught him the Magical Arts. He accusing him of treasonable practices, had more credit given to him, because Cyrus had refolved to fet upon the King in the Temple, and kill him as he should put off his Clothes; fome fay he was apprehended upon this accufation, others, that he came indeed by his mother's intercession, as that he was taken and bound by his brothers, burned more than ever with a defire of reigning. And to this purpose, as fecretly as he could, gathered forces of the Greeks; and under one pretence or other, laid out for forein aid both far and near, hoping to surprise his brother, The Ionian Cities given up now into the hands of Inflathernes revolted to him, all except Miletus, the Inhabitants of which he finding to practice the same, killed some, and drove away the rest, who slying to Cyrus, he besieged the City both by Sea and Land, endeavouring to restore them. Then wrote he submissive ly to his brother, defiring he might have the Government of those Cities rather than Tiffaphernes, and herein he was furthered by his Mother, who lying as it were his Lieger at Court, made the best of all things. Hence was Artaxerxes deluded, suspecting nothing, but accounting these forces to be kept together against Tisaphernes, betwixt whom and Cyrus he little regarded though there were a War, and the rather, because Cyrus fent him the Tributes due from the Cities, which Tiffaphernes had formerly kept in his hand. 27. Clearchus at this time being banished from Lucedemon, came to Cyrus, who after conference with him admired the man, and gave him ten thousand Darieks, wherewith he leviedan Army, and passing out of Cherronesus warred upon the Thracians that inhabited above the Hell front, thereby greatly promoting the Idean init. affairs of the Greek Cities , infomuch that they willingly furnished him with money to maintain his Forces which were onely raised for Cyrus, though thus employed for a cover to the defign, and till he could be in a readine's. There was also one Aristippus a Thessalian a guest of Cyrus, who being overpowered by his Country-men of the contrary faction came to him, and requested him to spare him two thousand Mercenaries and three months pay, alledging that thereby he should be able to overcome his adversaries. He granted his request, and doubled both the number of men and sum of money, defiring him withal, not to agree with his adversaries till they two had conference together; and so this Army in Thessalie (though not discovered) was kept on foot and maintained for him. Further he fent to Proxenus the Baotian; his friend, to bring unto him as many men as he might, under pretence of warring against the Pissdians, who spoiled his Country; and Sophenetus the Stymphalian, with Secrates the Achean, who likewise were both his Guests, to come to him with as many men as they could make, under colour, together with the banished Milesians, of making War upon Tissaphernes.

20. When he was now resolved to march up into the higher Provinces against his brother, and for that purpole must gather all his Forces together, he gave out, that his purpose was to chace the Pistains wholly, out of the Country, and so, as for that intent, affembled both his Barbarian and Gracian Troups. He commanded Clearchus with the Army he led to come unto him, Aristippus to compound with his adversaries, and fend him his Forces, and Xenias the Arcadian (whom he had appointed General of the Mercenaries that lay in Garrisons in the Cities) leaving onely so many as should be necessary to keep the Cittadels, gathered those Forces together, and brought them to Sardis, being about four thouland armed Foot. He fent for those that lay before Miles sus, and invited the banished men to his service, promising, if his affairs succeded, not to give over till he had reftored them, which they gladly accepted of. Proxenus came with fifteen hundred heavy armed and five hundred light-armed foot. Sophenetus the Stymphalian brought one thouland armed, Socrates the Achean about five hundred, Pasion the Megarean three hundred, and as many Paltasts or Targetiers,

29. He had before this fent to Lacedamon, desiring of that State, that as he had formerly aided them against the Athenians, so they would not refuse now in his need to do the same for him : boasting in his letters, that if they fent him Foot-men, he would provide for them Horses, if Horse-men, Chariots, if they had before of their own certain pieces of ground, he would give them whole Villages, and he would not count but measure their pay to them. The Ephori then presently wrote to their Admiral, to do whatsoever he should command, who accordingly went to Ephefus and joyned himself with Tamos the Ægyptian and Admiral to Cyrus, with whom he failed into Cilicia, and there prevailed that Syennesis the Prince of that Country hindred not Cyrus as he passed by Land against his Brother. Tiffephernes conceiving that these preparations were greater than fitted the War against the Pisidians, with a party of five hundred Horse, hast- cridib.1. ed to the King with all possible speed, who as soon as by him he had the intelligence, Diodors, made contrary preparations. Cyrus after he had committed the care of Lydia to fome Persians of his kindred, and given the charge of Lydia, Æolis, and the parts adjacent to Tamos of Memphis his faithful friend, he presently set forwards toward Cilicia and Pisidia, it being bruted up and down that some of these people had revolted. From Sardis he marched through Lydia, and after four encampings, came an hundred and twelve miles and an half to Coloffe, a great, rich, and well inhabited City, where he stayed seven days, and Menon the Thessalian came to him with a thousand Armed Foot, and five hundred Dolopian, Enian, and Olynthians Peltafts. From thence he marched in three Encampings seventy five miles and zonoh. ibid. an half to Celane, a great and rich City of Phrygia, where he rested thirty days, and Clearchus the Lacedamonian came to him with a thousand Armed Foot, and eight hundred Thracian Peltasts, and two hundred Cretian Archers; and Sofias the Syracufian brought a thousand Armed Foot, and Sophenatus the Arcadian, the same number. Here he also mustred the Greeks, and found them to be eleven thousand Armed, and about two hundred Peltasts or Tar-

Here the Army made much ado for pay, being more than three months behind, which he was enabled to pay them with a month over, by the coming of Epiaxia, Wife to Syennesis, King of Cilicia, who brought good ffore of Treasure with her. From thence, in four Encampings, he proceeded feventy five miles as far as Tyriaum, a City full of people, and hence, in three En campings, seventy five miles, and arrived at Iconium the last City of Phrygia. He stayed here three days, and then marched, in five Encampings, through Lycaonia an hundred and twelve miles, which Country he suffered the Greeks to spoil as Enemy. Now he sent away the Cilician Queen by the nearest way into her own Country, and with her Menon the Theffalian and his Regiment, to make way for his passage into that Country.

31. Cyrus with the rest, marched through Cappadocia twenty five Parasangs, or ninety three miles and an half in four days, and came to Dana a great and wealthy City, where he put to death two Persians for Treason against himself. From hence attempt was made to break into Cilicia, but the Streights were so narrow, that one Chariot could but pass at once, and withal exceeding steep, so that if resistance was made it was impossible, which Syennesis the King was said to be ready to make at the height of the Streights; and the Army for that reason staid in the Plain. But the next day word was brought that he had quitted the paffage, after he perceived Menon's Troops to be got into Cilicia beyond the Mountains, and heard how a Fleet of Lacedemonian Gallies were with those of Cyrus, under Sail to pass from Ionia thither, under Conduct of Tamon. Then ascended he the Mountain without any opposition, from which descending, in four Encampings, he marched ninety three miles and an half, and came to Tarjus and a great rich City of Cilicia, where was the Palace of Syennesis, and through which runneth Cyanus, a River two hundred foot in bredth.

32. The Inhabitants thereof, except such as bought and fold, fled with their King to the tops of the Mountains, leaving the City to be facked with the Palace by the Soldiers, enraged for the loss of an hundred of their Companions of Menon's Regiment. Cyrus fent for the King to come to him, who refused it, till overcome by the perfwasions of his Wife, and then he gave him great sums of money to uphold his Army, and received backfuch gifts as were accounted most Sect. 1 honourable amongst Kings, as an Horse with a golden bit, a Chain of gold, Bracelets, a fword decked with gold, a Persian Garment, and Freedom of his Land from spoil; as also restitution of Slaves taken in spoil by the Souldiers wherefoever they could be found. Here the foldiers now imagining that they were lead against the King flatly refused to go any farther, it being, as they faid, no part of their agreement. Clearchus went about to force his men to proceed, but they, as foon as he offered to go forwards, cast stones at him and at his carriage beafts, whereby he was forced to betake himself to a fair and politick way; and to effect it (which with trouble enough he did) Cyrus gave out that he went against Abrocamas an Enemy of his, who laid upon the River Euphrates about twelve encampings from thence, that if he found him there, he would be revenged on him, and if he fled away they should deliberate what to do. Hereupon, though they suspected the matter, yet they refolved to hold on, and upon demanding more pay, he promifed them half as much more as formerly they had : viz. a Darick and an half instead of one Darick to every Soldier. All this while no man heard in publick they were led against the

33. From Tarfus in five encampings he marched about eighty three miles to Iffor, the last City of Cilicia, well peopled large, and rich, and struated upon the Sea, where he remained three dayes. Hither out of Peloponnesus came to Cyrus thirty five Lacedamonian ships, under the command of Pythagoras, together with Tamos, who brought from Ephelus twenty five of Cyrus his ships, wherewith he had befieged Miletus, and Cherisophus the Lacedamonian whom Cyrus had fent for, and who brought with him seven hundred armed Foot. Whilst the Army lay here, the Gracian Mercenaries that ferved Abrocamus, viz. four hundred armed Foot revolted and came to Cyrus. From hence in one encamping he came about eighteen miles to the Streights of Cilicia, and Syria, defended with a wall on each fide, betwixt which ran the River Kerfos a hundred foot broad. The diffance betwixt the walls was three furlongs, admirting no passage by force, the nether way toward the Sea being narrow and fenced with ftrong walls, and the upper nothing but inacceffible Rocks, in either wall there being fet a gate, This passage Cyrus suspecting to be stopped by Abrocamas, sent for his ships to transport so many men as might force it : but he upon hearing of Grus his coming into Cilicia, returned with all speed out Phanicia to the King though reported to have an Army of three hundred thousand men.

34. From the Streights he marched in one encamping eighteen miles, and upwards, and cameto Myriandrum a City of Syria, inhabited by the Phanici. ans, upon the Sea, being a place of traffick, where many ships of burthen then rode in the Haven. Here he remained seven dayes, and Xenias the Arcadian Collonel, with Pasion of Megara shipping themselves sailed homewards, discontented, as was thought, because Cyrus suffered Clearchus to keep their Soldiers, which refusing to go any further against the King, removed into his Camp, with intent to return into Greece. From thence in four encampings he marched feventy five miles to the River Chatos, a hundred foot broad, which was full of great tame Fish, which the Syrians counted gods, and therefore fuffered them not to be harmed no more than Pigeons. The Villages wherein they encamped belonged to Parifatis, being affigned her for her maintenance. Thence in eight encampings he marched a hundred fixty eight miles to the River Euphrates, whose breadth was three furlongs, and upon which was built the great and rich Citie Thaplacus, where the Army remained five dayes.

35. Here it was openly declared to the Greeks that they were led against the King, for which they were very angry with their Officers, who, they faid they were fure, knew it before, for not acquainting them fooner with the defign; and refused to stir one foot forwarder, except upon promise of as much as their Country-men had, who formerly waited on Cyrus to his father. He promifed to give every man five pounds in filver (of the value of fourteen pounds, eleven shillings, eight pence, sterling) as soon as they came to Babylon, and to continue their whole pay, till they should be sent back into Ionia, to which conditions most of them yielded, and Menon prevailing with his Regiment to pass over the River first, whilest the other were yet in consultation, thereby to gain greater favour with Cyrus, all the Army followed, not a man being wer above the breafts in wading over; so that this passage seemed to be miraculous, and to portend more good to Cyrus than followed, the River giving way to him, which they of That facus reported never to have been passed over on Foot before, but only with shipping, which Abrocamus had burnt to hinder him in the paffage. Thence in nine encampings he marched fifty Parafangs, or one hundred eighty seven miles and upwards through Syria, and came to the River Araxes. Here they stayed three days, and made provision of Victuals, and then departing thence, marched through the Wilderness of Arabia, one hundred thirty miles in five encampings, having Euphrates on the right Hand, and proceeding through this Countrey came to the River Masca, where they stayed three days in making provision for the Army; whence in thirteen encampings they marched through the defert ninty paralangs, or three hundred thirty feven miles and an half, and came to the Straights.

36. Proceeding in their Journey hence, they might discover the footings, and dung of Horses; for a party had been sent of about two thousand, which going before the Kings Camp, burnt up the Fodder, and made havock of all things profitable for use. Now came Orontes a Persian to Cyrus, whom having sought to betray him in times past, and pardoned by him, attempted now to do the like. but was discovered, and put to death. Marching still forward they proceeded in three incampings fourty five miles through the Countrey of Babylon. In the third encamping at midnight Cyrus fet his men in order, thinking his Brother to be near, and would give him battel the next morning. The Grecians were in number ten thousand four hundred Armed, and two thousand four hundred Targetiers, the Barbarians with Cyrus were ten Myriads (or one hundred thousand) besides about two hundred Sythed Chariots. From hence in order of Battel he marched some twelve miles, thinking the King would have fought that day, because at the end of this half days Journey he found a Trench cast five Fathoms broad. and three deep, running up fourty five miles into the Countrey, as far as the Wall of Media, where the four Chanels begin that derived out of the River 77gris, fall into Euphrates. This Trench the King caused to be made after he heard that Cyrus was stirring, who now passing it without any disturbance, he and all his Army were strongly perswaded that the King determined not to Fight; whence he had not so great care of his March the next day, and the third day after he advanced fitting in his Chariot: the most of his Army marched confusedly, many of the Souldiers having their Arms laid upon the Wains, and carriage of Beafts.

37. Now it was time, the Market was full, and the place of encamping where they should quarter was at hand, when Patagyas a Persian, one of the faithfullest of Cyrus his Train was feen to come upon the Spur, his Horse dropping with Sweat, crying out in the Persian and Greek language that the King was hard by, with an huge Army, ready and prepared for Fight. This news made a great confusion. all thinking they should be charged in that disorder, Cyrus leaping from his Chariot, put on his Curace, and mounting on horsback, took his Dart in his Hand, and commanded the reft to arm, and every man to take his place. Clearchus flood in the point of the right Wing, by the River Euphrates, Menon and his Regiment held the point of the left, and Cyrus himself the midst with fix hundred horsmen armed with great Curaces, and Tafes, and all of them with Casks, except. he alone, who frood waiting the Fight with his Head unarmed, according to the custom of Persia. The King had with him ninty Myriads (or nine hundred thoufand) and one hundred fifty Chariots, having on both fides Sythes prominent. and bearing straight forth from the Axle-trees, and some from the former feat of the Chariot with their Points turned towards the Ground, that they might cut in pieces whatfoever they met and ftruck upon: His purpose was to fend them with high speed against the Ranks of the Gracians, to break and rent them asunder.

38. The Kings Army came on an equal and flow pace, in great filence, quierness, and order, which amazed, and discouraged Cyrus, and the Gracians, little Antagricus and expecting any fuch thing. Cyrus now galloping up to the right Wing, cried out crus joyn bat. to Clearchus to lead the Gracians against the middest of the Enemies battel, because the King was there, saying that if he were overcome, there would be no more for them to do. Clearchus seeing the middest of the Battel, and hearing from him that the King, by reason of his multitude which stretched out the Body, was far without the point of the left Wing of the Gracian Phalang, would not for all that draw away the right wing from the River, fearing to be confronted, and incompassed on both sides: but answered, he would have a care that all things should go well. The word was betrayed before they joyned so that they were forced to change it to Fupiter, the Saviour, and victory, after the giving of which the Gracians linging the Pean, and running on with a shout, the Barbarians, before they came within an Arrows shot, turned their Horses Sect. and fled, the other following the Chace with all speed, and crying to one another not to haste too much, but to follow in good order. The Chariots void of Guides were carried, fome upon the Enemies themselves, some upon the Gracians, who upon a forecast opened, and let them pass through, only some were overthrown by fear, who notwithfranding were reported to have had no harm, nor yet any other Greeian in this whole fight, one only excepted, who was ftrucken with an Arrow in the left fide.

Book. II.

39. Cyrus beholding this fight much rejoyced, and was now worshipped as King by those about him, notwithstanding he followed not the Chase, but keeping by him his fix hundred Horfe, observed what the King would do, who being in the midft of his Phalang, without the point of Cyrus his left Wing, and feeing no man to fight against him on the contrary part, wound, and turned his Battel to the left hand, to overwing, and encompais in his Enemies. Cyrus perceiving it, and fearing, left coming on the backs of the Gracians he should cut them in pieces, galloped forth, and met him in front, and charging with his fix hundred. overcame, and put to flight the fix thousand that were ordered before him, and with his own Hands (as was reported) flew Artagerses, one of his Generals. His fix hundred pursuing hotly were dispersed, except a few that were left with him, for the most part such as usually fat at his Table, with which being accompanied, he espied the King, and the Troup about him, and after he had said I fee the man, flew outdirectly against him, struck him on the Breast, and wounded him through the Curace, as Ctesias of Gnidus the Kings Physician related, who reported also that he cured the Wound. Whilst Cyrus thus fought, one with a Dart hit him a fore blow under the Eye.

40. The King and Cyrus with their followers in defence of either of them thus xenoph. at Juyra coping together, Cyrus was flain by the King, as his flatterers faid, as others by a " Platarch in Carian, though Ctessas writeth his death to have hapned after the King had withdrawn himself to an Hill, being first wounded besides the Eye, and then dispatched by a thrust into his left Leg, by a Caunian of a base condition, who with other of his Companions had thrust himself, it being now dark, in amongst his followers. Here he died in the battel of Cunaxa a place distant from Babylon five hundred Furlongs, or fixty odd Miles, a man in the opinion of fuch as had acquaintance with him, of a most Kingly disposition, and most worthy a Crown of all the Persians that succeeded Cyrus the Great. Clearchus before the Fight advifed him to keep himfelf behind the Army, and not to venture into danger, to whom he replied as one who wished him to carry himself unworthy a Kingdom whilest he fought for one. In the opinion of Plutarch, not so much his rashness (though inexcufable) as the laziness, not to say cowardise, of Clearchus is to be condemned, who having marched fo many Miles for no other purpose than to place him in the Throne, not so much endeavoured his safety and Conquest. as his own ease and security: The event of the Fight shewed, that none of those about the King would have endured the least brunt from the Gracians, and that after they had been put to flight, and he with them, or elfe killed in the place, the Victory and Kingdom must have remained to Cyrus. But this advantage was lost by Clearchus, who so placed his men that Artaxerxes could not have defired a more convenient order, on his part, they being at greatest distance from him and his Army, insomuch that he neither perceived himself overcome by them, and A.M. 3607: Cyrus was sooner slain than they could reap any fruit of their Victory. 41. Artaxerxes commanded the Head, and right hand of Cyrus to be cut off, and following the Chace, chanced upon his Camp, which they plundred, and took thence his Phocean Concubine, called the wife and beautiful, whose name in her own Countrey was Mitto, but by Cyrus called Afpafia, whom the King most loved, and kept amongst his three hundred fixty Concubines. Now were he and the Gracians near four Miles afunder; the last giving Chace to such Enemies as flood before them, as if they had been Conquerours of the whole Army; the other rifling the Camp of the Gracians, as if his Army had gained the Victory. After this both parties rallied again for a new engagement, but the naving the bet. Then after some consultation what was to be done, they returned to the Camp about Supper time, where they found the most of their other Goods rifled, and especially the Meat and Drink, and the four hundred Wains loaden with Meal and Wine, which Cyrus had prepared to relieve them, in case the Army should at any time be driven to want. The most of them therefore were supperless, having also wanted their Dinner that day: for that the King came in fight before they could refresh themselves. Thus this day ended, and together with the Story, the first Book of the Ascent of Cyrus commonly ascribed to Xenophon as the Author.

Artaxerxes fent a Message to them to lay down their Arms, and to repair to his Gate, there to submit themselves to his mercy. The Coronels were divided in their opinions concerning it, and gave feveral answers according to their apprehensions, but Clearchus, for all a doubtful one, viz. that if they might be accounted as his Friends, they should be better Friends having Arms, than delivering them up to any man; if no remedy there was but War, they should better make War with Arms, than without, after they had rendred them up. And whereas he offered them Truce, as long as they abode in the same place, but threatned War if they stirred thence, he replied only, that they would expect accordingly. Then resolved he, after he knew Arieus his answer, and how he invited them to march back again into Ionia, for that the Sacrifice killed about marching against the King was not prospitious, to joyn the Army unto his, which accordingly he did, Arians, and the Officers of the Gracians taking an Oath to be Friends, Confederates, and not to betray one another. The League was entred into on this manner: They killed a Boar, a Bull, a Wolf, and a Ram; and the Gracians dipped the point of a Sword, the Barbarians of a Spear in the Blood of these Beafts, being powred out into the hollowness of

Then set they forward that way, march. ing more flowly for the better gathering of necessaries, and after the King had somewhat recovered of his Wound, he pursued them, and pitched his Tents hard by theirs; but with the noise of them his men were so affrighted, that some of the nearest to them removed their Tents, and on the next day setting their men in order for Battel, he who before had made fuch large demands, fent and offered them Truce, and covenanted to let them have free passage through his Territories till they came to the Sea, and afforded them Provisions for their money. which was also granted to all the Mercenaries who served under Ariaus (or Aria daus) and Clearchus. Then proceeded the Greeks on their Journey, and the King returned to Babylon, where rewarding those that had best deserved on him in the last Battel, he judged the Service of Tillaphernes to have been most eminent, there-

They with the Captains of the leveral Companies going to him, with two hundred more (who went to buy Victuals) he secured the Coronels called into his Tent, and killed the Captains at the Door with the other two hundred, of which one chanced to escape with the News thereof to the Camp. The Coronels were fent to the King, who put them all to death except Menon. The Soldiers at first greatly terrified, having now no body left to command or lead them, by the advice of Xenophon made choice of other Leaders, amongst whom Cheirisophus was chief, and he himself was one, being elected into the place of Thither he went, and enquired how he might best accomplish his Journey, to which was answered, that he must Sacrifize to those Gods to whom he ought to Sacrifize, which he reporting again to Socrates, he blamed him for so propounding his Question, alleging he ought to have asked whether he should travel or no, and not as one resolved already to do it; but feeing it was fo, he must do as he was bidden, and accordingly he followed Cyrus to Sardis, where Proxenus presented him to him.

The Carducians a warlike Nation and at Enmity with the King, and much exercised in slinging of great and mailie Stones, much diffurbed the Gracians in their passage of their Country, Xinob. Lik. 4and in the passing the Mountains thereof were spent seven days. With great Die of Mich. difficulty and danger having passed it, they went over the River Centritis into Armenia; of which Artabazus being then Governour, entred into league with them, and suffered them quietly to pass; but in travelling thorow the Mountains they were near all being overwhelmed in the Snow, the discerning of ways being taken away thereby. The whole Army had perished also by extream cold, had they not light upon some Villages near hand, wherein being furnished with plenty of necessaries, they refreshed themselves. The Houses stood within the Ground, into which the men descended by Stairs, and their Cattel by descents made for that purpose. Having here stayed eight days, they journeyed thence to the River Phasis.

46. Having continued four days at this River, they marched through the Country of the Tacchi and Phasiani, by whom being opposed, they fought and made great flaughter of them, and then feized upon their Villages, which were plentifully furnished with such things as they wanted, they there rested sifteen days. Thence marching through the Territories of the Chalcidensians, in seven encampings they came to the River Harpafus, and thence coming into the Plains of the Talcutini, they there refreshed themselves three days, and proceeding, in four encampings they arrived at a great City called Gymnasia. The Prince of this Countrey entring into a League with them, furnished them with Guides to the Sea, of which, after fifteen days being got up to the Hill Chenius, they got a fight a far of, at which the Front shouted so for joy, that those in the Rear thinking they had been fet upon by some Enemy, prepared themselves for a Fight, and there laid they a great heap of Stones as a Monument to Posterity, of the Spoils obtained from the Barbarians, and the immortal memory of their Ex-

Having got over their Mountains they came into the Territories of the Coleti, where a great multitude opposing them, they made no small slaughter of the Inhabitants, and made a great spoil, where they found a kind of Honey, of which who loever did eat, became according to the quantity eaten, drunken, mad, or as dead, but the next day at the same hour returned to their right Senses, and They came to after three or four days arose as having received some Medicine. Here they remained ten dayes, and taking a muster, found eight thousand fix hundred remaining of those that ascended with Cyrus into Persia, the rest being consumed by the Enemies hand, or Snow, or fickness. Here also they divided the money that arose out of the sail of Captives, the tenth part of which the Officers took into their hands, being severed as an offering to be made to Apollo and Diana of Ephelus; every one keeping and preferving a share for his gods.

48. From Cerasunt they came into the Country of the Mesynecans, the verieft Barbarians they had met with in the whole Journey, which they passed by force in eight encampings, and in three more that of the Tibarenes through which they came to Cotyora a Grecian Colony also of the Sinopeans. Thus far the Army marched one foot, the whole length of the retreat from the place of the battel in the Babylonian Territories hither, being a hundred twenty two encampings, fix hundred twenty parafangs, ten thousand eight hundred twenty furlongs, one thousand three hundred fifty two miles and something more. At Cotyora they continued fifty dayes, making encursions upon the neighbouring people of Paphlagonia. Then the Heracleans and Synopeans, a Colony of the Milesians in Paphlagonia, furnished them with shipping, into which they put themselves and their baggage, and sailed away, Cherilophus meet. Holding on their course they sailed by Falon's shore, Dioduns. where the Ship Argo is faid to have anchored, and by the mouths of the Rivers Thermodon, Halys, and Parthenius, by which after they had passed, they arrived at Heraclea a Gracian City and Colony of the Magaraans, fituate in the Territory of the Maryandens, and came to anchor near the Cherronejus or Peninfula of Acherousia, where Hercules is said to have fetcht the Dog Cerberus out of Hell; the marks being there shewn of his decent, and the depth of the place, being more than two furlongs.

49. Here the Souldiers, through the perswasion of Lycon an Achaian, making unreasonable demands of money from the Heracleans, they shut their gates upon them, and provided for their own defence, which bred a fedition in the Army, so that they parted afunder. The Arcadians and Acheans being more than four thousand five hundred all heavy armed, failed away first, having got shipping of the Heracleans, that falling suddainly upon the Bithynians. they might prevent the rest, and make the greatest prey. Cherisophus a little before chosen General, having one thousand three hundred armed, and seven hundred Peltasts, (who were the Thracians that followed Clearchus) marched on foot from Heraclea, and as foon as he entred Thrace, led along by the Seacoast being now sick, and presently dead of a Medicine he took in an Ague. Xenophon with one thousand seven hundred Armed, three hundred Peltasts. and forty Horse, taking shipping, landed in the confines of Thrace, and marched through the midst of the Land. With great difficulty passed they through the Country on foot, the Thracians of Afia and Bithynians, grievously afflicting them, till meeting together again, they refolved no more to part, and decreed it should be death for any one to move such a thing. Then came they fafe, though with great difficulty, to Chrysopolis a City in Chalcedonia, Kanapa. The Governours of the King's Provinces through which they journyed were Artymas of Lydia, Artacamas of Phrygia, Mithridates of Lycaonia and Cappadocia; of Cilicia Syenesis, of Phanicia, and Arabia Darnes, of Syria and Allyria Belesis, of Babylonia Raparas, of Media Arbacas, of the Phasians and Helperites Teribar . The Carduchans, Chalybes, Chaldaans, Macrons, Cholcans, Mosynacans, Coit. , and Tibarens, were free people, and under no man's subvinces at their jection. Paphlagonia, was ruled by Corylas, the Bithynians by Pharnabazus, the European Thracians by Seuthes. The total number of the Ascent and Defcent, was two hundred twelve encampings, one thousand one hundred fifty parasangs, thirty four thousand two hundred fifty five furlongs, four thousand two hundred eighty one miles and more. The time of the Afcent and Defcent one year and three monthes. Thus thefe Strangers wanting all things, ignorant of the Countries through which they paffed, over precipitous Mountains, straight and (almost) impassable wayes, notwithstanding the malice of Enemies, sharpness of air, and difficulty of the Soil, by the wonderful Providence of God, and fingular prudence of Xenophon, returned home into Sect. Greece, as we have it described by Xenophon himself, though the seven Books of this Expedition, notwithstanding the constant opinion of Antiquity, are adjudged by a late Learned Man (by reason of the disagreement of their manner of writing from his other works) from him, and are afcribed to Themistogenes the Syraculian, whom * elfewhere he mentioneth to have related these matters. 51. In this mean time whilft the Gracians were on their way homewards, Pa- Plutareh in ryfatis the Queen-mother of Persia greatly lamented the death of her Son Cyrus, Anaxure, and meditated nothing but revenge upon such as had been instruments in his death, whom one way or other getting into her Hands, she killed with most exquisite Torments. The Carian, who vaunted he, and no other, had killed him, being designed by Artaxerxes to be beheaded, because he robbed him of the glory of so valiant an action, she begged of the King, that she might have the punishing him, and so delivered him to those, who for ten days tormented him; then digher Son of rus. ged out his Eyes, and lastly made an end of him by powring melted Brass into his Ears. Mithridates guilty of the same Crime of Boasting, and thereby greatly incenfing the King, who would have had all men to believe that he alone in a fingle Duel had flain his Brother, was condemned to be put to death after an odd kind of Punishment full of Cruelty, then in use in Persia. The Malefactor was laid on his Eack between two hollow things, in form like to Boats, so fitted together that his Head, Hands, and Feet might lye out, and the rest of the Body be contained within. Being thus made fast Meat was given to him, and if he would not receive it, he was forced to eat by pricking of his Eyes; and when he did eat, instead of Drink, Honey and Milk mixed together were powred into him, being fo placed as ever to have his Eyes against the Sun. Hereby it came to pass, that his Face would be wholely covered with Flies; and doing that within the Engine, which a man needs must who keepeth constantly eating and drinking; from the putrefaction of the Excrements were Maggots and Worms bred, which creeping up into the Entrails fed upon the Body, so that the miserable man being dead, and the upper part of the Engine removed, they might fee the Flesh devoured, and Swarms of Filth flicking on the Carcale: After this manner was Mithridates by degrees exting. after seventeen days. 52. Being now in an appearance reconciled, and all old things forgotten, fo as they met and Supped together, the thence took occasion secretly to work her death. There was a Bird in Persia, called Rhyntaces, Morein pays filled with Fat. This, as Crefar wrote, the cut it in two with a Knife, where the pays filled with Fat. This, as Crefar wrote, the cut it in two with a Knife, where the control of the relating the clear half to her felf. in which being nothing superfluous or of excrement, all the inward parts were of the one fide was only poyloned, and then taking the clear half to her felf, she gave the other which the Poyson had toucht unto Statira, who suspecting nothing, for that the fee her eat her felf of the Bird before her, did eat it up. and died after great Convulsions and Torment. She suspected her before her death, and possessed the King with the matter, who knew sufficiently the cruel, and implacable disposition of his Mother. He presently with Tortures examined her neerest Servants, but she kept Gygis a woman who had been accessfary to the Fact, and would not give her up to him, till at length having notice that she should go out of the House by night, he surprized, and condemned her to dy the Deathdue to Poyloners by the Persian Law, which was, that the Head of the Malefactor being laid on a great Stone, with another it was broken and flatted. As for his Mother he hurt her not at all, either by word or deed, but she desiring to go to Babylon, he sent her, adding only this, that he would not see that City so long as she lived. This was the state of the Do-

mestick affairs of Artaxerxes.

53. After the overthrow of Cyrus, he fent down Tiffaphernes (not Pharna-Diodorus ad bazus, as is falfly written in Diodorus) to the Sea-Coasts to recover them into his power, the Governors of which fearing now to pay dearly for their compliance with Cyrus, fent to make their peace with this new General, and fought all wayes possible to be received into his favour. But Tamos a man of prime note amongst them, and Governour of Ionia, shipping his goods, and all his fons (except one, named Cyaos, who afterwards became Capt ain of the Kings forces) fayled for fear of Tissaphernes into Egypt to Psammitichus the King, hoping for former courtefies to be received; but he, without confideration of former benefits, to get his ships and money to himself, murdered his friend with his Children.

The Persian Empire.

In the mean time the Ionians fearing Tissaphernes, and desirous to enjoy their Manufild. liberty, fent to the Lacedemonians, now the cheifest State in Greece, desiring, his Japin. that being the Captains, and Protectors of all Greece, they would not neglect libesist. them Originally of the same stock, but endeavour that they might enjoy their liberty, retain their Lands, and not utterly be deftroyed, as danger feemed to threaten them from Tissaphernes, whom they had incensed by revolting from him to Cyrus. They, who were nothing contented with the doubling of their power by the accession of that of Athens lately subdued, but still according to the nature of men desiring more, began to cast in their heads how they might attain to the Empire of Asia, being also encouraged by the retreat of their Country-men, did not unwillingly receive the embaffy; but promissing them speedy releif, first sent to Tissaphernes, desiring him not to offer any violence to the Greek Towns, but he neglecting their Meffage, and falling upon Cume, in the Territories of which he did much harm, and took many prison ers, then they created Thymbro their Captain General against the King, giving him one thousand of their own Citizens, and order to take up as many from amongst their affociates as he should think convenient.

54. Thimbro then with these marched to Corinth, where making them up to the number of five thousand, besides three hundred Athenian horse, he thence tics, falleth on fayled to Ephelus. Having there out of the Affociates and others, raifed two thousand men more, he removed and fell upon Magnesia, a Town subject to Tissaphernes, which he took at the first onset, and presently after attempted Tralles, a Town of Ionia; but it being to no purpose, he retreated to Magnesia, which being Fortified with no Wall, fearing that Tiffaphernes might after his departure recover it, he removed it to an Hill hard by, named Thorax. Then invaded he, and harassed the Enemies country, but hearing that Tissaphernes was coming towards him with a great power of horse, he thought himfelf unable to graple with him, and therefore returned unto Ephefus. Not long after upon promise of pay he procured Xenophon his forces to joyn with him, with which then he took the field against Tiffaphernes, whereupon Pergamus yielded to him, together with Teuthrania, and Halysarnia Governed by Euryshenes and Procles, who were descended from Demaratus the Lacedamonian. Other Towns also were delivered up to him, and some he took by force. till at length he fate down before Larifa, called the Egyptian, which attempting for some time to no purpose, his Superiours at Lacedamon were nothing fatisfied with his management of the War, so that he received orders from the Ephori to leave Lariffa, and remove the Army into Caria. He obeyed, and when he was come on his way as far as Ephefus, Dercyllidas (a man fo famous for his rare invention and cunning, that he got the firname of Silyphus) being appointed his Successor, there met him, and discharged him of his employment. Returning home, he was accused by the Affociates for giving his Souldiers liberty to spoyl the friends and confederates of the State and for that was banished,

55. Dercyllidas taking the Army into his hands, and not ignorant how he init had to do with two Persian Lieutenants, Tissaphernes and Pharnabaeus, who Opimpos.a.2 feared and hated each other; lest he should be overmatched with both he refolved if he could to make peace with one of them. He had conceived fome distaste against the later for an affront he put upon him, when he formerly served under Lylander in Alia: wherefore he made peace with Tillaphernes upon certain conditions, and lead his Army into Eclis, without any hurt to the confederates in the way, which was under the Command of Pharnabazus, where taking nine Cities in eight dayes, and getting into his hands all the Citties of Troas, he confulted by what means he might fo quarter his Souldiers in Winter as not to be burthenforn to the Affociates as Thimbro was, and yet prevent Pharnaba-Sect. ens from troubling the Cities with the excursions of horse, of which he had good store. He sent then presently to Pharnabazus to offer either war, or peace, who making choice of a Truce, for that he stood in fear of Phrygia; which bordered upon Æolis, and where he had his feat, he thereupon lead his forces into Bithynia to Winter there; the other not being unwilling he should fo do, because the Bithynians were often troublesom to him.

The Persian Empire.

56 In the beginning of Spring Dercyllidas marching out of Bithynia came to Lampfacus, where he met with three Lacedemonians fent from the State to fignifie to him the Prorogation of his Command for another year, who also by order from the Ephori, rebuked the Souldiers for the injuries offered by them to the affociates in the time of Thimbro, and commended them for their great moderation last year, warning them for the time to come, to which one of the Officers answered (who had followed Cyrus) that the Souldiers were one and the same, but that the change of Generals produced a change in their behaviour. The messengers being departed out of Asia, he sent again to Pharnabazus, offering him either peace, or War, as before, who making the same choice, he out of hand passed over the Hellespont, and by the hands of his Souldiers, amongst whom the work was divided, fortified the Isthmus of the Cherrone fus of Thrace with a Wall, thereby to defend it from incursions of the Thracians, who now had fallen upon it, and whom to repell he was fent for. He fo incouraged the minds of the Souldiers by hope of reward, that the work being began in Spring was finished before Autumn, being thenceforth a great advantage to the inhabitants. After this he returned into Asia, where viliting the Cities he found that the Exiles of Chius having feized upon Atarna, there lurked, and lived upon such booty as they could make out of Ionia; wherefore he belieged the place, though ftrong, and well victualled, and after a fiege of eight months forcing them to yield, he committed the care of the Town to Draco a Pellenian, and returned unto Ephelus. 57. In the mean while Pharnabazus, after he had made Truce with him, went Diederus ibid.

up to the King, to whom he accused Tissaphernes, as not having repelled the Justin. ibid. Lacedemonians out of Asia, but suffered them there to continue at his loss and da- ticis or simage, alledging how unworthy a thing it was to fight more with money than crate in Eva-Arms, and to restrain an Enemy more with rewards than valour. He advil end of ad ed him to make ready a Fleet, and give the Command thereof to Conon the Athenian, a man of great experience in things that concerned War, who fince the disafter of his Country sojourned with Evagoras the King of Cyprus. Artaxerxes yielding, gave him five hundred Talents to provide flips; and Conon hoping by this means to do some special service for his Countrey, undertook the charge, but the Fleet being not yet ready, he fayled with fourty Phanician Vessels into Cilicia, there to set all things in order. About the same time the Ionians fent to Lacedamon to declare to that State, that if Caria were invaded in which Tiffaphernes his principal feat was, there might be hope that he would leave them to their Laws and Liberty. This fo wrought with the Spartans, that the Ephori thereupon sent order to Dercyllidas to lead his forces into that Countrey, and to Pharaces their Admiral to fayl thither with his Fleet.

58. Notwithstanding the secret accusations of Pharnabazus, yet still was Tif- xanoph. o Saphernes trusted by the King, and so far as with the Chief power in the War Diodorus at against the Gracians; in so much that Pharnabazus, though much against his sand will, was forced to come to him at fuch time as Dercyllidas invaded Caria. He first carried him thither, where taking what order their affairs required. and re-inforcing their Garrisons, they returned into Ionia, and Dercyllidas perceiving they had croffed the River Maander, after he had consulted with Pharaces the Admiral about the preservation of the Ionians at that time but naked of defence, he also passed the River after them. The Persian forces were in number twenty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse; Dercyllidas his whole Army amounted but to seven thousand, and though the Peloponnesians well enough behaved themselves, yet such as came from Priene and out of the Idnian Cities and Islands had lifted themselves under him, some of them throwing their Arms into the Corn (which grew plentifully by the River,) took them to their heels, and the rest sufficiently evidenced what they would do if they came to fight. Yet Tissaphernes having not forgot how such Greeks as followed Cyrus had put them to it, and judging all their Country men to be of the the same metal, would by no means hear of fighting, which Pharnabazus fore pressed him to; but sent to Dercyllidas, desiring to come to interview. After Hostages given and received on both sides, they met, and an accommodation was made on these terms : That the King should leave all the Greek Cities to their own liberty; that the Greekish Forces should all depart out of his dominions, with all Lacedamonian Governours from his Cities, and that a truce should be for so long a time, till both parties could hear from their Superiours, concerning their resolutions herein. Then marched away the Armies to their quarters, the Perhan to Tralles, and that of the Greeks to Lexcophrys.

59. Notwithstanding this truce entred into by these Captains, yet the rig. Maph. Halla. ging of a new Fleet went forwards in Phanicia, and nothing do we hear concern-thatch. ing the confirmation of the Treaty by the King. It hapning that one Herodas a Amilias Pro-Syracufan, living with a Sea-man in Phanicia, and taking notice how great distant in Acquite. ligence was used in preparing a Fleet, which he heard should be compleated to the number of three hundred Vessels, he took the first opportunity of a ship and failed into Greece, giving notice that fuch a Navy was providing by the King, and Tiffaphernes, though he knew not, as he faid, upon what defign. The Zacedamonians hereat startled, began to look about them, when Agesilans one of their Kings, through the perswasion of Lysander, offered himself to undertake an Expedition into Asia against the Persian, provided they would send with him thirty of his choosing, by whose advice he might manage affairs; give him two thousand men from home, and fix thousand more of the affociates. which being granted him, together with provisions for half a year, he failed with Lylander (who had procured himself to be one of the three hundred, hoping by this means to restore the Decembirates in the Asian Cities, which he having erected, the Ephori had again diffolved) unto Ephefus with fuch speed, that he landed his Forces before the Persian Lieutenants knew so much as of his coming, and thereby took them at unawares.

60. At Ephelus he railed new Forces to the number of four thouland, and in Assilia can increased his Army to ten thousand Foot and four hundred Horse, with which Little Ptal. he took the field, a great company of rascally men, not inferiour in number five cor, Notes. to the other, following the Campout of greediness for prey. Tiffaphernes fent to him to know the cause of his coming into Asa, to whom he answered, that it was to restore the Greek Cities to their liberty; to which the other replyed, desiring a cessation of Arms for so long a time, as he could send to the King, hoping to obtain from him that which he required. Agesilaus gave little credit to his bare word, thinking, as indeed it was, that he protracted onely the time; but swearing most folemnly, that without any deceit he would do what in him lay to procure a Peace, he also upon this condition sware to hold the Truce; but Tissaphernes having little regard of his oath, fent onely to the King for new forces to joyn with his old ones, which though Agesilane fufficiently knew, yet kept he his Faith inviolable in prefervation of the Truce; and when he denounced war against him, except he would forth-with quit Asia, he gave notice thereof joyfully to his Souldiers, and sent to the Ionians, Allians, and the Greeks living upon the Hellespont, to dispatch their supplies unto Ephesus. Contrary then to the expectation of Tissaphernes (who thought he would have made for Caria) he invaded Phrygia, where fetting upon the Cities at unawares, he got much booty, and without any loss came to the confines of Dafchylium, where his Forlorn-hope meeting with a Party of Horse belonging to Pharnabazus, were worsted, losing twelve Men. and two Horses, till he with the Infantry coming in to their relief, the Barbarians retired with the loss of one Man, and Agestlaus spending the greatest part of Summer in wasting Phrygia, marched back with his Army mightily inriched, and came back in Autumn unto Ephesus, where he took up his Winter quarters.

61. Whilest the Lacedemonians thus acted in Asa against Areaxer xes, that Diodorus ad they might strengthen their interest abroad, they fent to Nephereus the King of Olymp. 96. ann. 1 Egypt, which now for a good space had revolted from the Persian Empire, to procure him to joyn with them in the War, who fent them one hundred Gallies, and five hundred thousand measures of Wheat for a supplie, Pharax then with a Navie confifting of a hundred twenty Sail departing from Rhodes, failed to Caunus, where he fet upon Conon, who there had forty Ships lying at anchor; but Areaphernes and Pharnabazus coming in to the relief of the ships and Place with great Forces, he retired back to Rhodes, the Inhabitants of which not long after expelled his Fleet, and revolting to the Persians received Conon and his Navy. It hapned after this revolt, that those that brought the Corn from Leypt being ignorant of what had happened, thrust their ships into the Haven, which Conon and the Rhodians seizing upon, thereby well furnished the City. Afterwards came in to Conon ninety Gallies more: Ten from Cilicia, and the reft out of Phanicia, of which the petty King of Sidon had the charge. And here the fouldiers of Conon mutinied for want of pay, who therefore more earnestly cal- Jastin Lib. 6. led for their Arrears, because their service was the stricter under so great a Captain.

62. Agefilaus knowing that without Horse he could not well carry on the War, Plutarch. & in Champain places, in the Winter-time took order about it, permitting fuch Amilius Prorich men in the City as would not fight themselves, to furnish him with each bus at prins. of them an Horse and a Man in their stead. Then upon the approach of the Spring, drawing together all his Forces to Ephesus, he trained and exercised them in the management of Arms, that City ferving them as the shop of War, during these Exercises. When he had thus prepared their minds, and encouraged them by rewards, and otherwise, he gave out he would march streight into the most fortified places of the Enemies Country, further to exercise them for the Fight. Tiffaphernes thinking this rumor to be spread on purpose to deceive them, again marched into Caria, whither he thought indeed he meant to go; but Agesilans, as he said, invaded the Territories about Sardis, which wasting round about, on the fourth day his men stragling about for plunder, were fet upon by the Enemies Horse, which slew many of them. He going in to their relief, understanding the Persians had no Foot there, and considering how he had all things in a readiness, resolved to make something of it, so that falling on in good earnest, he got a considerable Victory near the River Pactolus, and plundering the enemies Camp, from what belonged to friend and foe, got booty worth above feventy talents, amongst which was Camels which he carried with him

63. Tissaphernes at the time of this engagement (if we may believe Xeno- Diodorus & phon, who accompanied Agesilaus in this Expedition, rather than Diodorus or Julia at farra. Paufanias) was at Sardis, and upon that account was accused by the Persians to in comme. have forfaken and betrayed them. About this time it happened that Conon the Admiral of the Persian Fleet, having to no purpose for a long time sollicited the King by letters, for money to pay his men, resolved now himself to go to him, Pharnabazus egging him on that he might accuse Tissaphernes of treachery. Leaving then his Fleet to the care of two Athenians, he came to Thapfacus in Syria, and passing down Euphrates unto Babylon, made supplication to Tithraustes, to whom he fignified that hee would speak with the King. But none being to be admitted to his presence, except he adored him, he transacted his business by Letters and Messengers, and prevailed to have Tissaphernes adjudged an Enemy, the Lacedamonians to be profecuted with War, and to chuse whom he pleased for the paying of Moneys; and with great Gifts returned he to the Sea, having Commission to charge the Phanicians, Cyprians, and other maritime Inhabitants, with long Ships, and having Pharnabacus for his Affociate, according to his defire, to provide a Navie for the defence of the Seas against the next Summer.

64. The accusations of Tissaphernes were so prosecuted by Parysatis who bore Zenoph. him mortal Hatred in the behalf of her Son Cyrus, that Artaxerxes made Tithraw prices. fee Captain General of the War in his stead, enjoyning him to make him away, Platmeb. in and granting Letters to all the Cities and Lieutenants to be obedient to him.

He gave him two Letters at parting, whereof the one was written to Tilspher-Palyenu Stranes, being a pretended Commission to him to have full and absolute Power in gem. lib. 7. the War: the other to Arieus Lieutenant of Lariffa, commanding him to affift Tithrauster in the apprehending of him. He delivered the Letter as foon as he came to Collosse in Phrygia, whither Ariaus procured Tissaphernes to come, as to advise together about the War, and as he was in the Bath having laid by his Scimiter, caused his Servants to take him, and sent him to Tithraustes, who carrying him as far as Celana cut off his head, which he conveyed to the King. Put to death. He fent it to his Mother, who greatly rejoyced at the fight, with her also the Gracian women who had loft their fons or husbands through his fraud; and the whole Nation in the death of their mortal Enemy.

65. Tithraustes now sent to Agestians to acquaint how the incendiary betwixt xanonin. the King and the Gracians was defervedly punished, so that his Master thought Hillen. 30. it reasonable that he would withdraw his Forces out of Asia, and the Greek Cities being left to their own laws, should pay their accustomed tribute to him. Sect. 2. State, whereupon they agreed that Tithraustes paying him thirty talents for the maintenance of his Army, he should depart into the parts subject to Pharnabazus, till Agessiao. fuch time as he understood the will of his Superiors. Then led he towards Paufan. in Phrygia, when in the way he met with an Order come from Lacedamon, whereby not only the power at Land, but over the Navy also was given unto him, over which he might make Admiral whomsoever he pleased. He then to gratise the Cities and those who at home studied to pleasure him, made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty Ships, over which he fet Pifander his Wives Brother, a man indeed greedy of honour, and of prompt boldness, but of little experience in fuch great concernments.

66. Tithraustus taking notice hereof, and how Agestlaus did not intend to quit Afia, but rather conceived great hopes of overthrowing the King, resolved there was no way to be taken but to find his Countrymen fuch work at home, that they must necessfarily recall him. To this purpose he sent one Timocrates Xunoph. ibid. a Rhodian into Greece, with Gold to the value of fifty Talents, to the intent that Platerch. in he might therewith corrupt the leading and principal Men of the feveral Cities, Anax, & Ageand engage them into a War with the Athenians against Lacedamon, which was Passan, ibid. accordingly brought about. Agefilaus in the mean time entring Phrygia, which was subject to Pharnabazus, about Autumn, spoiled the Country, and by fair or foul means took many Cities. Thence marched he into Paphlagonia, which he withdrew from the Obedience of the Persian, and received one thousand Horse and two thousand Foot from Cotys the King, and after this he went to Dascylium, where Pharnabazus his Palace was, and there, it being a place plentious of Provisions, he took up his Winter-quarters.

67. Whilft his Soldiers straggled abroad for Booty in great contempt of the Barbarians, Pharnabazus light on a party of Horse, and therefore slew one hundred. Three or four days after Herippidas (the principal of thirty Counfellors who accompanied Agestlans) having notice from Spithridates, that Pharnabazus lay incamped in a large Village named Cave, twenty Miles of, procured of Agefilaus four thousand Foot and as many Horse-men as he could perswade to accompany him, with which beginning his march as soon as it was dark, by break of Day he fell in upon the Enemies Camp, killing most of the Mylins who kept the Watch before it. Then the Persians fled; Pharnabazus fearing to be belieged, so that he wandred from place to place like the Scythian Nomades, and Herippidas got much rich Plunder, amongst which the costly Stuff of Pharnabazus, but feeking out too austerely all the concealed Prey, he took from Spithidrates and the Paphlagonians all they had gotten; with which difgrace being exceedingly affected, they went away by Night to Arieus lying at Sardis, who had formerly rebelled and waged War with Cyrus against the King. At this departure of Spithridates and Mega-bates his Son (who was most dear to him) Agessaus was so troubled, as also at that of the Paphlagonian Forces, that nothing more vexed him of all things that fell out in this Aliatick Expedition.

68. Afterwards Agesilaus and Pharnabazus met together to treat about a Plutarch in Peace by the procurement of Apollophanes of Cyzicus, who was guest unto Agostiao, them both. Pharnabazus professed that if he were not made General of the dita. War he would revolt from the King; but if he should be, he would carry nice it on against the other with all his might, and to his utmost ability. Agelilaus Xuno on the other fide promifed he would speedily depart out of his Territories, and as long as any other remained to make War upon, would fpare him and his Estate. Upon the approaching of Spring, he led down his Forces into the Plains of Thebes, where pitching his Tents near the Temple of Diana Aftyrina, he levied all the Forces he could; for he intended an Expedition into the upper Countries, being confident to turn all in his paffage from their Obedience to the King, his Fame being spread abroad far and near, having spent now two Years in the War. But the Gold fent into Greece the last year by Tithraustes, had by this time fo wrought upon the Humours of the feveral States there. that they conspired together in a great and dangerous War against the Lacedamonians, who thereupon sent to Agestlans, setting him a Day by which he must needs be at home with his Army for the preservation of his Country. It troubled him much to leave Asia, for the Conquest of which he was in so fair a way, vet he resolved to obey the call of his diffressed Conntry, seeing (as he himself expressfed in his answer to the Ephori) a General then truly and justly commandeth, when he obeyeth the Laws, and the Ephori or whatfoever Magistrates else are in the City.

At his departure he is reported to have faid, that the King expelled him Aliaby thirty thousand Archers, wittily intimating the same number of Darieks stamped with the Effiges of an Archer, whereby he had procured the conspiracy of the Gracian Cities against Lacedamon.

69. Having passed the Hellespont, and being come to Amphipolis, he received news of a Victory obtained by the Lacedamonians about Corinth, whereupon he dispatched Dercyllidas presently back into Asia, by these tidings to confirm the affociated Cities. In the mean time while he marched through Macedonia and Xinoph. ibid. Then the followers of Conon pursuing the Lacedemonians to the Continian obtaineth nent, took fifty Vessels, and five hundred Men, the most part swimming to shore a vident and faving themselves; and the rest of the Gallies with safety recovered Gni-giant the Later dus. By this Victory of Conon (who made use of the Kings Forces for the recovery of the Estate of his own Country) Athens and all Greece which heretofore were under the Lacedamonian Yoake, again recovered their liberty. Diodorus placeth it in the fecond year of the ninty fixth Olympiad, when Diophantus was Archon at Athens; but Lycias in the year following, being under the government of Eubulides, and the eleventh of Artaxerxes.

In the next Spring the two Persian Generals invaded the Maritime parts of Laconia, which after they had wasted as they might, and now were about to return, Co-non perswaded the other to let him have the Navy, with which he said he would fail to Athens, and there build up again the long Walls, and the Pireus or Haven, than which he affirmed nothing could happen more difference of the could happen more difference to the could happen more d greeable to the Lacedamonians. longer contend with him about the Greek Cities in Alia, thinking it fufficient, that the rest which were elsewhere situated might be left to their own Laws and liberty: he also laboured earnestly to render Conon suspected to the King, alleging, that at the King's cost he only promoted the Affairs of his own Country, feeking with his Forces to obtain as many Cities as he could for the Athenians. to whom under hand he went about to restore Lopia and Eolia also. This offer concerning the leaving of the Greek Cities to the King's disposal, so nearly concerned his affairs, that the other Ambassadors in no case admitting it, for private respects returned home, without any thing concluded of; and though Teribacus durst not without Commission joyn himself to the Lagedemonians, yet pave he privately Monies to Antaclidas to enable them to build a Electivherewithal to conftrain their adversaries to submit to accommodation, and laying hold of Conqui, nommitted him to custody, till fuch time as going himself to the King he might know his

71. Some have reported how Conon was carryed to the King, and by him put to Death, but others that he made an escape. Whilst Teribaxus was yet with Fauton, the King, he sent Struthus into Asia the less, to take care of the Sea-Coasts, Amil. Proban. who flewing himself very bitter against the Lacedamonians for the Evils which Distance the Provinces had suffered of Agesslaus, and savourable upon that account to the Opposit Athenians, the Spartans fent over Thymbro to make War upon him. The year after the Lacedamonians send- kinoph, at fayra, ing Ecdicus to the aid of the Exiles of Rhodes with eight Ships, difpatched away with him one Diphridas, with order to pass into Asa, there to gather up the remnant of the Forces, with which, and as many more as he could raife, he was to protect those Cities which had received Thymbro, and to grapple with Struthas. He acted accordingly, and so ordered his Affairs, that he proved hard enough for Struthas, and amongst other commendable actions took Prisoner Tigranes his Son in Law, as he was going with his Wife to Sardis, whom releafing for a great Ranfom, he feafonably made use of for the payment of his

72. Whilst these things passed betwixt Artaxerxes and the Common-wealth Diedorus ad re. of Sparta, he was also imployed about the affairs of Cyprus which he strove 2.01ym/. 97to get into his Hands. There was in that Island one Evagoras of great Birth Evagora. being descended from those who first built Salamine the Principal City therein) who being lately expelled through a Sedition, returned with a little Force of Auxiliaries, and expelling Abdemon the Tyrian, who then had the Power over the City, and a great Friend of the King of Persia, made himself King of Salamine, and within a short time growing very Rich, gathered Forces, and by the help of his Son Protagoras subdued almost the whole Island. But the Amathusians with the Solians and Citians stood out against him, and by their Ambasfadors follicited Artaxerxes for Aid, accusing Evagoras for the death of Agres, who had been Confederate with the King, and offering him their help for the possessing himself of the whole Island. He being jealous of the growth of Evagoras, and confidering how convenient this Island might be, by reason of its situation, for the promoting of his Affairs at Sea, by which especially Asia could be defended, refolved to affift them, and difmilfing the Ambaffadors to their content, gave order to the Cities upon the Sea-Coasts to build Ships with all speed, he himself travelling into the upper Provinces for the raising of a great Land Army.

73. Till he had composed matters with the Gracians, no considerable thing could he attempt upon Ciprus, and though they favoured the cause of Evagorus in opposition to him, yet their enmity one against another hindred that effect which their Union might have produced, to the great impairment of his Affairs. The Athenians lent ten Ships to the aid of Evagoras; but it happening that Te- xumbut fami. leurist being fent by the Lacedumonians at that time to fucceed Eedious in the Diodorus ad Fleet, and to defend their Interest in Afra, met with them, and intercepted them annun 2.0 all, whereby it happied that those who were Enemies to Artaxernes overthrew 15mp.98. those who went to make War against him. After this these two Commonwealths Platach is contending fore with each other at Sea to their mutal damage, at length Antal-Antarat. 'cides was lent by the Lacedemonians to the Government of the Fleet, because they knew him to be in great Grace with Teribazus. He coming to Ephefus, left Nicolorns his Lieutenant, and according to his private instructions went with Teribazus to Artaxerxes about a Peace, towards whom he fo behaved himself (to please him casting off the Spartan Gravity, and not refusing to dance before him) that the King, who before could not endure the Spartans, as counting them the most impudent of all men, imbraced him with singular Respect and Cour-

He concluded of a Peace with him for the Lucedemonian State, in case the Xeoph Hiller other Gracians would not confent to fuch overtures as the King made, and returned with Teribazus, who giving notice that all who could might accept of the Diodo us or Conditions which his Mafter proposed, they dispatched their several Deputies with to him. He shewing them the Kings Seals, opened the Letters wherein was contained, that Arthrer wes the King accounted it meet that the Cities in Alia, and,

Islands Clazomenz (fince joyned to the Continent) and Cyprus, should be under his Dominion: as for the other Greek Cities, both great and [mall, that they should be left to their own Liberty; except Lemnus, Imbrus, and Scyrus, which having been subject to the Athenians time out of mind, he thought it reasonable they should so continue. Those that should not receive this Peace, he with the rest who would embrace it, would projecute with War to his utmost Power, both at Sea and Land, The Ambassadors went home, and made report of what was proposed to the feveral Commonwealths, who grudged it much that the Cities of Alia. for whose Liberty Agesilaus had taken so much Pains, should be so unworthily again betrayed. But being necessitated to submit, they accepted of the Conditions; and the Peace was fworn to at length by all Greece, in the fecond Year of the ninty fixth Olympiad, and the eighteenth Year of Artaxerxes. A.M. 3618.

75. Artaxerxes being thus freed from this tedious Controversie with the Diodorns I. 16. Gracians, set himself to a preparation for the Wars of Cyprus, from which as ad Olymp. 98. yet he had been diverted. Evagoras by this time, through the affiftance of Chabrias, whom the Athenians had sent to his aid with eight hundred Peltasts, and ten Gallies, had brought under the whole Island, having got together also a most numerous Army, whilft the King was kept in play by the Gracians. For he entred into Society with Acoris King of Egypt, who furnished him with great store of Money, and Hecatomnus the Viceroy of Caria underhand supplied him with some for the hiring of forein Souldiers; and the King of Arabia with others, who bore no good Will to Artaxerxes, fent a great Power of Men. He had in a readiness ninty Gallies, whereof twenty lay at Tyre in Phanicia, which with other Cities he had got into his Hands, and the rest anchored readily furnished before Cyprus. The King gathered together both his Land and Sea Forces the former confifting of three hundred thousand men, and the latter of three hundred Gallies. Over his Land Army he appointed General Orontes his Son-in-laws and Teribazus Admiral of his Navy, who taking up their Forces out of Phocas and Cuma, marched down into Cilicia, whence paffing over into Cyprus with great Industry they began the War.

76. Evagoras having fix thousand Men of his own, many more Auxiliaries. and having hired a great Force of Strangers over and above, (Money being very plentiful with him) first with his Pinnaces well Armed set upon the Enemies Ships as they brought in Provisions, whereof some he took, others he funk, or chaced away. Hereby it came to pass, that no Commodities being imported into the Island, a great Dearth ensued in the Persian Camp; and hereby a Mutiny of the Souldiers, especially of the Mercenaries, who fell upon their Officers, and killed some of them. This put Glaus the Admiral upon a resolution to Sail with the whole Fleet into Cilicia, whence he brought sufficient supply; which Evagoras feeing, and confidering his Navy to be far inferiour to the Persian, he got ready other fixty Ships, and procuring fifty more from Acoris (who readily furnished him with all things necessary for the War) he made up his Fleet two hundred Sayl. Then exercised he his Men often to prepare them for a Fight, and that to the dory at oca against Evago terror of the Enemy who beheld it, and at length as the Persian Fleet sayled by Citium he fell upon it, taking some Vessels, and finking others, but the Admiral and other Commanders standing close to their Tackling, a sharp Conflict enfued, in which though Evagoras at the first prevailed, yet Glaus with all his Power. and with great earnestness and Valour grapling with him, he was at length after

77. The Persians after this Victory mustered all their Forces, both by Sea and Land at Citium, and presently both ways laid Siege to Salamine. Now Evagoras, though he had had the better of it formerly in some Sallies out upon the befiegers, cooled in his Courage after this Defeat. Though the Siege was very ftraight and preffing, yet resolving to continue the War, he left his Son Pythagoras for the defence of the City, with full Authority, and departed by Night with ten Gallies into Egypt, where he laboured hard with Acoris the King, to perfwade him to carry on the War with him, and that with all his Power. He granted Distance at him form Money; but for that he was discouraged by the late Defeat, nothing according to his Expectation, fo that returning, and finding the City very much straightned and himself destitute of Succour, he was forced to send about an accommodation: Teribazas offered his confent upon these Terms, that quitting all the Cities except Salamine, he should for that pay a yearly Tribute to the King, and be at his Command as a Servant to his Lord; which though hard, he confer-

Artaxerxes believing these things, wrote back to Orontes to arrest Teribazus, and send him presently unto him, who accordingly sent, earnestly defired to be brought to his Tryal, but being for the present committed to Prison, and the Kingemployed in the Cadustan War, his Judgment was ftill delayed. In the mean time Orontes being now General with full Power and Authority in Cyprus, finding that Evagoras with great Courage still held out, and that his own Souldiers taking ill the Imprisonment of Teribazus refufed to obey him, fent to Evagoras to treat of Peace, offering him the same Conditions he was formerly willing to admit of from Teribazus. He being thus delivered beyond Hope, concluded a Peace on these Ferms; to pay a yearly Tribute for the Kingdom of Salamine, and as King, to be obedient to the King of Persia. And thus the Cyprian War ended ten Years after the first preparation for it, and after it had been managed two Years. Then Teribazus under disgrace faved the King and his whole Army; for there being two Kings of the Cadustans, he himself went to one of them, and sent his Son to the other, each of them fignifying to him whom he went to, that his Colleague had fent about a Peace to Artaxerxes, having left him out, wherefore his advice was, that they should send with him Ambassadors to treat, and conclude a pacification first, which, being both deceived, they did, and a League was entred into by both apart. Then returned he homewards, and in the way, to give a good example to others, alighted from his Horse, and with Quiver and Target upon him travelled on Foot over the Mountains, and rough places, and coming at length to a place called the Kings Inn, compassed with pleasant Gardens and Groves, because of the extremity of Cold, he gave leave to the Souldiers to cut down the Cypresfes and other Trees, which because they out of modesty refused, he took an Axe, and himself cut down the most beautiful. But coming home, and upon sence of

into Society with the Lacedamonians, and the King of Egypt, whilest he was managing his Revolt, was flain by some that cunningly laid in wait for him. One Tachos undertook the carrying on of his delign, and fortifying himself with an Army, built a City in an high Rock upon the Sea, called Leuca, where was a Chapel dedicated to Apollo; but he dying a little after, great controversie happed about the place betwixt the Clazomenians and Cumaans (whereof the former obtained it) and thereby those Rebellions in Asia fell of themselves, and the Lacedemonians, thinking it best to intermeddle no more with Persian matters, gave their minds wholly to establish their Power in Greece, got into their Hands several Cities by one means or other, and not obscurely sought after the Empire of all Greece, contrary to the form of the League, made by the means of the Persian King at the procurement of Antalcidas, amongst all the Gracians, as Diodorus telleth us.

82. Acoris the King of Agypt, who of late had entred into Society with Gaus, Idim ad Olympi and before had given affiftance to Evagoras against Artaxerxes, as one who laid 1000 and 4. claim unto his Kingdom, to strengthen himself raised a great Army of Strangers, and for that he gave very good pay, and fought otherways to differve well of Military men, many Gracians gave their Names and lifted themselves in his Service. But wanting still fome famous and expert General, he procured Cha-Audit of Egypt brias the Athenian, a man of great Command and no lefs Valour; though withbrias the zineman, a manoi great Actaneries made Pharnabazus (now of late his himfelf against out the consent of the People. he said, by his Service to the Agyptian, alienated the Kings Affection from that State; and defired that they would fend Iphicrates to be a Captain in his Wars. The Athenians being desirous to have both the King and Pharnabazus their Friend, presently recalled Chabrias, and gave order to Iphicrates to affist the 83. he himself was Master of his Words, but the King of his Actions. The Grecians were again fallen into civil Diffentions, the former Peace being not long continued through the ambitious practices of the Lacedemonians; which Artax. erxes confidering, and how needful their help was to him in this Egyptian Expedition, he lent to mediate and take up their Differences, which they all liked well and accepted, except the Thebam. At length after three or four Years spent in preparation, the King's Forces were drawn down into Ace a Town of Syria, where being a general Muster, there were found two hundred thousand Barbarians, under the command of Pharnabazar, and twenty thousand Greeks under the Enfigns of the May amounted to the manber of three hundred Gallies, besides a great number of yellels of Burthen. In the beginning then of Summer they marched for Reper, the Fleet failing along the Coalts, and coming near the Mouths of Wile, found the Reyr tians furnished sufficiently for a War; warning enough having been given them by the delay of Pharnabazus, who (as other Persian Generals) having not the full disposal of things in his Power, was constrained to fend to the King, to know his Pleasure concerning particulars, whose answer not being quickly obtained at a great diffance, procured much flownels in all Expedi-

The Egyptians brought in three thousand Horse and Foot to the relief of it, and thereby enfued a most sharp encounter; but being at length overpow'red by the number of Persians which coming in continually to the Fight, encompassed them; a great flaughter was made of them, and many taken alive. The rest betaking themselves to the Fort, Iphicrates his men brake in with them, took it, and razing it, carried the Defendants away Prisoners.

The Persian Empire.

85. Iphicrates now understood by these Prisoners, that the Garrison was called out of Memphis the strongest City in Egypt; whereupon he advised Pharnabazus with all speed to Sail thither, before the Egyptians should have time to unite their Forces. Pharnabazus answered, he would first stay till all his Army arrived, by the which the taking of Memphis would be more easie; but the other replyed, that if he would but let him have all the Mercenaries in the Army, he would promife to reduce the City. Pharnabazus hereupon grew jealous of his Valour, and fearing he might thereby, with his Skill and Courage bring Agypt into Subjection, denyed him what he required; to which refusal he opposed this solemn Protestation, that if the Perfians should let slip out of their Hands this fair Opportunity, this Expedition through their Fault would prove fuccessless. Nothing being procured hereby but Hatred and ill Words, the Egyptians by the means of this delay reinforced the Garrison of Memphis, and with all their Forces came to the Fort which the Persians had demolished; where dividing their men into several parties, they fet upon the Enemy, and prevailed so much upon him, that making great flaughters, the Perfim Generals, having spent much time about the Place, and now the Nile swelling, and beginning to overflow all the Grounds about them; left they should feem to strive with Nature it self, resolved to retreat out of the Country: And this was the fruit of fo long a preparation, and so much Expence.

86. Being returned into Alia, the differences betwixt them brake out afresh; infomuch that Iphicrates fearing left he might be attached as Conon formerly had been, withdrew himself by Night, and returned to Athens. Thither Pharnabazus sent after him, to accuse him as guilty of the miscariage of the Expedition, to which the Athenians answered, that if they found him guilty, they would punish him; but within a while they gave him the command of their Fleet. This year Nicocles the Euniich flew Evagoras the King of Salamine, and feized on the Kingdom, according to Diodorus, who in no case is to be believed, as to the Author of the Paricide; for though it be confirmed by one (a) that he was killed by (3) Arithm. an Eunuch; yet it appeareth from another, that his name was Thrafydaus; feeing cap. 10. it is clear from Ifocrates, that Nitrocles (to whom he wrote one Oration; another (b) Theopen, concerning the Office of a King, he filled by his Name; and made a funeral one Biblioth, new. concerning Evagoras) was the very Son of Evagoras, and fucceeded him in the 176.

87. The hext Year, Artaxerxes understanding how Greece was shaken with Diedorns ad intestine Broiles, which he still looked upon as by it's help to recover Agypt, 01ymp, 102. fent to compole the difference amongst the several States. They all assented to his Offers, except the Thebans, who having a defign to be Mafters of all Baotia, would not enter with the rest into the League; which the Lacedemonians ill referring; and fulpecting their ambitious Practices for the dominion of all Greece, invaded them as the publick Enemies. Hereupon enfued a great and Orect, invated at Leidtra, in which the Thebane had the better, through the menh. Conduct of Epaminondes, who so abated the Strength of the Sparans, that they believe it to be the strength of the Sparans, that they believe it to be the strength of the Sparans of the strength of the Sparans fent Agefilans their King into Egypt, and Antaleidas to Artaxerxes, to defire Attaxerx a supply of Money. But the King, either because they sought to his Rebels the Agyptians, or upon some other account, flighted the Message, and rejected Antalcidas, in so much that returning home, when he found that he was laughed at by his Enemies, and fearing the feverity of the Ephori, he starved himfelf to death.

88. Yet ftill did the King endeavour to reconcile the Gracians, for that as X-nph. long as they exercifed mutual feud, the could not have any confiderable (uppl) Hallon the from them. This Year on the former message Philifeus of Abydus was fent to Olymp 102. them, who procured both the Thebans and their Affociares, and the Latedemonians and 4 to meet at Delphos; but the controversie resting about Messene, and the The-bans resusing to consent that it should be under the Lacedemonians; the Treatie had again the same success: which so offended Philiseas, that he left two thousand Soldiers he had hired to the Lacedamonians, and returned into Afia. The Thebans not long after having a Design to bring all Greece into subjection, and knowing their endeavours to be vain, except they made Artaxerxes their Friend, or at least induced him to stand neuter, resolved to send Ambassadors to him. Calling together then their Affociates, they pretended the thing to be necessary, because Euthycles the Lacedamonian was already there, and disparched away Pelopidas from themselves, Antiochus from the Arcadians, Archidamus for the Eleans, and another for the Argives, which being known at Athens, they also fent Timagoras and Leon from their State.

80. Pelopidas found the most favour at the King's Hands, pleading (and not Xenson, ibidfallely) that the Thebans had only affifted the Persians at Platas, and since that had never fought against that Kingdom; and that for this only cause were they invaded by the Lacedamonians, because they refused to follow Agesilaus against the King, having also prohibited him to Sacrifize at Aulis, where Agamemnon Sacrifized when he passed into Asia and took Troy. The late Victory of the Thebans at Luttra, and the Invasion of the Lacedamonians Territories, did not a little add to the efteem of Pelopidas, who to inhance the renown of his Country, fluck not also to aver, that the reason why the Argives and Arcadians had of late been overthrown by the Lacedemonians, was, because the Thebans were not at the Battel. He obtained of the King, that Messene being exempted from the jurisdiction of the Lacedemonians, should be left to its own Liberty, and that the Athenians should withdraw their Ships, or else War was to be made upon them, which being read to the publick Ministers of the other Republicks, Leon the Athenian o. penly faid, that the Athenians must find out another Friend besides the King, who replyed, that if they knew any more equal thing, they should acquaint him there-

90. With Pelopidas was joyned in Commission Ismenias the Theban, as we 14 datas. have it from Plutarch. He being brought by Tubraustes a Colonel into the & vide Alian. Kings Prefence, and commanded, according to the Cuftom, to adore him, took var. 1816. 1844. off his Ring fecretly from his Finger, and cast it down at his Feet, and then stooping down to take it up, as he thereby satisfied the King, and obtained his request; so he thought he provided sufficiently for the credit of himself and Country. Timagoras the Athenian communicated by Letter some Secrets to Artaxerxes, for which he was rewarded with one thouland Daricks, a costly Supper, and eighty Cows to find him with Milk for his Health; with a coffly Bed and Furniture to it, and some Persians that knew how to make it, the Greeks being accounted ignorant in these things. But returning home with the rest of the Ambassadors he was put to Death; either because he accepted of these Gifts, as Plutarch believed; or for that he adored the King after the Persian manner, wherewith they counted their whole State to be reflected on, or Pal. 91. After the return of the Ambassadors, the Thebans sent for the Deputies riem ibid, of the several Cities, whom, when the Letters from the King were read, they commanded, all that would be accounted his and their Friends, to fwear to the Contents of them. The Deputies answered, their Commissions were to hear, and not to take any Oath, which if they would exact from Cities, they must send to them. This they did, hoping that the particular States would not dare to refule the Society of the King and them; but the Messengers first coming to Corinth, and that City refusing to Swear, the rest followed their Example, and so this device of the Thebans came to nothing Then fell the Gracians into great Broyls again, making havock of the Territories, and Goods of one another, which Artaxerxes still looking upon as against his design for the recovery of Agypt, sent once more and procured a Peace betwixt them, whereby the Laconick, or Bacotian War (as it Disputs at was called) ended, after it had endured about five years from the first beginning, and a.s. 3. in the thirty ninth Year of Artaxerxes.

92. This Peace yet effected nothing on his behalf, the interests of the several States being at this time so contrary, that they presently after broke out afresh 104 and 01 mp. into civil Wars; and what Forces could be spared out of Greece, being not employed for, but against him. For, three or four Years after, the Maritime Parts of Asia revolted from him, and Tachos now King of Agypt made great Provision for the War, both by Land and Sea; and hiring many Soldiers out of

Sect. 3. feveral Republicks in Greece, drew also to his party the Lacedemonians, who had conceived displeasure against Artaxerxes, because he made Messene to be comprehended in the general Peace. At the same time had he then to deal with the Ægyptians, the Greek Cities in Alia, and the Lacedemonians; and besides them feveral of his Lieutenants in Afia revolted; amongst whom were Ariobarzanes of Phrygia (who had lately feized upon that Country after the Death of Mithridates) Maufolus of Caria, a powerful Prince, having many strong places, especially Halicarnassus, in his Power; with whom joyned Oronces of Mysia. Autophradates of Lydia, and of the Ionian Race, the Lycians, Pisidians, Pamphylians, Cilicians: and besides these the Syrians, Phanicians, and almost all that bounded upon the Sea. The General Command over all was given to Orontes. By this fo general a defection, half of the Tributes were withdrawn from the King; and the other half fufficed not for warlike preparations.

93. But Orontes having got the chief Command, and therewith received a years pay for twenty thousand men, betrayed those that had entrusted him with so great a Power. For, promiting himfelf no fmall matters from the King, he first fent up to him those that brought him the Money, and then betrayed many Towns, and a Band of Mercenaries to those who were fent from him for that purpose. At the same time things went in the same course in Cappadocia, accompanied with some memorable Circumstances. Artabazus the King's General invaded that Country with a numerous Army, and Datames the Governour thereof, who had revolted, meeting him with a great Party of Horfe, and twenty thousand Foot, pitched his Tents against him. The Captain of Datames his Horse was his Father in Law, who to ingratiate himself with the King, and to provide for his own fafety, having first agreed with Artabazus, by Night passed over with all his Troops unto him. But Datames not at all discouraged hereby, exhorted his Mercenaries to conftancy, and promifing them a large Donative, presently led them against the Revolters, whom he fell upon. just as they were joyning with the Enemy, and with great Violence made great flaughter of both. Artabazus being ignorant of the matter, suspected that the Revolters went about again to betray him, and return to Datames, and therefore gave order to his Souldiers to fall upon the Horse approaching; whence Mithrobarzanes (for fo was the Revolter called) being flut up in the midft, whilst one part laboured to repel the Traytor, and the other to be revenged upon him for his Treachery, was reduced into great Straights, and out of extreme despair made great Slaughter on both Sides, till at length having loft ten thoufand men, the rest were put to Flight by Datames, to whom some returned and asked Pardon; others betook themselves to a place, whence being not able to ffir they were killed, to the number of five thousand men.

94. Whilest these things were thus carried on, Rheomithres was fent into Egypt to Tachos for aid, from whom obtaining five hundred Talents, and fifty Gallies, he returned to Leuca, a Citie in Afra, where fending for many of the Officers of the Revolters he laid Hands on them all, and fent them up to the King, by which Treachery he reconciled himself unto him. Tachos by this time had prepared all things for the War, having obtained out of Greece two hundred Gallies, ten thousand most valiant Souldiers, and out of Egypt it self raised eighty thousand Foot. Agesilans the King of Lacedamon he also procured to come to Kingh. him, promising him the Command of all his Forces. Upon the report of his Platate. landing, all forts of Presents were dispatched to him; but the Courtiers finding bus in Applicano Train, nor any thing of State about him, only an old Man, little of Stature, not at all trimmed, but with coarse and old Cloathes, fitting on the Shore upon the Grafs, they greatly despised him, and were seized with wonder at his poorness of Spirit, when they beheld how amongst the Presents, taking the Meal, Calves, and Geese to himself, he gave the sweet Meats and Oyntments to be Tachos King of divided amongst the Slaves. And Tachos himself gave him not the chief Com-Egopt firength- mand according to his Promife, deriding him for the smallness of his Stature. and faying, that the Fable was fulfilled in him, the Mountains are in Travel, and a Moufe is brought forth; to which with Anger and Scorn he answered, that afterwards he should have cause to think him a Lyon.

95. With Tachos also was Chabrias the Athenian, though not fent from the Diol. & Pir-State as was Agefilaus, but on his own account, who advised him wanting Trea. tarch. fure, to command his richest fort of Subjects to furnish him with as much Money as they could spare, and he would repay them out of his yearly Tributes. which course he following got great store of Money, and yet injured no man.

To him he committed his Fleet, to Agefilaus the Conduct of the ten thousand mercenary Gracians, to Nectanebus his Son (or rather the Son of his Brother, or Sifter, being called his Nephew;) referring to himself the command over all; and though Agestians advised him rather to manage the War by his Lieutenants, Military against his Dignity and Disposition. Coming into Pharicia, the Country in Landschaush his of East. against the Crites in Spring, to whom came a mellage from the Viceroy of Egypt left there by Taebas, lightlying that he had revolted, and now invited him to feize upon the Kingdom; to which he confenting, drew prefently to his party, all the Officers by gifts, and the Souldiers by large Promifes. Tachos now being in fear of his own Servants, and Agefilaus whom he derided, betook himself to Si. don, and thence to Artaxerxes, by whom he was curteoufly entertained, though not declared General in the Egyptian War, (and so by the help of Agefilans recovered his Kingdom) as Diodorus writeth. 96. Another King besides these two was made by the Egyptians of Mendesium, Plutario, M. of whom ten thousand arose, and for him made War upon Nettanebus. The noph. Cornelius Case being such, Agestlaus took part with Nectanebus, whom he thought more ras at fard. to favour the Gracians, took the other Prisoner, and confirmed him in the Kingdom, who importuning him to ftay and winter with him, he refused, hasting homewards, for that he knew the Lacedamonian State to be at this time ingaged in a War, destitute of Treasure, and yet to keep Strangers in constant pay for want of their own men. Nectanebus when he would not stay, dismissed him with great Gifts and Honours, giving him two hundred and twenty, or two hundred and thirty Talents for the maintenance of the War at home, with which taking Ship, he fayled homewards, though in the midst of Winter; making hafte, left through his absence the State should do nothing the next Summer; but being carried by Tempest into a desert place, called the Haven of Menelaus, lying betwixt Cyrene and Egypt, he there fell fick and died. His Friends laying his Corps in Wax, for want of Honey, carried it to Lacedamon, where it was buried according to his worth and dignity. 97. About the time of his Death died also Artaxerxes the King of Persia, af- Plutares in

When he was grown old, perceiving his Sons to strive about the Succession, and especially Ochus (who although the youngest, hoped by the means of Atossa to procure the Kingdom of him) fearing left after his death he might do as his Uncle Cyrus had formerly done, contrary to the custom of Persia, which ordinarily admitted not of two Kings at the same time, he made Darius the eldest, now fifty years old, King, whilst he lived, lest his Death should involve the Empire in civil Broils. It was the falhion for him that was made King, to ask, and receive something at the hands of him that made him, according to which Darius asked Afpassa to Wife, which formerly having been Concubine to Cyrus, Artaxerxes took, and afterwards married. He out of Indulgence to him first granted his request, for that she being a free woman, and no Slave, might chuse whether she would have him, and hoping she would refuse; but she willingly accepting of the thing, and he then repenting of what he had rashly promised, consecrated her as a Nun to Diana, that she might live for the remainder of her days a fingle life. Darius hereby incensed, through the provocation of Tiribazus, (who bore Artaxerxes malice for defrauding him of his Daughter Amistris, whom he promised to him, but with his complices.

98. Darius being removed out of the way, Ochus was more inflamed with a defire of reigning, to which he was more incensed by Arolfs his Sister. But he feared two of his Brothers; Ariaspes legitimate, and the elder, and one Arsames, who though base born, and the younger, yet was much esteemed for his Wif-Ochus his wick. dom, and especially beloved by his Father. Both of them he resolved to destroy; the former by his cunning, and the latter by down right cruelty; for he hired fome who never ceased to tell Ariaspes, as a great Secret, that his Father was refolved to make him away by a cruel, and shameful Death, and so often inculcating it unto him asspeedily to be done, drove him to that fear and desperation

Sect. 4. that he poyfoned himfelf, Artaxerxes mourned for him, but knowing the kind of his death, and fuspecting the cause, yet through extreme Age was unable to fearch into the matter and find it out : only he imbraced Arlames more affectionatly than ever, and not obscurely fignified that he only could trust, and rely upon him. Ochus judging then that no delay was to be used, procured Harpates the Son of Teribazus (who fell in the Treason of Darius) to murder him. Artaxerxes was already fo spent with Age that he seemed to want but the least furtherance to his Death, so that word being brought him of the death of Afames, he was not able to bear it, but died Heart-broken with Sorrow, after he had lived ninty four Years, in the forty third of his Reign; in the third of the one hundred fourth Olympiaa. Chus Succeeded his Father, after whom he was also named Artaxerxes, Diodentis. and whose Name the Persians put upon his Successors for a memorial of his mild and prosperous Government. Some think him by the Persians to have been called Ochosueros, or Achosueros; and that he is Othus succeed to be taken for that Acheswerus, or Ahaswerus the Husband of Esther, mentioned in Scripture, who by the seventy, and Fosephus after them, is named Artaxerxes. Some have thought Cambyles to have been the Man, but he reigned 7.1cobus caponly feven Years, whereas above twelve are given to Abasuerus. Neither Pellus, alii. could Darius the Son of Hystalpes be he, if the Fews with others rightly accounted the Book of Esther to have been the last in Order of all the Canonical Scripture of the Old Testament, and for that Vastishis Wife is thought to be Atosfa, the Daughter of Cyrus, it cannot be, because he never put away Atossa, on whom he begat Xerxes, and although some plead hard for Xerxes because his Wife is called by Herodotus, Amestris, which they take in the Persian Tongue to be only Ham-Esther; yet 'tis apparent out of the same Author, that she was the Daughter of Otanes a Persian Satrapa, by Religion an Heathen, and of a most cruel Disposition. Besides, Abaluerus in the seventh Year of his Reign was at Sulban; but Xerxes in the feventh of his Reign was absent in the War with Greece, and though the Greeks corrupted forein Names, and might call Xerxes him, whom the Persians named Artach-fasta, or Artachas-ta, yet not one in his own Language called Achoschwerosch. Neither is it probable that Longimanus could be the man, who is both in Sacred, and prophane Story called Artach-sasta, and Artaxerxes, but no where Elther's Huf-Achasuerus. The same may be said of Nothus, who both by Nehemiah and Greek Writers is called Darius, and of Artaxerxes Mnemon, concerning whose Wife Statira, such things are written as can neither agree with Vashti nor Esther. Now if that of Esther be the last Canonical Book; and Nehemiah lived to the time of Darius Nothus, then is it probable, that Esther lived in the Reign of his Son, or Grand-fon, and cannot fo conveniently be affigned for a Wife to any as to

Yet a few Years after, when the Thebans were ingaged in the Phocian War, then ad O'yng. and reduced to extremity for want of Money, they fent to Artaxerxes Ochus, and 107, 277, 2 obtained of him three hundred Talents, which he granted as it feemeth to put an obligation upon them to affift him in the War, which he renewed against the

4. Although Egypt had long before this revolted from the Persian Empire, yet Ochus not at all affecting War had kept himself quiet; for, having sent some Armies thither, by the Treachery, or ignorance of their Captains, they mif-carried, fo that having feveral times badly fped, though despited on that account by the Egyptians, yet being a lover of his eale and quiet he submitted to the Disgrace. But now at this time (about the eleventh Year of his Reign) the Phanicians and Cyprians taking Heart, and rebelling also, he resolved to chastise them all with Arms, and that in his own Person; and making great Provifion of all things for the War, raifed three hundred thousand Foot, thirty thoufand Horse, and three hundred Gallies, besides Vessels of Burthen. The first Tempest of the War fell upon Phanicia, which revolted upon this Occasion. A famous Citie there was therein named Tripolis, confifting, according to it's Name, of three Cities distant a Furlong from each other, and inhabited by Tyrians, Sidonians, and Arcadians, in which the affembly General of the Phanicians met and resolved of their most important affairs. Herein the Persian Satrapaes and Ambassadors, behaving themselves very uncivilly, and abusing the Sidonians, they thereupon resolved to rebel, and perswading the other Phænicians to side with them for the obtaining of their Liberty, fent to Nectanebus King of Agypt to defire him to receive them into Confederacy against Ochus. Then to begin their Hostility they cut down the Paradise wherein the Kings of Persia, when they came that way, used to divert themselves; burnt the Hay which the Satrapaes had gathered for use in War, and punished such Officers as by whom they had been abused.

5. Ochus having notice of this, longed to be revenged of all the Phanicians, but especially of them of Sidon; and gathering his Forces together at Babylon, fet out thence against them. In the mean time whilst he was on his way, the President of Syria and Mazeus Governour of Cilicia, with joynt Forces fell upon the Phanicians; but Tennes King of Sidon, having received out of Egypt a Supply of four thousand Gracians, over which Mentor the Rhodian was General, with them and his Citizens together, fell upon the Satrapaes, worsted, and expelled them out of Phanicia. Whilst things were thus carried there; another War arose to the Persians out of Cyprus, wherein were nine Cities of good account, having the leffer Towns in their Subjection, and each of them a King; but all Subjects to the Persian, all which now, imitating the Phanicians, revolted. Ochus receiving tidings hereof, wrote to Adrieus Prince of Caria (who being newly come to the Government, was by the tenure of his Principallity a Friend and Associate in War to the Persian Empire) to provide Forces both for Sea and Land against them, who accordingly with great expedition making ready forty Gallies and eight thousand Mercenaries, sent them into Cyprus, under the conduct of Phocion, the Athenian, and Evagoras, who heretofore had held the Island as King. These two landing their Men, laid close Siege to Salamine both by Land and Sea, and the Island having been quiet of late, and for that reason abounding with Riches, great numbers slocked out of delire of Plunder from Syria and Cilicia, infomuch that the number of the Besiegers was doubled. Hereupon all the other Cities fubmitted themselves; only Protagoras held out still, and Evagoras thought by force to re-invest himself of that Kingdom, devolved upon him from his Ancestors: But at length Protagoras also fubmitting, obtained Salamine still; and Evagoras contented himself with a large Dominion given him in Asia, which ill governing, he fled again into Cyprus, and there taken was put to death.

6. The King was on his March towards Phanicia, when Mentor the Rhodi-Rhodian offer an understanding what strength he had, and how unable the Rebels were to eth to betray make resistance, sent one to him privately, offering to betray Sidon into his Hands, and to do him especial Service in the Conquest of Agypt, being very well skilled in that Country and the River. Ochus not only offered him indemnity, but a large reward, if he would perform what he promifed, and placing his greatest Felicity in the recovery of £gypt, sent to the chiefest of the Gracian States, to defire aid. The Athenians and Lacedamonians fignified their defire to retain Amity and a good Correspondence with him, but at present could yield him no affistance; but the Thebans sent him one thousand men, the Argives three thousand, and the Greeks in Asia willing to shew their readiness, furnished him with fix thousand. Before their arrival the King was got into Phanicia, and fate down not far from Sidon, which the Inhabitants had by this time strongly manned within, and fortified with a threefold large Ditch, and high Walls, befides a Fleet of one hundred Gallies. For they exceed ed by far all their Neighbours in Riches. 7. But Tennes their King had affociated himself with Mentor to betray the City, whom leaving therein with command of a Part thereof for the better carrying on of the Treachery, he himfelf with five hundred Soldiers went out, pretending to go to the publick convention of the Phanicians, having with him one hundred of the prime Citizens as his Counselors. These he brought straight of siden joyn- to Ochus, who put them all to death as Authors of the Rebellion, and after them eth with him, five hundred more, who came as Suppliants with Olives in their Hands, after deathby Ochus. he had understood from Tennes that the City should be surrendred to him without any Conditions, thereby to ftrike a Terror into the other Towns. After this, Tennes eafily prevailed with the mercenary Agyptians to let him and the King into the Town, which being done, and Ochus having it in his Power, judging him now to be of no use to him, he commanded him also to be slain. The Sidonians before the King approached had burnt all their Ships, left any private Person should convey himself away during the Siege. Now seeing themselves betrayed, and their City full of the Enemy which swarmed on every fide, they fet fire to their Houses, and therein burnt themselves with their Wives and Children, fo that (accounting Slaves) above forty thousand are thought to have perished in the Flames. The King fold the Rubbish thereof for many

Now the King divided the Gracian Forces into three ind. Bodies, and over each conftituted a Captain of their own Nation, and joyned a Persian with him: the other Forces he kept in his own Command, being greatly intent about the main buisness. On the other side Nettanebus was not a

But by his Conceitedness and want of Skill he miscarried, having formerly prospered whilst he used the Conduct of the Grecian Sect. Captains, but now his Fortune changing upon his fole managing the War, for which he thought himself sufficiently able. After then he had fortified his Garrisons, with thirty thousand Agyptians, five thousand Greeks, and half of the Africans, he seized upon such places, as were most advantagious for pasfage into the Country.

9. Things standing thus betwixt them, Nicostratus the Captain of the Argives getting some Egyptians for Guides, passed with the Fleet through a Ditch. and in a place fomething remote and out of fight landed his men, and pitched his Tents; which being known by the Garrison, a party iffued out, and fell upon them; but the Grecians after a sharp contest, slew their Captain, and of them about five thousand men. Nectanebus upon report made of this Defeat was greatly discouraged, fearing all the rest of the Persian Army might be easily transported, and suspecting lest the Enemy should bend his utmost strength a gainst Memphis the Metropolis, was especially concerned for it, and with that party which accompanied him returned thither. In the mean time Lacrates the Theban, General and principal of the Gracian Captains drained the Chanel by cutting a Ditch, and paffing over his Soldiers, raifed a Battery against Pelusum, by which the Walls being much broken, the defendants raised still Pallisadoes in the place, and the Gracians within stoutly defending the Fort, agreat Contest hapned for several days. But as soon as they heard of the Kings departure, they defired a Parley, and Lacrates interpoling an Oath, that upon yielding of the place, they should depart with such things as they brought out of Greece, they presently yielded. Then Artaxerxes sent Bagons an Eunuch of great authority with him, with a party of Barbarians to take possession of Pelufium, who meeting the Gracians took from them many things contrary to the agreement. This they received in great disdain, and called upon their Gods as Witnesses of the Oath, which to keep Lacrates fell upon the Barbarians, put them to flight with the loss of some, and defended his Country-men, for which being accused by Bagoas, the King defended what he had done, and punished the Authors of the Violence.

10. Pelusium being taken, the other Towns were easily reduced by this stratagem of Mentor the Rhodian, the third Captain of the Gracians. These places being held by Garrisons confisting of two forts of Nations, Gracians and Agyptians, he caused this Rumor to be spread abroad, that Artaxerxes had resolved to deal mildly with all those who should deliver up any Towns, but such as should withstand him, he would prosecute with as great severity as the Sidonians; and he gave in charge to the Sentinels to let as many Citizens go out as would. By this means this report was prefently spread all over Agypt, and thereupon mutinies followed betwixt the Strangers and Natives in every Garrison, each endeavouring first to betray their trust, and gain credit of the Conquerours by their speedy Treachery. Accordingly when Mentor and Bagoas laid Siege to Bubastis, the Layptians secretly sent to the latter to yield to him the Town upon fecurity of a free dismission. The Grecians suspecting the matter, pursued the Messenger, and getting from him the whole truth, in a great rage fell upon the Ægyptians, whereof some they slew, others they wounded, and drove the rest into a corner of the Town. The Egyptians fignified this to Bagons, and defired him with all speed to come and take possession of the Town, and in the mean time a Mesfenger was fent to Mentor from the Gracians, who advised them as foon as Bagoas should enter the Town to fall upon the Barbarians. As soon therefore as part of his Soldiers with him was entred, they shut the Gates, and killing all the Soldiers, took Bagoas himself Prisoner.

11. After the surrender of Bubastis, the other Cities made their Peace, but Nettanebus lying at Memphis, and feeing what Progress the Enemy made in his Conquest, would not Milanthus fil- endanger his personal safety for a Kingdom, but packing up all his Treasures got him away into Athiopia. After the death of E conliashib the Priest, his son Fohn succeeded him in his Office according to his birth-Affairs of Ju- right, who had a brother named Folbna. This Folbua being in great favour des in the time of Ochus, with Bagofes, the Kings General, had a promife from him that he should have the Priesthood, by which he was so heartned as to strive with Fohn in the Temple, and fo far provoked him as he flew him there. Bagofes hearing this, endeavoured to enter the Temple, and when he was forbidden asked if they counted him more impure than the Carkels that lay within, and getting in by force, took thence occasion to punish the Fews seven years for the death of Follows. For two Lambs being dayly offered in the constant sacrifices, he imposed upon every one a Tribute of fifty drachms, which amounted to the yearly rate of fixty Attick Talents. But if these things hapned in the time of this Artaxerxes, and he be taken for Ahafuerus, then must this murther have been committed towards the beginning of his reign, and this Tribnte of seven years been exacted before Mordecai the few came in favour, which was after the fall of Haman, in the twelfth year

The quarrels which hapned betwixt the Persians and Greeians had been many, and as many bickerings and contests in the field had ensued thereupon, wherein as the Greeks both at home and abroad had constantly frad Auccess agreeable to their dexterity, so each foil of the Persans gave as great a ftroak to their credit, informuch as they were flighted by the other, especially after the retreat of those that affifted Cyrus, who in despight of all Articories. could do, marched through the midft of his Territories as Conquerours, and having feen the great riches of those Countreys through which they passed, carried home a longing defire after them, and an indignation that fuch things should be enjoyed by those who seemed not in capacity to defend them.

20. The disadvantage of the Persians was the rising of the Kingdom of Macedonia, to that high pitch of greatness to which it had been of late advanced by the abilities of Philip the present King, who though he might have presended a cause where none was, yet there was some occasion of offence given him, though but counted a necessary allay to his rising fortune so terrible forthe Persian Empire: For when with great preparations he had besieged Persithus a Citie of Thrace, Ochus gave order to his Lieutenants to affift the belieged, which was so powerfully done, as his defign miscarried. Yet he having brought all the parties Greece to his beck, and established his interest sufficiently in Europe, resolved up-

Sect. 4. on Asia, and affembling the estates at Corinth, procured himself to be declared General of all Greece for the Persian War; for which he made mighty preparations, imposing a certain number of Souldiers upon every Citie. The next Spring he sent over as before him into Asia three Captains, Parmenio, Amyntas, and Attalus, under pretence of freeing the Greek Cities there, which hap-ned the fame year that Arfes died, and he lived himself not long after, being stabbed by one Paufanias, as he was solemnizing the nuptials of his daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus. Hereupon Darius, who before fludied how to turn the War into Macedonia, thought himself secure, defpifing the youth of Alexander his fon and Successor, who exceeded not the age

The Persian Empire.

21. But Alexander being a young man of a great and reftless spirit, and of wisdom and valour far above his age, overcame all difficulties both in Greece and Alia, which his Enemies had raifed (getting himself to be chosen in a little time General of the one, as his father had been, and in the other suppressing betimes the sedition of the Army of Artalus, by taking of him out the way) and most vehemently burnt with a desire of the Conquest of the Persian Em-Diodorus ad olymp. 111. pire; from an endeavour after which he might by no means be diverted. Having either by fair, or foul means fetled his matters in Europe, he paffed over in- Jufin. lib.11. to Asia two years after his fathers death, and landed at Troas with a Fleet of fix- Artistas lib. 1 ty long ships. He first cast a spear out upon the shore, and leaped out in a frisking manner, as taking possession of the Continent. Then presently he made a visit to the Tombs of Achilles and Ajax, to whom he made a parentation, and mustered the Army he had brought over with him. Concerning the number of Forces, those that were there present themselves have not agreed in their relation, but according to the greatest probability, there were of foot thirteen thoufand Macedonians, of the Affociates feven thousand, and five thousand Mercenaries, besides of Odrysa, Triballi, and Illyrians five thousand, and one thousand Archers, with fuch as fought with Darts. Of horse there were one thousand eight hundred Macedonians, one thousand eight hundred Thessalians, and of other Gracians six hundred, besides a Guard of nine hundred Thracians and Paonians. 22. Darius after he had heard how Alexander was declared General of Greece, Diodonas as and was much spoken of for his valour, shook off his former security and buckled ann.2. himself to preparation for resistance. He got together a considerable Navy, and raifed great Forces, for command of which he made choice of most expert Captains, and amongst the rest of Memnon the Rhodian, a man very excellent in Military matters, whom he fent into Phrygia with a band of five thousand Mercenaries to reduce Cyzicus to his obedience. He passed over the Hill Ida, and on a fudden fer upon the Citie, and had well-nigh taken it; but the Defendants making ftrong refiftance, he plundered the Territories adjacent, and then retreated with much booty. In the mean while Parmenio, one of the three Captains fent into Afia by Philip, and who food close to the interest of Alexander, took by from Strynium, a Town of Phrygia, and fold the inhabitants. From thence he went to Pitanes to attempt the fame upon it, but Memnon coming upon him struck such a terrour into his men that he was forced to raise his fiege. After this, Callas with a band of Macedonians and Mercenaries ingaged with the Persians in a battel at Tross; but being overmatched in numbers, he was worsted, and betook himself to Rhateum. These things fell out before the passage of Alexander into Alia:

23. After (a) Alexander was landed, the Persian Captains met to consult a- (a) Diedoral bout carrying on the War, whom Memnon advised by no means to hazard a 44 0.17 battel ; but to lay wast the Countrey before him, thereby to hinder his march any farther for want of necessaries, and then to pass all their Forces over into Macedonia, and so to transfer the seatof the War into Europe. This whole: for Councel was rejected as below the Persian courage, and a resolution taken to ingage, so that gathering their forces together they marched into Phrygia towards the Hellespont, and pitched their Tents upon the River Graniques (which runneth through the plains of Adraftea) intending it should be a desence to them. (b) Maximus 17. Alexander in his way thither passed by Lampsacus, the inhabitants of which eis and ther having already revolted to the Persian, or else suspected of such an intent Euro Extra Lating he resolved utterly to destroy. As he was thus minded Anaximenes an Historian of that place, well known formerly to his father, and also to him; prefented himself to him, to whom he swore in so many words, that he would not grant what he was about to ask, which the other readily apprehending defired of him that he would destroy Lampsacus, so that with his sharpness of wit Se.A. being circumvented, he was conftrained to spare it against his will.

24. Alexander having with great trouble and danger passed the River Granicus, then (a) ingaged with the Persians in a great and bloody battel, wherein much valour was shewn on both sides. Spithrobates, a Persian Satrapa of Ionia, and fon in Law to Darius, a man of a great courage, with a strong body of Horse fell upon the Macedonians, whom no one being able to sustain, Alexander himself grapled with him, a fierce combat ensued, he wounding the King, who yet at length flew him. But Rofaces his brother coming in upon Alexander, gave him fuch a blow upon the head as broke his helmet and lightly wounded him. and a fecond had killed him outright but that Clitus, Sirnamed Niger, a Macedonian, putting spurs to his Horse, in good time cut off the hand of the Barbarian. A great conflict then enfued betwixt the principal Persians and Macedonians, and many of the former loft their lives upon the place; amongst which of special note were Atyxes and Pharnaces, brother to the wife of Darius, and Mithrobarzanes Captain of the Cappadocians. These being flain, those that opposed Alexander began to flye, and afterwards all the rest; of the hundred thousand foot which the Persians brought into the field about ten thousand being slain, and of the twenty thousand Horse, two thousand. Of Alexander his Army one (b) reports nine Foot-men, and a hundred and twenty Horse-men to have fallen, but (c) another only thirty four in all, amongst which were nine Foot-men. The King by con- (c) Plutarchex fession of all deserved most commendation for his valour, and next to him dissolute the Thessalum Horsemen. (d) Arsites the Persian fled into Phrygia and lib. 1. there killed himself, because through his advice, he seemed to have been author of this overthrow. 25. Alexander after he had refreshed his Army, marched through Lydia, having Sardis delivered up to him, and came to Ephefus, where he diffolved Diodorus no

the Oligarchical form of Government, and fer up a Democratical one in its room, commanding the same to be done in all Greek Cities, which he otdered to be left to their own Laws. The Persians which escaped at Granicus were come to Miletus with Memnon the Rhodian, against which Citie he went and besieged it both by land and Sea, and by his Engines making great breaches in the walls, the Inhabitants yeilded themselves to his mercy, to whom he gave both life and freedom, but fuch Barharians as he took he either flew or scattered them up and down in the quality of slaves. A little after he dissolved his Fleet, confifting of a hundred and fixty Ships or more, only referving a certain number for the conveying of Engines and other instruments for a fiege. amongst which were twenty Auxiliary Vessels belonging to Athens.

26. Memnon, after the taking of Miletus, with the most considerable Persian Officers, and a multitude of Mercenaries, betook themselves to Halicarnassus, the greatest and most elegant Citie in Caria, which he took upon him to defend for the King, to whom he fent as Hostages his Wife and Children, and thereupon command was given to all the Maritime parts of Afia, to obey him as that liberty their Captain General in the War. Alexander in the mean time fent his Engines thither by water, together with provision for his Army, and marched himself by Land thitherwards with his whole Force, setting at liberty in his way all the Greek Cities, which he left to their own Laws, and freed from Tribute, professing that he undertook this Expedition for the freedom of the Greeks. In his way he was met by Ada the Queen of Caria, who after the death of her Husband Idriem, was deposed by her Brother Pexodarus. She delivered up Alinda, the strongest City in the countrey wherein she dwelt, into his hands, and imploring his help for the rocovery of the Kindom, adopted him for her fon. He despised it not, and left her the Government of Caria, over which he declared her Queen, by which courtese the Cities being overcome, sent him Crowns of gold, and delivered up themselves into his power.

27. Orontobates a Persian, Son in Law to Pexodarus, after his death kept post Arrianus fession of Halicarnsssus. With whom Memnon the Rhadian and other Persians, ursupra. after the taking of Miletus, joyned themselves. Alexander now belieged it, and with all his might endeavoured the taking of it by affault; but fuch was the pertinaciousness of the defendants, that they held him out, and making a fallie had given him a defeat, if the old Souldiers buckling their Arms to them had not come in in good time, and repulfed them with great flaughter: after which the Enemy forfook the City, and so he took it, and levelled it with the ground. The Castle he fortified with a wall, and a notable dirch, in

The Persian Empire. BOOK, II. which for the defence of Caria he left three thousand forein Foot, and two hundred Horse under the command of Ptolomy; and restored to his adoptive Mother Ada, the Principality of the Country. Thence he proceeded towards Lycia and Pamphylia, that reducing the Sea Coasts into his power, he might render the Enemies Navy unferviceable to him, which he in a good measure performed and came in the midst of Winter into Mylias a Region of Phrygia, where he entred into League with the Ambassadors sent to him from Phaselis, and the lower Lycia, who furrended all the Cities into his hands. Afterwards he went lib. 1. into Phaselis, where he stormed a Castle built by the Pissians, to infest the Country.

The treason of Alexander Lynceftes.

28. Whilft (a) he here remained, he understood of a plot against his life, by Alexander Aeropus, called also Lyncestes (from Lyncus a Town of Epirus, as it's probable) who was promifed by Darius the Kingdom of Macedonia, and a thousand talents of Gold besides, if he could any way procure his death. His Mother had by letters advised him to take heed of him, and the thing being confessed by Assines a Persian, whom Darius under a shew of a Message to the Governour of Phrygia, had fent to deal with him in this matter, he committed him to custody, not thinking it safe to put him to death, lest thereupon fome trouble should follow, in Macedonia. From Phaselus he marched to Perga on the shore of the Pamphylian Sea, concerning which many antient Historians reported, that it by an extraordinary providence gave way to him, and herein Fosephus hath rather been too credulous, whereas (b) at a low water (b) Strate the place used to be dry, and gave way to passengers; only Alexander hap-lib. 14. ning to come thither in Winter-feafon, and trufting all to the goodness of his Fortune, would march through before the water was fallen off, so that his men waded all the day in water up to the navel. (c) Subduing all in his passage, at length he came to the Lake of Ascania in Phrygia, and thence in five En-hid. campings to Celana, the Castle of which being held by the Satrapa of Phryeia, with a thousand Carians, and an hundred mercenary Gracians, after fixty dayes truce (in which they had in vain expected relief from Darius) was yielded unto him.

29. In Celana he left a Garrison of one thousand five hundred Souldiers, and de-Cutting like 3. claring Antigonus, Satrapa of Phrygia, went forward for Gordiam, having written arisans like. to Parmenio to meet him there with his Forces, who accordingly came; and there Plutarch in arrived also a supplie of one thousand six hundred and fifty men out of Greece. This Julia lib. 11. Gordium a City in Phrygia, had been the regal City of Midas the Son of Gordius King Curtius 1,4.62. of this Country (concerning whom notable Stories are related) and herein was a Temple of Fupiter, wherein Alexander heard that there was a yoak belonging to Gordius, the bands of which whofoever could untie, the Oracles promised him the Empire of all Asa, When he had taken the Town he came into the Temple, and asked for the yoak, which being brought to him, when he could not find the ends of the thongs which were hid among the knots, left his frustrate endeavour should be ominous, he cut them in pieces, with his sword, Diedorns, as and thereby either eluded or fulfilled the Oracle.

30. Darius this while fent a great fum of money to Memnon, whom he had and 4. declared General of all his Forces, wherewith he raifing many men all over where he came, and rigging a Navie of three hundred thips, betook himfelf feriously to his work. He presently reduced Chius, and failing to Lesbus easily took Antissa, Methymnus, Phyrrhus, and Eressus; but Lesbus and Mitylene more firongly fortified, with great loss of men. His name being blazed abroad by these actions, most of the Islands Cyclades sent their Ambassadors about a Peace, drians 1.2 and a rumour being spread that he intended to fall upon Euban, a great fear feized upon the Inhabitants thereof, and many of the Gracians who envied the Fortune of Alexander, began to take courage, and conceive new hopes, amongst which were the Lacedamonians, who alwaies had despised both his alliance and that with his Father. Thus prosperously succeeded Darius his affairs under the management of Memnon; but Providence having otherwise determined concerning his estate, Memnon died shortly after, and with him the King's success was even extinct. Hewas in good hope that the War would have been translated out of Alia into Europe, necessitating Alexander to return; but understanding of his death, he consulted with Friends whether he should manage the War by his Lieutenants,

31. The Persians perswaded him to march in the head of the Army, which Dieders isid. thereby would fight with more alacrity, but Charidemus, (or Endemus) an Athe-Contins like S. nian, a man much admired for valour and prudence (who by the command of Alexander being banished his Country, was come to the Persian Court) advised him not rashly to commit the Fortune of his Empire to the hazard of his own Sect. life, but keeping the chief Power in his own Hands to fend fome expert Lieutenant to the War. He told him that one hundred thousand men would be sufficient for this Enterprize; a third part of them being Grecians, with which he doubted not to engage to perfect what already was well begun by Memnon, The King at first gave ear to what he said; but the Persians obstinately oppofed it, and fo interpreted his words as if he affected the chief Command, for that end, that he might betray the Empire to the Macedonians. Hereat he grew angry, and in his Passion upbraided the Persians with Cowardise, which so far incenfed the King, before this exasperated against him, that his Anger overtopping his Reason, he cast a Belt about him after the Persian manner, and commanded him to be put to death, who foreseeing his Ruine, cried out as he was led away, that shortly he would repent it, and pay sufficiently for so unjust proceedings. After the cooling of his Passion he repented too late of his rashness, and considering the valour of the Lacedamonians, bethought himself what man of worth he might find fit to succeed Memnon; but finding none to whom he might commit fo great a Trust, was necessitated to expose himfelf to danger for the preservation of his Kingdom. Then raised he Forces in all places, which he commanded should meet at Babylon, where accordingly were found four hundred thousand Foot, and above one hundred thousand Horse, and with this number (taking his Mother, Wife, one Son of fix Years of age, and two Daughters marriageable along with him) he marched towards Cilicia.

32. Alexander in the mean while placed Satrapaes over Paphlagonia and Cap. Arrianus & padocia, which voluntarily yielded themselves, and hastned towards the Straights Gertins at of Cilicia called Pyla, which being quitted by those that were there placed to maintain them, he easily passed, and came to Tarsus, which Assause the Persun also forsook, and wasting Cilicia, to straighten the Macedonian Army of Provisions, fled amain to the King. Here Alexander fell sick of a Disease which (b) one wrote he got by too much Toil, (c) others affign no particular (b) Ariffolius. cause at all; but according to the general Tradition, (d) he contracted it by cast- (f) Diodovus. ing himself all hot and sweaty into the River Cydnus, whence such a cold sei-curius, zed upon his Nerves that he fell speechless, and so small hopes there were of re- Platrich. covery, that little probability was conceived of protracting the danger. But by Letters from Par-ant. menio he was lately advised to beware of him, as being corrupted by Darius for a great fum of Money to make him away. Yet he counting it fafer to commit himself to the doubtful fidelity of the man, than perish by a certain Disease, put himself into his Hands, and taking the Potion, gave him the Letters of Parmenio to read, fixing his eyes upon him as he drank, whom as he faw nothing troubled at the matter, he took more courage, and recovered the fourth day after.

thinking to prevent him, and feize upon Cilicia. But he fending Parmenio before this thid. to possess himself of the Pyla, or Straights that part Cilicia and Syria, followed from Tarsus and came to Anchiale built by Sardanapalus; and thence to Solor, where he placed a Garrison, and fined the Inhabitants two hundred Talents of Silver for their affection to the Persians. Hence he marched against the Cilicians, inhabiting the Mountains, which having brought under, he returned, and understanding how Ptolomy and Afander his Lieutenants had overthrown Orontobaces the Persian, who held the Castle of Halicarnassus, whereby the parts adjacent were reduced to obedience, upon this good news he facrifized to Afculapius, and restored the Democratical Government of the Solians. Then giving order to Philotas to lead about the Horse to the River Pyramus, he marched with the Foot by the Sea-Coasts, and came thither, whence he passed over to the Citie Mallos, where he had notice that Darius lay at Sochus, a place distant two days march from the Straights. From Mallos he paffed to the Citie Illus, which being forsaken by the Persians, Parmenio had seized on, and cleared the Passage thither, where he consulted whether he had better pass forwards, or there expect his supplies out of Macedonia. Parmenio perswaded him that no place could be more convenient for him to fight in than that straight one about Isus, because both their Armies would then be equal in effect, such narrow places being uncapable to receive a multitude. After three days he passed the Straights and came to Myriander, where much Rain falling held the Macedonians in their

34. Darius in the mean while by the perswasion of some Gracians about him, had made choice of the Plains of Syria, most capable to receive his Multitudes, and opportune for the Horse to charge in; and for some time here he continued; but Alexander delaying his march, he was perswaded by his Courtiers that he dared not to adventure any further, or look him in the Face, and because Winter approached he would lose no time, and therefore sending away his Money and Stuff of most value, with such Persons as were not fit for War, unto Damascus, he hasted into Cilicia, where he supposed Alexander to have possesfed himself of the difficult passages, as not daring to try battel in open Field. Supposing that he pretended Sickness, and hid himself in the Straights, he passed over the Mountain, and went to Issus, most imprudently passing by, and leaving him at his Back. Taking this place, and therein fuch of the Enemy as being fick and weak were there left, he cut off their Hands, and then fearing their Arms fent them away to tell their King what they had feen; for he thought now the Enemy to have left Iffus, and fled for fear of him, and for that reason hasted over the Hill Pinarus, thinking to fall upon him in the Rear. Alexander knowing for certain that he was paffed by, took thence occasion to encourage his Soldiers, who now could not be overmatched by Multitudes, and fending a party of Horse to view the Straights, returned thither by Night, and reposfelled himself of them. Then refreshing his men for the rest of the Night, he fet a strong Watch upon the Rock, and in the Morning went down into the path, and fet his Army in order for a Battel.

The Battel of Iffes.

35. This being done the Armies joyned ere long, and Alexander feeing where Darius was, made towards him, which when Oxyathres the Brother of Darius faw, to prevent him, he placed a Company of most valiant Horse-men before the Chariot, which cut off many of Alexander his men, who preffed forwards. But the Macedonians giving way to none in Valour, with great violence broke in amongst them, and then a mighty slaughter followed, and a great heap of Carkases lay before Darius his Charriot. Many of the most noble Captains amongst the Persians fell, some of the Macedonians, and Alexander himself received a wound in his Thigh. Darius his Chariot Horses being wounded with Spears began to fling, and threatned the overturning of him, when fearing he should be taken alive he leaped out, and mounting on Horse-back, he cast away his royal Apparel, and shifted for himself, after which his Cavalry was put to the rout and ran away. The Infantry discouraged herewith made no confiderable opposition, the great multitudes being unserviceable in so straight and precipitous a place, and being put to the rout fo hindred the flight, and trode one another down, that more damage accrued hence than from the meer strength of the Enemy. Of the Persian Horse Arrianus writeth ten thousand to have been flain, and of the Foot ninty thousand, with whom others consent as to the number of the Horse, but as to the Foot there is little agreement, some accounting more, and others less: forty thousand are reported to have been taken.

36. Of Alexander's men five hundred and four Curtius faith were wounded; thirty two Foot-men were flain, and of Horse-men one hundred and fifty, which fome reckon less by twenty, though another increaseth them to three hundred. Alexander following the Chace was forced to pass with his Phalange over the Enemies dead Bodies, and with one thousand Horse did great execution, but was not able to reach Darius, who rode upon a Mare that had a Fole left at home, and therefore ran with more speed, he being accustomed to have some kept for fuch necessities. His Tents were easily taken, and therein his Mother, Wife, Son, and two Daughters; but of Money not above thirty thousand Talents; the rest being sent before-hand to Damascus. The Women hearing that Alexander was returned with the Robe of Darius, made great lamentation, which he underfranding, fent Leonatus to them to put them out of fear as to his Death; to promife them the maintenance of their former dignity, and a Visit from him to be made the next morning. As foon as it was light, he went to them with Hephaltion his greatest Favourite, both whom when the Mother of Darius saw, and knew not which was the King, the made reverence to Hephaftion, as feeming to her from the worth of his Clothes to be the greater person, which when she understood to have been amiss, was troubled at it, and asked his pardon; to which he answered, smiling: Be not troubled Mother, for he also is Alexander. This Battel of Issus was fought in the Moneth Memalterion, Nicofratus (or Nicorates) being Archon at Ojpp, 111.

Of Coyn here was found two thousand and six hundred Talents besides five hundred pound weight of Bullion, and a World of other riches. Of men and women thirty thousand were alfo taken with feven thousand beasts that carried burthens. Then was Parmenio fent to seize upon the Persian Fleet, and others to take in the Cities of Syria, which upon the report of the fuccels of the battel at Iffus was eafily done, the Governours of Darius yielding themselves with their Treasures. whereof fome he received into friendship, and others he deprived of their principalities, as they had deserved of him. When he came to the Citie Marathon, he received Letters from Darius, wherein he defired the ranfom of his Wife. Mother, and Children, and offered other conditions of peace; but fuch as rather became a Conquerour, than one that had now been thrice shamefully beaten, not vouchfafing, in his direction to Alexander, the Title of King. He disdained his offers, justified his War from the invasion of Greece by the former Persian Kings, and the treachery of Darius himself, who hired one to murder him, as Philip his father had formerly been killed by fome fet on by them. He promised him his relations without Ransom, if he would come himself as a Suppliant for them, and fafe conduct, both knowing, as he faid, to overcome. and shew favour to the Conquered. And the next time he wrote he bad him remember that he did it not onely to a King, but to his own King and thence to Sidon, the inhabitants of which being fo hardly used formerly continuitibile. by Ochus, in hatred of the Persians sent for him. The King of Sidon was Justin lib. 11. one Strato, who being the son of Gerostratus the King of Aradus the Island, Governed it in his absence (he joyning his ships, as the rest of the Phanician Kings. to the fleet of Darius) and meeting Alexander as he came into Phanicia, put Diodorss ad a Golden Crown on his head, and gave up Aradus, and Marathus, a great Olymp. 111. and wealthy Town, standing upon the Continent over against it, with Marianne, and all that belonged unto them, into his hands. But now because he had done this rather for that the will of the people was fuch, than out of his own inclination, Alexander deprived him of his Kingdom, and permitted his beloved Hephestion to bestow it upon any of his friends. He chose to confer it upon a Sidonian by whom he was entertained; but he refused it, for that it was unlawfull for any but one of the Royal stock to possess it. He wondering at the greatness of his spirit, joyned with so much honesty, bid him choose any one of the Royal Race on whom to bestow it, who accordingly made choice of Abdalmon (or Abdalomnius) a poor Gardiner who wrought for his living, but of unblameable life, and descended of the Royal family. Alexander admitting of him, faid, the habit of his body could not hinder the nobleness of his stock, but desired to know with what patience he had endured fuch poverty, to whom he answered, That he wished he could as well bear a Kingdom, and that those his hands had satisfied his desire : whilest he had nothing, nothing was wanting to him. The King being much taken with his carriage, not onely gave him the houf-hold stuff of Strato, but most of the booty got from the Persians, subjected the Countrey adjacent unto his power, and afterwards also the Citie of Tyre, according to Diodorus.

39. Now was all Syria in the hands of the Macedonians, and whole Phanicia also except Tyre, which Citie was seated in an Island about half a mile di-cartius lib.4. frant from the Continent. As he marched thitherwards, the Tyrians fent him a Julia liber. Crown of Gold of great value, in a Congratulatory way, and a large quantity of provisions; which he received as from friends, and friendly fignified to the Olive, 112. Messengers his intention to go into their Citie, to pay some vows he had made ann.i. to Hercules. They told him there was a Temple of Hercules without the Citie, Platinch in in the place called Old Tyre, wherein his devotion would be most suitably performed, and so disswaded him from entrance, that he was inraged thereat, and threatned ruin to the Citie, telling them, that though they Arrianss lib.2. were confident in the strength of the place, and despised his Land Army, yet in short time he would make them find they were in the Continent. And in confidence that their Town, not onely fenced with high and strong Walls, but also with the Sea,

40. Alexander yet having not his Navy at hand, and forefeeing that a long fiege would be a great hindrance to his defigns, fent to them about an agreement; but contrary to the Law of Nations, they flew the Messengers, and cast them into the Sea, with which affront being much moved, he refolved to befiege them. Ere he could do this, such a quantity of earth or other matter was to be caft into the Sea, as to joyn the Island to the main land, which by reason of the depth of the water, and the force of the Current, was a task almost insuperable; but there being great store of stones and rubbish at hand in Old * Tyre, he * Paletrasi caused it to be utterly demolished, and by the hands of many thousands of his own men, and the people of the neighbouring places, fet upon the work. The Tyrians (whose King Azelmicus being absent with Darius his Admiral, had left them to the Government of his fon) hindred it all wayes possible, and when it was near concluded, a violent wind spoiled a great part of it, but to repair it he caused great Trees to be cut down in the Mountains, which together with the boughs cast in, and earth heaped upon them, resisted the violence of the waves, and at length by the great number of hands, and incredible industry, the Island became a Peninsula. But for all this, the Trrians having the command of the Sea, their City seemed yet to be impregnable, whereupon Alexander had thoughts of gathering together a Fleet, but in the mean time came in the Kings of Aradus and Byblus, who had withdrawn themselves with their Fleet from Autophradates the Persian Admiral, and with them the Sidonian Gallies. Befides these Vessels belonging to Phanicia (which were eighty in number) at the same time came ten from Rhodes, from Solos and Mallos three, and from Lycia ten, befides one great Gally from Macedonia. All these he pardoned, as having been necessitated to joyn with the Persians. And Azelmicus the King of Tyre now left Autophradates and came home; Arris-

41. From the Mountain Libanus was wood brought for the making of Fngines, Towers, and Ships, in which work whilst Alexander his men were imployed, some of the wild Arabians fell upon them, slew thirty, and took scarcely so many, He upon notice hereof left the charge of the Siege to Perdiccas, and Craterus, and speedily with a ready Band of men went into Arabia, where when they came to the mountainous parts of the Hill called Antilibanus, they left their Horses and marched on foot. When it grew night, and the Enemy, approached, though his men were before, yet would he not leave his School-mafter Lysimachus being weary and spent, but still drawing him on was parted from the Army, and forced with a few about him to pass the night in a dark and cold place. But seeing many fires to be kindled afar off by the Enemy, he being nimble of body ran to one of them, and killing two Barbarians that there fate, brought away a fire-flick burning to his Companions, who therewith kindled a great fire, and ftruck fuch a terror into the Arabians, as all that night they passed in quietness. Then partly by force and partly by agreement he reduced the Country into obedience, and in eleven dayes time returned to Sidon, where he found arrived out of Peleponnesus four thoufand Greekish Mercenaries, under the conduct of Alexander the Son of Polemocrates.

42. Having then got together a Navy of an hundred and ninety or two hundred thips, he fet fail from Sidon and came to Tyre, the Inhabitants whereof refused to fight by Sea, but yet abated none of their courage, though thirty Meffengers were come from Carthage to let them know, that that State being hindred by a domestick War, could not afford them any succour. They fent their wives and children thither to be out of the danger, being thereby the more willing to undergo any themselves, which they little regarded, making stout resistance, but at length the City was taken; one faith by treachery, another by a stratagem, but more by plain force; Mexander himself alone first going down from the wooden Tower he had reared, by a bridge laid upon the Wall. The Inhabitants, though the Enemy had entred, called one upon another, and fortifying the narrow passages stood out still, till the number of seven thousand (the most of those that fought)were flain. The Conquerour condemned the women and children that were found unto bondage, the young men to the number of two thousand he caused to be

Fifteen thousand the Sidonians saved upon the account of Kindred (they reckening both Tyre and Sidon to have been built by Agenor) from whom the City was again re-peopled, and to fuch as had fled to the Temple of Hercules, Alexander granted indemnity, amongst which the King and his Family were, with some Carthaginians which were come for the Honour of Hercules to the Metropolis. 43. During this Siege, the Officers of Darius which escaped from the Battel Deril st at Illus, with all those that followed them, and the youth of the Cappadocians, and Paphlagonians, attempted to recover Lydia; but Antigonus who there commanded for Alexander overthrew them thrice in several places. At the same time also Aristimenes, who was sent with some Ships by Darius to recover the Coast of Asa, lying upon the Hellespont, was wholly defeated by a Fleet of Macedonians which Alexander had fent for out of Greece.

44. Whilst Alexander lay before Tyre, another Ambassage came to him from Darius, who now offered him ten thousand Tallents as a Ransom for his Relations, and all Asia betwixt the Hellespont and the River Halys in Dower with his Daughter; which Conditions that he might incline him to receive, he fet before him the difficulties of passing into the eastern Countries, and laid the loss Darius lendeth new proposals of the last Battel to the straightness of the place: he sought to terrisse him by to Alexander, threatning to incompass him in the plain Countries, and bade him consider how impossible it was to pass the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with things of the like nature. The Proposals being brought before a select Committee of Alexander's Friends, Parmenio who was now old, and full of Riches and Honour, faid, that if he were Alexander, he would accept of them, to which the King answered, that so would he, if he were Parmenio. But he returned answer to Darius, that he offered him nothing but his own, and what Victory and his own Valour had possess him of; that he was to give Conditions and not to receive any, and that having paffed the Sea it felf, he disdained to think of relistance in transporting his Army over Rivers. As for his Daughter, he faid he would marry her, though without his confent, and if he would tafte of his humanity, he should come and refer himself to him. Darius having received this Answer, prepared himself anew for the War.

45. Tyre being taken, Alexander invaded Fudaa, resolving to bring all Pale. English in chronifine into subjection. At this time faddus was the High-Priest there, whose on Brother Manasses married Nicaso the Daughter of Sanballat, who had been sent Plin lib. 12. from Darius to govern Samaria, being both Sons to Fohn, called in Nehemiah, Josphus An-Fonathan, and Fohanan, who was Son to Fehoiada. Manasses thus matching tiquit tib. 11. himself, the People was displeased at it, and Faddus desired him to put cap. 8. away his Wife; not only the People but the Law fo requiring it. Hereupon he repaired to his Father in Law, and told him, that his Wife was dear unto him; but he must either part with her or his Priest-hood, who answered that he would fo bring it about, that he should not only be Priest, but an High-Priest also being minded to build for him upon Mount Gerizim near to Samaria a Temple like to that of Ferusalem, which thing he would obtain to be confirmed by Darius. Many betook themselves to Manasses, being allured with the Newness of the thing, and the liberality of Sanballat; but Alexander at that time passing the Hellespont the consultation thereupon was disturbed. After Darius was beaten and retired back into Persia, Sanballat revolted unto Alexander, and going over to him with eight thousand men, though now very old, desired of him leave to build this new defigned Temple, perswading him it would be for his interest, that thereby the Fews being divided amongst themselves, might be the less able to resist him. Alexander yielding to his request, he returned, and falling with great industry upon the work, he died not long after. 46. This was at fuch time as Alexander lay before Tyre, during which Siege, High-Priest of the lent round about to demand an Oath of Allegiance, and Assistance from the fing to break feveral Cities, and amongst the rest the Messengers came to Ferusalem, faddeus or Faddus the High-Priest answered, that he had entred by Oath into

The High-Priest and People then looked for nothing but Ruine, but he imploring the affiftance of God, was warned in a dream to go out and meet him, adorned with his Pontifical Vestments, with the Levites and People, as in a folemn Procession. Alexander meeting this long Train, lighted from his Horse, and adored the Priest, at which thing all the rest being amazed, Parmenio asked him the reason thereof, to whom he answered, that he worshipped not the Priest, but the God whom he served, for that whilst he was yet in Greece, and confulted about his Expedition into Asia, such an one appeared to him, advised him to it, and promised him success. Then going up to the City he ascended to the Temple, and sacrifized according to the directions of the Priest, who shewed him the Prophecy of Daniel, wherein was foretold, that a Gracian should obtain the Empire of the Persians. He accounting himself the man rejoyced thereat, and the next day offered to the People whatfoever they would ask of him, who requested that they might live after their own Laws and Customs, that on every seventh year in which they sowed not, they might pay no Tribute, and that fuch of their Country-men as inhabited Babylon and Media, might also be left to their own Laws, all which he readily granted them. He offered them also, if they would follow him, the freedom of the exercise of their Religion, whereupon many gave their Names to the Expedition; and then leading his Forces to the neighbouring Cities, he was friendly received by them.

47. The Samaritans met him in the way, desiring him to visit their City Sicima, (seated at the foot of the Hill Gerizim, and inhabited by the Runagates of the Fewilb Nation) to honour their Temple with his presence, and to remit to them also the tribute of every seventh year, they sowing not therein; for that they were Hebrews, though not Fews, as descended of fofeph and his two Sons Ephraim and Manassch, all which he referred to his return. By this contaction time his Officers had recovered several places that had revolted, as Callus, Paphlagonia; Antigonus, Lycaonia; and Balacrus, Miletus, after he had overthrown Idarnes the Captain of Darins. Cilicia he had committed to the care of Soscrates, and the Country about Tyre to Philotas the son of Parmenio, who had delivered his charge of Cebestia to Andromachus, that he might follow the Expedition. All the Towns of Palestine he had got now into his hands, except Gaza, which Batis the Eunuch resolved to hold out against him. This was a City distant from the Sea about two miles and an half, of difficult access by reafon of the depth of fand about it, the Sea near unto it being very muddy; it was large, feated upon an high Rock, and compaffed with a ftrong wall. Hither, having commanded Hephaftion to go before with the Fleet, he came, and fate down before it with all his Forces. 48. Having viewed the fituation of the City, he refolved that light kind of Distant, he earth to be fit for receiving of mines, which he commanded prefently to be attemporarian, at ted, and feeing that no wooden turrets could be erected by the walls because of print. the loosness of the fand, he made a great heap of earth and stones to be laid. which equalled the height of the walls, on which he planted his Engines for batterie. By the advice of Aristander his Prophet, he contained himself for a time without the reach of the Arrows, but the Arabians whom Batis the Governour (called Baberneses by Fosephus) had hired, iffuing forth set fire to the Engines. and beat away the Macedonians from the Mount, upon which he ran in with the Targetiers to the refcue, and kept his men from running, but he himself received a wound on his shoulder. Afterwards those Engines being come by water with which he had taken Tyre, he caused the whole City to be surrounded with mounts two furlongs broad, and two hundred and fifty foot high, whereby conflicting both with Engines above ground and below, at length after two moneths it was taken, the wall being broken by a Mine, at which breach the Macedonians entred. Alexander himself led in his men, and when his former wound was not vet quite cured, received a bruise on his thigh with a stone. The defendants stirred not from their places, but fighting to the last, were all slain to the number of ten thousand. The women and children the Conquerour made Slaves, and furnifhing the City with a new Colony gathered out of the places adjacent, used it as a Garrison in the War.

Then marched he strait for East, and the seventh day after his removal from Gaza arrived at that place, afterwards called Alexanders-Camp, and came to Pelusium. Here met him great multitudes of Egyptians, who being weary of the infolence and avarice of the Per-Gans, expected his coming, and gladly received him. Placing a Garrison in Pelesium, and commanding that the Ships should sayl up the River to Memphis, he having the Nile on his right hand, came, through the defart to Heliopolis, and thence croffing the River, unto Memphis, which when he approached, Mazaces the Persian Governour met him, and delivered into his hands eight hundred Talents, with all the royal houshold-stuff. Here he facrifized to all the Egyptian Gods, and celebrated Games, and then fayled down the River to the Sea : and when he came to Canopus fayled about the Lake Mareotis, betwixt which and the Egyptian Sea, he chose out a place whereon to build a City, which he would have

He himself designed in what place the Forum should be, and where the Temples that were to be Consecrated to the Egyptian and Grecian Gods, and herein used the skill of that noble Architect Dinocrates (called also Staficrates) who was imployed by the Ephelians, in restoring their Temple formerly confumed with fire. This (afterwards Famous) City was founded by Alexander in the fifth year of his Reign, and the first of the hundred and twelfth Olympiad, the four hundred and seventeenth of Nabonasar, from which year, the moneth Thoth, as also the fifth of Darius, the supputation of the years of Alexander is begun by Ptolomy the Mathematician, and a Native of this City, A. In the midst of his way he encountred Ambassadours, sent to him Olymp, 112. from the Cyreneans, who brought a Crown with other great gifts, amongst which ann. 2. were three hundred excellent horses trained up and taught for the War; which receiving in good part, he entred into confederacy with them. Two great dangers especially to be met with in this journey, viz. want of water in so dry a place, and of being overwhelmed by heaps of fand, which the South-wind threw upon fifty thousand of Cambyses his army, he escaped wonderfully by abundance of rain which is faid to have falln, wherby the way was made more firm and paffable; and

When he arrived at the Temple, the Prieft, either hired to it, or miffaking the Greek language as it is thought, faluted him by the name of Fupiter's fon. Hereupon he took the name upon him, and to his Mother Olympias as well as others wrote with that Title. She facetiously checked him for flandring, and bringing her in danger with funo, by making her an Whore to Jupiter. By the terrour hereof he hoped to do wonders with the Barbarians, and because Hammon was painted with the upper part like a Ram, and the nether like to a man, he also would appear to be horned, for which reason amongst the Arabians he obtained the name of Dulcarnain. When he received an answer satisfactory, as he pretended. he returned into Egypt the same way he came, or, as another wrote, by a more direct one towards Memphis.

He greatly defired to see not onely the remoter parts of Egypt, but Athiopia also: but the War depending yet with Davius, hindred him, and therefore disposing of Egypt, he removed in the Spring to Tyre in Phanicia. Over Egypt he lest Afchylus the Rhodian, Canting. and Peucestes the Macedonian, with four thousand Souldiers; and the care of the River Nile he committed to Polemon, with thirty Gallies. As for the Civil Government, he left it to Dolaspes the Egyptian, to rule according to the antient

53. Ere his departure, he understood of the death of Andromachus the Governour of Syria, whom the Samaritans had burnt alive. With all expedition he removed to revenge his death, but being on his way, the murderers were deremoved to revenge his death, but only saint of their deferts, and placed Memnon in his Room. Taking the City Samaria, he gave it to the Macedonians to Espirial inhabit, but the Country about it to the First, for their fidelity to him, with immunity from Tribute. Coming to Tyre, he celebrated Games, as he had July done at Memphis, and facrifized again to Hercules; and nominating feveral Governours over the places already Conquered, took his journey towards Euphrates.

34. Darius having understood of his design, to find him out whithersoever Arrianus, care he should go, gave out orders for all his Forces to meet at Babylon, where- time &c. of fome confifted of fuch Nations as rather feemed to fill up the names of men than to make refiftance. This Army being almost greater by the half than that which perished at Iffus, many Soldiers wanted Arms, which were fought for with all diligence. Some have reckoned one Million of Foot, and four hundred thoufand horse, besides two hundred Chariots, and fifteen Indian Elephants; whereas Alexander his Forces amounted but to Fourty thousand Foot, and seven thousand Horse. In the moneth Hecatombaon Alexander came to Thapfacus, where he found two bridges on the River Euphrates; but fuch as reached not quite over to the further side. Mazaus was sent thither to hinder his passage, with order also if Alexander pas- he could not do this, to spoyl, and destroy all things in his way; but upon his feth Earlington, approach he made hafte away, and Alexander then making up the bridges, transported over all his Forces, and so proceeding through Mesopotamia, having Euphrates and the Armenian Mountains on his left hand, made for Babylon, not the nearest way, but that which was more convenient for provision and moderation of heat. As he went forwards, he was given to understand by fome Scouts which he took, that the King had pitch't his Camp on the further fide of the River Tigris, with intentions to hinder his passage, but coming thither, he neither found him, nor any opposition at all. This River was fo fwift (being upon that account by the Persians called the Arrow) that by the violent force of its stream it drave many weighty stones before it, and those that lay in the bottom were made fo round, and well polished by continual rolling, that no man was able to fight on fo flippery a footing, fo that the Macedonian foot-men to wade the River, were forced to enterlace their Arms, thereby making one weighty body to refift the fury of the stream : fo deep the Channel was on the further fide, that to keep their Bowes from being wet, as also their Arrows, and Darts, they were inforced to lift them above their heads, fo that Darius might here have eafily refifted the Macedonians, and given a check to the fortune of the Conqueror, had not the fate of the dying Persian Empire besorted his mind, and deprived him even of all common

55. Having (though with great danger) paffed the River without any loß fave of a little of the Baggage, he led on through Affyria, having on the right hand the River Tigrir, and on the left the Gordian Mountains. On the fourth day after his passage Mazaus sent a party of one thousand horse to attaque him, which was easily repelled by the Paonian Captain Ariston, who slew their Captain, and bringing his head to Alexander, demanded a Cup of Gold as his fee, according to the cultom of their Country, to whom he replied, fmiling, That an empty one was due, but he would give him one full of good Liquor. Two days he here continued, giving orders for a march the next morning; but it hapned that in the first watch the Moon was eclipsed, and seemed of a bloudy colour, whereat (as all other common people long time after) the Macedonians, not know-

An Eclipse of ing the cause, were marvelously affrighted. They apprehended it as a certain Sect. the Moon diffroken or presage of their overthrow and destruction, and began to murmur, that for the ambition of one man that distained to own Philip has been been as a certain S would be called the fon of Fupiter, they should all perish, being forced to make War, not only against Worlds of Enemies, But against Rivers, Mountains, and the Heavens themselves. He knowing it to be dangerous to lead his Army to fight whilest it was possessed with matter of terrour, called the Egyptian Astrologers, to affure them that this Eclipse was rather a certain presage of good succels: and he made it out onely by this reason, that the Grecians were under the Aspect of the Sun, and the Persians of the Moon; and therefore the Moon failing and being thus darkned, the Persian glory was to be Eclipsed. Aristander the Southfayer affirmed the fame, promifed Alexander good fuccess, and affirmed a battel was to be fought in that same moneth, for the sacrifices portended victory. Hereby the Souldiers were fettled, and their courage redoubled, according to the great influence of superstition upon the common fort of

56. Thinking it wisdom to make use of the present disposition of their minds he marched thence, and proceeded, till he heard that Darius was not much aboye twenty miles distant from him, upon notice whereof he rested there his Army for four days. Here were intercepted Letters written by Darius to the Grecians, to perswade them to kill, or betray him, which by the advice of Parmenio he suppressed, and removing thence it hapned that Statira, the Wife and wife of Davius Sifter of Davius, through the tediousness of the journey, and grief, fell into untimely travel, and died; at which difafter Alexander shed tears, and spared no cost in solemnizing her Funerals, grieving that he was thus deprived of io fair an

nuch, flipped away, and carried the news of her death unto Darius. He fell of beating his head, and deplored the fortune of the Persians, which not only suffered the Queen to be taken Captive, but dying in that condition to want the Ornament of a Royal Funeral. Being fatisfied that there was no want of any fuch Ceremonies, or of tears from his Enemy to bedewher Hearfe, he fell into a jea- 17th Pint. in lous conceit that nothing but unchafte affections had drawn them from Alexander, site Alexander and lamented his Wife's condition, who had been subjected to the lustful power of the Conqueror. But being with much ado perfwaded of his continency, with hands lifted up to Heaven he prayed that he himself might be able to restore the fortune of the Persians to hisposterity as he found it, that so he might be in capacity to requite Alexander for his noble carriage towards his relations. But if the fatal time was come, and it so seemed good to Nemesis, and the vicissitude of worldly things, that the Persian Empire should receive its period; that none but Alexander might fit in the Throne of Cyrus. 57. He dispatched away to him then a another Embassy of ten of his principal friends, and offered him for his Mother, and two Daughters at Ranfom of thirty Julia Cartina thousand Talents, and in portion with his Daughter Statira all Asia, betwixt [1074]. the Hellespont and the River Euphrates. He answered, that sometimes he en-deavoured to corrupt his friends, and otherwhiles his Soldiers to destroy him, and that therefore he was to be profecuted not as a just and fair enemy, but as a pernicious murderer: that what he had already got, though now offered to him, was the reward of War, by which the bounds of both their Kingdoms should be limited, and that they should both abide by what the fortune of the next day should assign them. Darius had before this come to Arbela a City belonging to Babylon, where leaving the greatest part of his baggage, he went to the River Lyeus, over which laying a Bridge, he transported his Army in eight days, and proceeding ten miles pitcht his Camp upon the River Bumelus, near to a Village called Gaugamela, which in the Persian Language signified the house of a Camel; for that Darius the Son of Hystaspes gave this place strate lib. 16. to the maintenance of a certain Camel which had been tired in carrying his provisions through the Defarts of Scythia. This was a Champain Country round about him. 58. Understanding from his Ambassadors returning, that he must expect nothing but a battel, he fent Mazeus to defend a passage which he never yet dared four feizeth fo much as to hazard; the rest of the Army he caused to march above a mile farther on the Matte in battel-aray, and there to expect the Enemy. Camp which he left with an ordinary Guard, went forwards towards the Enemy, and in his march a pannick fear feized on his Army, by reason of the Lightning of the Heavens in the Summer-feafon, which they took as proceeding from some attempt of Darius; with some pains he undeceived them, and thought good to fortifie himfelf in the same place that night. Yet in the night he departed thence about the fecond watch, as thinking to fall on the Enemy by break of day. Upon his approach Mazaus with his Horse forsook an Hill which he had feized, and returned to Darius, and this place Alexander by the advice of Parmenio chose himself, as safer than the Plain, and from which one might take a full view of the Persian Army. Before the Fight his friends came Platario in to him and complained of the Soldiers, because in their conferences they had Apopulous. agreed to take all the profit of the plunder to themselves, without bringing any thing to his Treasury; whereat he smiled, and said, they told him good news concrning the discourses of such as were resolved to overcome, and not to slie. Alexander in the mean time whilft his Macedonians took their rest, was busie in his facrifice with Aristander. Parmenio and others would have had him fallen upon the Persians in the dead of the night, thereby to strike more terror into them; but he answered, them, that he would not steal Victory; which Darius was afraid of, and therefore contained his men in Arms all the night, which not a little injured his affairs the day following. All the night Alexander passed without rest, being careful for the main chance; but about the morning watch fell fo fast asleep, that it being full day he could hardly be awaked, and to his friends demanding the cause thereof he replyed, that now he was eafed by Darius of all his care, feeing he had gathered all his Forces into one place, and therefore in one day he hoped to put an end to his daily labours and danger. His whole force confifted of about feven thousand Horse, and fourty thousand Foot, over which his chiefest Captains were Parmenio, with Philotas and Nicanor his Sons, whereof this commanded the Foot-Regiment of the Argyrashides, or Silver-Shields; Canus, who commanded the Elimiots; Perdiccus Captain of the Oresta and Lyncesta; Meleager; Polysperchon; Hephestion Captain of his Life guard; Menidus; Philip the Son of Balaccus; Craterus; Erigyus the Mitylenean; Philip that headed the Theffalian Troops, and Clytus the black who lead the Kings Regiment. 60. Darius having marshalled his men according to their several Nations, took the command of the wing opposite to Alexander, and led on against him. After a found to the charge on both fides, and a great shout, the Armies met, and in the first place the scythed Chariots being driven with great fury upon the Macedonians, struck them with great consternation, for that Mazeus the General of the Horse following the Chariots close, made the charge the more terrible. But the Macedonian phalange, according to the King's order, beating their Targets with their Spears, made such a noise, that the Horles skared therewith bore backwards, and retreated for the most part; and though some went still forwards, yet the Macedonians parting afunder, made a lane and let them pass through, but with the loss of many whom the Scythes had caught. After the Arrows and Darts were spent, the Armies came to hand-strokes, wherein the Horse were first ingaged. Darius in the left wing was floutly defended by his followers, who fighting under his eye, laboured all they could with their multitudes to oppress the Macedonians. And Mazeus in the Right wing charging with great valour, at the first onset did great execution. Then fent he a Party of two thousand Caducians, and one thousand of the choicest Scythian Horse, to fall upon the Enemies Camp, where a great tumult following, fome of the captive women took their opportunity, and got away to their friends, but Sifygambis Mother to Darius refuled to stir, and kept her self quiet in the same place, not thinking it fit to trust her self to the doubtful fortune of an escape, or shew any ingrateful disrespect to Alexander: the Scythians plundered most of the baggage and departed.

60. In the mean while, part of the Horfe that fought about Darius, with their Soci multitudes preffed fore upon the Macedonians, and forced them back whereby the fecond time the Victory feemed to incline rowards the Perfant. Mean der feeing how he was concerned to relieve his men, broke our with his own Regiment upon Darius himself, and with a Dart flew his Chariot driver. The Courtiers hereupon crying out, thole that were further off improfed the King himfelf to have been flain, and therewith betook themselves to their Heels, which the next feeing fled also for company. The Ranks also about Darius began to he broken, till at length all one fide was bared, and then he accounted it time to fly, and therewithal fuch a Duft was raised, Alexander with his Troops gito my, and the the trace of tr Parmenio with the Theffalian Horse and others for a time sustained; but being put fore to it, he feat to Alexander for speedy relief. But he could not be found to that he was forced to tife his utmost skill in making the Thesalians endure the brunt; and at length put the Barbarians to flight, after they were dishearmed with the report of their Princes Fortune.

61. Darius with a few in his Company came to the River Lycus, which having passed, when some advised him to break down the Bridge, left the Enemy should make use thereof in the Pursuit, knowing that if he should do so, he must leave many thousands of his Men as a Prey to him, he answered, that he had rather give way to the purfuers, than take it from those that fled. Here Mexander immediately purfued him, but not being able to reach him, he returned, and fought a more sharp encounter than ever with some Parthians, Indians, and many of the valiantest of the Persians, wherein though he had the better, yet he loft Sixty of his followers, and Hephaftion with Canus and Mendas were wounded. 62. Darius fled from the River Lycus to Abela, where he arrived about midnight, and then concluding that Alexander would march to Babylon and Sula. resolved to see to the utmost Borders of his Kingdom, there to renew the War; and accordingly withdrew himself into Media, beyond the Mountains of Armenia. About midnight Alexander fet forwards for Arbela, hoping to take him there with all his Treasure; but arriving the next day, he found not him, but met with much Treasure, with his Bow and Target, Now feemed the Empire of the Persians to all men to be dissolved, and thereupon Mexander was declared King of Ma, and for joy thereof facrificed with great magnificence to his Gods, and beftowed Riches, Houles, and Countries upon his Friends. Foreseeing that the Air thereabouts, by reason of the corruption of the dead Bodies might be infectious, he removed with all speed from Arbela towards Babylon, being in his way met with Mazaus the Governour, who gave it up into his Hands, and Bagophanes the Keeper of the Caftle and the King's Treasures, lest he should be exceeded by Mazans, caused the way to be strowed with Flowers and Garlands, filver Alters heaped with Frankincense and other Odours being placed on both sides. The Towns men came also to meet him, whom he commanded to follow his Rear, and so entered the City and Palace in a Chariot, with his armed men about him. the Ferry, who alloat that time lived with Alexander, 63. He committed the charge of the Castle of Baylon to Agathon of Pydna, with a Garrison of seven hundred Macedonians, and three hundered Mercenaries, appointing Mazaus the Satrapa of the Country. To Apollodorus of Amphipotis, and Menetes of Pella, he affigned the Government of the Militia of the Satrapies of Babylon, and the other Countries as far as Cilicia, leaving them two thousand Foot, and ten hundred talents of Silver, to hire as many Soldiers as they could; and to Mithrinas who betrayed the Castle of Sardis unto him, he granted Armenia. Of the money which he found at Babylon, to every Macedonian Horse-man he gave seven Mine (each Attick Mina containing an hundred Drachmes, and about three Pound two Shillings fix Pence Sterling) and to every stranger five; to every Macedonian Foot-man two; and to every stranger two moneths pay, for a reward. Then set he forwards from Bablon, and in his way met with a supply of five hundred Horse, and six thousand Foot, fent out of Macedonia, with fix hundred Horse out of Thrace, and three thousand five hundred Foot; and out of Pelopomes four thousand Foot, and three hundred and eighty, (or according to Diadorus little less than one thousand) Horse. These were also accompanied with fifty of the Noblemen's Sons of Macedonia, for a Guard to the Kings person.

64. Drawing near to Susa, he met with the Son of the Satrapa thereof, sent unto him with a Messenger that brought Letters from Philoxenus, whom prefently after the Battle at Gangamela he had font thither. The Letters imported that the Susians had yielded their City to him, and that all the King's Treafure was fase for him, which Abulites the Sarrapa sent his Son also to signifie, either for that he thought to obtain favour, or as some thought, being underhand ordered by Darius to do fo; that Alexander being busied with such Booty, he might have time to confult the better for his own affairs. On the twentieth day after his departure from Babylon he arrived at Sufa, where he took possession of betwire fourty and fifty thousand (as is to be gathered from all Authors) Talents of Silver, besides Gold and Rich Furniture. Many things he there found, which Xerxes had brought out of Greece, and amongst the rest the brazen Statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, which he sent back unto A. thens. He left the Mother and Children of Darius at Susa, with Masters to teach them the Greek Tongue, and then committing the City to the care of Archelaus, the Castle to Xenophilus, the Treasury to Callicrates, and the Satrapy of the Countrey of Sufa to Abulites, in four encampings he came to the River Palitigris, being resolved to invade Persia.

65. Near to the Countrey of Sufa lieth that of the Uxians, running out into Diodorus. the Borders of Perfit, and leaving a straight passage betwixt it self and the Su- curtime. fian Dominions. The inhabitants of the low-land Countrey became without Platatete much ado subject to Alexander; but the other with some slaughter he forced to fubmit; and whereas they demanded money of him which they used to Polyansi. receive from the Kings of Persia for their passage, he imposed a Tribute of one Stratages. hundred Horses, five hundred Cattle, and thirty thousand Sheep yearly to be lib. 4paid; they living like Shepheards, and ufing no Money. After this he committed the Baggage, with the Theffalian Horse, the Mercenaries and Asfociates, with the rest of the Army that used heavy Armour, to Parmenio, to lead that way into Persia, that was passable with Carriages; and he himself taking the Macedonian Foot with the Horse of the Associates, and others, He is opposed with all fpeed marched a nearer one through the hilly Countrey. Being arathe straights rived at the Pyla, or Straights of Perla, he found Ariobarzanes, a Perlan of tenjaly A. Sattena feigrad thereof by which the pyland the pyland of the pyland the pyland of the pyland the

Satrapa, feized thereof, by whom he was repulled also with some disgrace and lofs, being forced to retreat four miles from the Straights; but at length being led by a Shepherd another difficult way, he came upon his Enemies on a fudden, and put them to flight. But Ariobarzanes in the midst of near forty Horse and five thousand Foot, with great Slaughters on both sides broke through the Army of the Macedonians, which on both fides had befet him, and made for Perfepolis. the chief City of that Country; but being thut out by those that kept it for the Conqueror, he turned again upon his Enemies, and with great valour renewing the Battel, perished with all his followers.

66. Having private notice from Tiridates the Eunuch, Keeper of the Treasure at Perlepolis, that they there had an intention to rifle it upon hearing of his coming, the cometh to he took the Horse, and all the Night marched thitherwards. Being a quarter of a mile from the Town, about eight hundred Gracians met him in manner of Suppliants, whom the former Persian Kings had reduced into bondage, and as a token of flavery cut off their Feet, Hands, Ears, or Nofes, and having marked them with fome Barbarian Letters, kept them as laughing flocks for derision. They belought Alexander, that as he had done by Greece, so he would also deliver them from the cruelty of their Enemies. He offered to fend them back; but they rather chose to receive some grounds to live on, than returning home, to carry greater disgrace than comfort to their Relations. To each of them he gave three thousand Drachms and ten Garments, with Cattel, Sheep, and Corn, for the stocking of their Grounds. The next day he called a meeting of his Officers, whom he told that there was no City more inveterate against the Gracians than that, which had been the Seat of the Persian Kings, and that therefore by the destruction of it they were to make a Parentation to their Ancestors. The Town, all besides the Palace, he allowed the Soldiers to plunder, who made a great flaughter of Captives, and got ineftimable Riches in that place, which heretofore of allthey had been most secure. Entring the Castle, he received the Treasure which there had been heaped up from the time of Cyrus the Great, containing a great quantity of Gold and Silver. Diodorus faith, he took thence one hundred and twenty Talents, Gold being reckoned at the reckoning of Silver, part of which he employed in the present service of the War, and the rest sent to Sula to be kept.

67. Leaving a Garrison in Persepolis, and a great part of the Army with the baggage there, with one thousand Horse and a party of Foot, he made an invasion into Persia. Much rain fell, and grievous Tempests ensued, but he persevered in his purpole, as also when they came to fuch places as were full of Snow and Ice; and though the Inhabitants fled from their Cottages to the Mountains. the transaction and killed his Stragglers, yet he brought them to submit; and laying wast the Territories of Persia, subdued also the Mardi, a Warlike Nation, differing much from the Customs of the other Persians; and on the thirtieth day returned to Persepolis. Then did he distribute Gifts to his Friends, making no spare of Treasure, and there he wintered four Months, rather enervating than refreshing his Army with the delicacies of the Place. For the Celebration of his Victories he offered magnificent Sacrifices, and Feafted his Friends Princely; and to the Feast admitted Courtisans. Amongst the rest, was Thair the Athenian, the Mistress of Ptolemy, the Son of Lagus. She gave out, that the King would Atchieve a most gallant Enterprize, if, in a Frollick, he would with them fet on fire the Pallace, and thereby, in one moment, overthrow the Glory of the Persians by the Hands of Women. This finding acceptance amongst the younger fort, now in the midst of their Cups, one amongst them. defired that they might Revenge the Injuries offered to the Temples of the Greeks with burning Fire-brands, which was seconded by others; but yet they faid, that fo great an Affair did only belong to Alexander. He being Frolickthe moved herewith, was led out by Theis in a Dance with the Minstrels, and she Palace of Pere receiving a Fire-Brand from him, first set it to the Pallace, after which all the rest followed; and so that Structure was reduced into Ashes. Thus was the Fury of Xerxes against Athens revenged by a Woman , and Native of that City, in the fame way, though accompanied with derifion. But Alexander afterward repented too late, alledging that he should more grievously have punished the Persians, by forcing them to behold him seated in the Pallace and

On this place Cyrus overthrew Aftyages the Mede in his last Battel, and thereby obtaining the Soveraignty of Afra, in memorial of it built this City, and a Palace, which being by Cartius named Perfagada, or Pafagada, fignifieth the Army of the Persians. of Echatane, there met him Bifthanes the Son of Ochus, who reigned before Darius. Arrianes. He cometh to He affured him that the King was gone thence five days before, having taken with him feven or eight thousand Talents, and being accompanied with an Army of fix thouland Foot and three thouland Horse.

69. Darius stayed at Echatane some time, to receive such of his Soldiers as had escaped the Battel; and for the furnishing of them with Arms. He raised did after the Forces in the Neighbouring Nations, and fent to the Satrapa of Bactria, and the battel of Gau- higher Countries to retain them in obedience. And he determined, if Alexander should stay about Babylon or Susa, to continue in Media in expectation of some better change of Fortune : But if he should pursue him, then to betake himself into Parthia, or as far as Bactria, and lay all the Country wast as far as he passed, to cut off provisions from the Pursuer. He sent therefore the Women with all his Furniture and Carriages to the Caspian Straights, and staved himself with such Forces as he had railed at Echatane, till such time as Alexander was within less than two hundred miles of him. Then thought he of Bactria; but fearing to be overtaken by Alexander (against whose celerity no carties lib. 5. distance seemed to be sufficient) he changed his purpose, and though he fled, yet prepared he himself rather for a Fight than Flight. His Army consisted now (according to Curtius) of thirty thousand Foot (whereof four thousand were Gracians, commanded by Patron, (a man for his constant Fidelity to Darins, never enough to be commended) and three thousand three hundred Bactian Horse, under the Command of Bellus the Satrapa of the Country.

70. Alexander being come to Echatane, sent back towards the Sea the Thessalian Horse, and other Associates, bestowing on them, besides their full pay, two thousand Talents. To Parmenio he gave in charge to bring all the Treasure out of Persia into Echatane, to be committed to the trust of Harpalus, whom he left with a Garrison of fix thousand Macedonians, besides some Horse, and of the Associates; and then afterwards he ordered him to march through the Country of the Gadulians into Hyrcania. Clitus he Commanded to go with his own Regiment into Parthia, whither he himself intended to come; but now with a select party, with incredible speed pursued Darius, and in eleven Encampings came to Rhage. Here feeing no hope ever to reach him (who before this had passed the Caspian Streights) he stayed five days, and then marched for Parthia, and on the first day pitched his Camp by the Straights, and on the next having entred them, news was brought to him concerning the Captivity of Durius. 71. For, Bessus the Satrapa of Battria, and Nabarzanes a Colonel of Horse. though his own Servants, rebelled against him, and drawing their Men to their party, caused him to be bound, with an intention if Alexander should overtake them, to curry favour with him by the delivery of fuch a Priforer into his hands; Eiffer and others bind Dat but if they should escape, then to kill him, seifer upon his Kingdom, and renew the War. They feized on his money and fruff, and taking into their fociety Brazus, or Barzaentes, the Satrapa of the Arachati and Drangi, led him away Captive in a Chariot, bound in Golden Fetters, as befeemed to great a King; but ver, left he should be known, they covered the Chariot with bale Skins, and unknown Men drove it, his Keepers following aloof off, left he should be difcovered to any that asked of him. The Persians having none now to follow, joyned themselves to the Battrians, and with the rest owned Besses for their General. But Artabazus with his Sons and Soldiers, as also the Greeks (whose Captain was Patron) separated themselves from them, and taking another way towards the Mountains out of the high Road, departed, and went into Parthiene.

72. Upon notice of this Confpiracy, Alexander concluded that more hafte was to be used, and therefore taking along with him a party sit for such Expedition, he left the rest of the Army to Craterus to come after with more leifure; and travelling all that Night, and the next day till Noon, gave his men a little time to rest, and then again setting forward, came the next morning to that place where Sect. 4 rett, and then again marching fait that night, and the day following until noon, he came to the place where Bellus laid hands on Darius, as *one telleth us; but * cartiss. as * another, where they that conducted him had rested the day before. Here he * Arrians. met with Melon, Darius his Interpreter, who being fick and not able to follow, now counterfeited himself a Fugitive, and fully acquainted Alexander with the King's Condition. He hereby was further quickened up to use all expedition, but his men spent with continual travel must needs have rest, and therefore he made five hundred Horsemen to dismount, and the Officers of Foot, and others most valiant amongst them to take their Horses, being arrived as before, that so they might be both Horse and Footmen as need should require.

73. Whilft he was thus busied, Orfillos and Mishracenes, two Persians who detelted the Parricide of Bessus, came back from him, and acquainted Mexander that he was five hundred Furlongs off, but that they could lead him a nearer way, whereby he might foon overtake him. With this Conduct he began his Journey that Night, and being come three hundred Furlongs, Encountred Brocubelus (or Antibelus) the Governor once of Syria under Darius, who told him that Bellus was but two hundred Furlongs off; that as he thought he made for Hyrcania, and marched And upon 4- out of order as fearing no danger, and therefore might eafily be surprised. He hearth are then continued his industry to overtake him, but he and his Complices had notice of his approach, and coming to Darius, bad him mount on Horseback, and mortally withdraw himfelf by flight from the Enemy. He refusing to do this, Satibarzanes and Barzaentes threw darts upon him, and leaving him mortally wounded, wounded also the Horses that drew him, left they should follow far; and killed two Slaves which accompanied him, having none now to follow him but a Dog which he had brought up. cania, and Beffus with a few Horsemen in his Company kept on the way for Bactria. The rest of their men stragled as they were led either by hope or fear, sive hundred Horsemen imbodied themselves, not knowing whether to slee, or to receive and fight the pursuing Enemies.

74. But Alexander having notice of the fear and anxiety of the Enemy, fent Nicanor with part of the Horse on before to restrain their slight, he with the rest sollowing after; and when they were come up, so little courage appeared in the Perfians, that though they relifted, yet three thousand were presently slain, and the rest straggled about like Sheep, Alexander giving command then to his Soldiers to abstain from llaughters. Now appeared an incredible thing, more Prisoners than they that took them, whilst the Conquered were so stupisied, that they neither confidered their own multitude, nor the finall number of their Enemies. In the mean while, the Beafts that drew Darius having none to drive them, wandred out of the way for half a mile, and being wearied both by their wounds and hear, flood still in a certain Valley. Not far of was a Spring, to which Polystratus a Macedonian being directed, came almost spent with thirst, and whilst he was drinking using onco-verd by Poly. fflicking in their fides, and drawing near to confider of the matter, found Darius in flows. the Chariot forely wounded but yet breaching. water in his Helmet, he espied the Horses fainting away, by reason of the darts

He prayed him to carry his thanks to Alexander, for his great humanity and courtefie towards his Relations. As for himfelf, he defired rather a feemly than noble Burial, but bad him put him in mind how dangerous it would be to all Princest o fuffer his death to go unpunished. He wished him the Empire of the whole World, and gave his hand to Polystratus as though to be presented to Alexander; after which, wishing him a reward, for his kindness, from the Gods: he expired.

At Arbela (or Gaugamela) losing a mighty Army consisting of all forts of people, he difgracefully was forced to flee; then driven from his Kingdom, wandring up and down and wanting due Accommodations, at last he was betrayed by his own Servants, and at the same time both a King and a Captive was ignominiously bound in Fetters, and perished by the treachery of those, from whom he should have expected safety, as Arrianus writeth. This happened in the year that Aristophontes was Archon at Athens, in the Month Hecatombaon, when he had lived about fifty years, in the feventh year of his Reign, and the two hundred and third of this Empire, in the third year of the hundred and twelfth Olympiad, A. M. 3675. three hundred and twenty eight years before the ordinary Ara of Christ.

76. We have feen the end of Darius, and the Conclusion of the Persian Dominion ; but have not yet done with the Persian History and Antiquities; many of which could not be made out nor discovered by the feries of those Narrations concerning Cyrus and his Successors, without breaking the order and method thereof; and therefore judging it fit more fully to inform the Reader therein, we shall present him with a prospect of the Polity of that Kingdom, with this Caution and Admonition; that it respects and hath relation also to what followed in after times, when that People shook off the Macedonian Yoak, but became subject to the Parthians, and when they recovered their Liberty, and gave Laws to the Eastern Nations; and therefore we place it here not as an Apparatus to the Persian Empire, but a general Light to their Affairs.

The Polity, Customs, and Manners of the Persians.

He Government we see was Monarchical, the Head of which in respect to the great extent of his Dominions, had the Title of Great King, and King the great extent of the Dominions, nature I fixed of the Array, and then the great extent of the Derived of their power they were fooffed at, for Pile limit of the power they were fooffed at, for Pile limit of the Pile of challenging it, by Alexander and other Greeks. And after that Arfaces had over "HE Printipla thrown Selencus Callinicus, and brought the Persians under the Parthian Yoke, his to Admission Succeffors took it as an high Affront if it was not given them by the Roman Emperors; infomuch that Phraates receiving a Letter from Augustus, directed to him as to bare Phraates, in his Answer took to himself that of King of Kings; and to be even with him, gave him no other than that of Cafar. When the Persians afterward Pulius sayling recovered their liberty, and the Persian Kingdom revived, the Kings thereof ftill quoden Resuchable good tastheir due: Particularly Sapor, in a Letter he wrote to Constantius the sans forbit the Emperor, affumed it together with other lofty Titles, as Ammianus Mar. 19. ad initian. cellinus tells us. But this was no more than what Nebuchadonofor had done

2. As the Government was Monarchical, fo was it Hereditary; the Laws forbid-The Kingdom ding any to be admitted King, but one of the Royal Line if it had not failed. As herein they were conformable to the best Rules of Prudence, so also to the Dictates both of Prudence and Nature, in that the eldeft Son was to be preferr'd. This was constantly and religiously observed for many Ages, till at length the Kingdom was bestowed at the discretion of the Nobility, yet ever upon one of the Royal Family. Sometimes the First born after the Father was King, was preferred before the Elder Brother, whose Birth happened when his Father was yet but a private man, as we have feen in the case of Xerxes and his Brother; and long after because Cabades was weak fighted, Cofroes younger than he was advanced to the Throne, it being unlawful for any one to Reign amongst them, that was imperfect or deform. ed in his Body. Generally Bastards were not regarded when there were any legitimate Sons, and yet some will have Darius Nothus to have been preferred before Hogeus the Legitimate Son of Artaxerxes. Though the Throne was not wont Sect. to be quitted but by Death, yet some Kings have given the Title to their Sons. while yet they lived, and when they went out on any Expedition, they were then wont to declare their Successors. It was the Custome for them to be in-

The manner of augurated at Palagarde by the Preifts of their Nation, in the Temple of a certhe Rings Pro- tain Goddess like to Pallas. The folemnity was performed by putting off their own, and putting on the Garments which Cyrus wore when a private Man: eating alump of Figgs, tafting a fort of Turpentine, and drinking a draught of fowre Milk, having first been instructed in the discipline of the Magi. On the new Kings Head was fet a Bonet or Diadem called Cidaris. He was placed in a Royal Chair or Throne, and fometimes would change his Name upon his promotion. Now was he adored by his Subjects as some God upon Earth, or rather the living Image of God. And the Adoration they performed by proftrating themselves on the Ground, which Alexander, after he grew lo proud, required of his Macedonians. But Cyrus was the first that required and had it paid unto him; and that as foon as they came into his fight, not only when they were near unto him. And it was paid not only by Subjects but also by Strangers. For if Ambaffadors of other Nations refuled to give this Adoration, they were not admitted to speak to the King, but dispached their Business by the Intervention of Messengers. This not only the Fewes, but the Greeks abhominated and derided as not due to any mortal Man. But much more reason they would have had to refuse to adore his Image, which being of Gold, all were compelled to do that entred Bebylon, in the time of Apollonius.

3. Such as faluted or thus adored them, were wont to wish them perpetual Life and respected, and Empire, agreeable to that we meet in Scripture, O King live for ever. And they were not to forget when they met them to fold their Hands in their fleeves. the neglect whereof cost Autofaces and Mitraus dear, when Cyrus the younger usurped against his Brother. This their Subjects might better do, because they did it but very feldom; the Persian Kings being very rarely seen abroad, that by conversation they might not become vile and despicable. This gave the greater opportunity to the Magus, who counterfeited Smerdis, to cheat the People, which was wonderfully pleafed with Statira the Wife of Artaxerxas for using fuch freedom, that she would go abroad and be seen in her open litter, and give free access to any of them, and that by order of her Husband, who was more kind in that respect also than his Predecessors. Without leave obtained none could enter the Palace, so that most transacted their Business at Court by Messengers, a greivance from which the Conspirators agreed to free themselves; except the King was private with his Wife, which Exception when Intaphernes difregarded, it cost him his Life. We know from the Book of Ester howit was death to come into the inner Court, except the King was graciously pleafed to reach out to the venturing Persons his golden Sceptre. The Nobility were expected to wait before the Gate till they were called in, neither was it fafe for them to neglect it. To be fure it was capital for any Subject to fit in the Kings Chair; neither was it lawful to weare his Robe. Nay fuch respect they challenged from their Subjects, that Artaxerxes Longimanus, forbade that any in hunting should strike a Deer before he had cast his Dart at him. 4. But not onely by these Shadowes and Ceremonies was the Majesty of the Persian Kings kept from contempt, as with railes and barriers; they enjoyed not only the Shadow but the substance of Soveraignty. For they were loosed from the Laws, fo as they might do whatever they lifted or lufted, as we have feen in the case of Cambyses, his marrying his Sister. As the Turke at this day most imitates these Patterns of the Persian haughtiness, so their pride in this particular, that all his Subjects he terms and holds as his Slaves; for fo did al-To the Kings of whom we write, their Wives excepted; for, Wives they had who were efteemed of ingenuous and free condition, of which amongst the Turkes, none could boast except Roxolana. As they gave to their Subjects no better terms than that of Slaves, fo they received from them that of Despots and Lords, which as the People owned them to be, fo they obeyed them as fuch, patiently and piously, as Curtius writes. What Burthens they laid upon them they willingly bore, and effeemed it an Honour rather than an Injury to be beaten at the command of the King. Sect. 5. certain that no nation whatfoever showed more dearness and affection to their Princes. They prayed for them; and they came not into their prefence without a present, which though never so mean was wont to be kindly received. As they travelled, Husband-men and others of the meanest fort, presented them with such things as they had, and besides with the first Fruits of the Grounds through which they passed. The story of one who presented Artaserses Mnemon with an Apple of a great bulk, and for it received a great reward; and of another who having nothing elfe, brought him some Water in both his Hands from the River, Cyrus, is celebrated both by Plutarch and Ellan. 5. The birth Days of their Kings they kept as Holydays, and not only honoured whilst alive, but profecuted them with the same respect when taken from them. For their death being known, Non-terme, for the space of five Days, was injoyned, in which, Courts were flittle up and Laws were filent. Moreover that Fire which every one kept alive in his Houle, as facred and his Turelar Detty, upon that occasion was extinguished. Such Majesty and Power did even the betrayers of Darius own and acknowledg in him as King, that when they defigned to give him up, they bound him in golden Chains and Fetters. And truly fuch efteen the Majetty and Soveraignty of their Kings might challenge from them, but the People, the meanier fort effecially, being governed by intagination, which receives Imprefitions from Serife, is wont to be wrought upon by glorious Objects, the Scarlet Gowns of Judges commanding fuch regard as would not be had unto them if they fate in Cuerpo. Therefore to procure Reverence, the Persian Kings had their Royal Ornaments. First upon their Heads they wore the Tiara, which was common to them with their Subjects, restort but that of the Kings was straight and upright, whereas these of the rest, fell down upon, or towards the Brow, rolled up or folded. Only to feven Confpirators against the Magi, a middle fort was granted and to their Posterity, which was prominent in the fore part of the Head, neither upright as that of the Kings, nor falling as the other of the more ordinary fort; for they were made of Linnen folded, and not of more substantial or thick Stuff, but as the Turbants of the Estern Nations in present use. And so I am wont to interpret that of the three Fens which were cast into the fiery Furnace, their being bound in their Hats, as we read it in our present Translation; for they were Turbants or Caps wreathed together, which might eafily be unloofed and become Bandage and Ligaments, not like our ordinary Caps and Hatts. Of the Tiara, we shall now on-

Their Orna-

but this, as we faid, was a common wear both of Prince and Subjects. 6. The peculiar and proper Royal Ornament for the Head was the Cidaris or Citaris, for, by both these Names it was called. This though some Writers feem to confound with the Tiara, yet was diffinet from, and added to, it, being no other than the Diadem which others mention as proper to the Persian Kings, or a Purple Fillet distinguished with white Spots, and persumed. As the Persian Kings were this Diadem or Fillet about their Tiara, so when Alexander began to take their state upon him, he added it to the Macedonian Causia. Long after this Sapor, King of Persia who lived in the time of Constantius, changed it feems the Fashion of this Cap, for Ammianus Marcellinus writes of him, that he wore upon his Head instead of a Diadem, a covering made in the shape of a Rams Head, adorned with Gemms, which possibly was his peculiar Fancy; though the Tiara was also formed into wreaths and rounds, and Sidonius Appatlinaris tutura u sufa writes of its being horned. But, farther as to other Ornamens, the Perflan Kings remain the writes of its being horned. But, farther as to other Ornamens, the Perflan Kings remain the writes of its being horned by the state of rich in Gold and precious Stones, and portraied with the Figures of various nius luntum forts of Animals, being in shape four square, as the Greek Pallium was, which Professionen. was plaited and buttoned about the Neck. Besides this they wore a Tunick cal-Authmis se led Candys, which was common to other Perfians; but that of the Kings differed conflants

ly further observe that it came down if need were upon the Temples and Cheeks;

from the rest, not only in value, but in Colour; for it was of the Sea Purple lim allocated or Phanician Dye, when their Dominions extended to the Coasts of that Country, though afterwards in flead thereof they were supplied out of India. This purple Tunick had a white spot in the middle, it hung upon the Shoulders, and had its Sleeves down to the Fingers ends, which the Romans counted efferninate, and so did Alexander, who though he took up the Persian habit refused the Candys, it becoming a Man, in their Opinion, to have his Arms free and difintangled. From that Story we read in Suetonius concerning, Velpajian his Jest about the Comet or Blafing Star, we may learn that thefe Princes wore their

Haire fomething long; for, when he heard it was of that fort called Criniti or Sect. ftreaming forth like Haire, he faid it concerned the King of Persia and not himfelf. They wore Jewels at their Ears; were girt with rich Girdles or Belts; used Bracche or close Breeches, which also did the rest of the Nation, by Angeolds them called Sarabara, from which Alexander abstained as from the Candys and Grant Sampard of close Ereeches. Tiara. But in Persia both Men and Women wore these Breeches; however the Macedonians and Romans did dispise them. In conclusion besides these Ornaments, The Kings bore golden Scepters in their Hands, as is evident from the Book of Esther. 7. The Kings for their Commodious manner of living, had their Royal Palaces in several Provinces, to which they removed as their Occasions or the Season of the Year did urge them. For the Seasons, generally they passed the Winter in Babylon, the Spring at Sufa, and the heat of the Summer at Echatane. Of Babylon we have spoken already. Susa (in our Translation Shusban the Palace) inde Memounia was a City built by Tichonus and his Son Memnon upon the River Choaspes, and tiam dilla. took its name from Lillies wherewith that Region abounds, Susum in the Persian Tongue fignifying that Flour. Cyrus made choise of it as a place convenient to inhabit, both for its pleafantness and its neighbourhood to the Nations conquered by him; and afterwards it was repaired and very much beautified by Darius, who is therefore by fome Writers termed the founder of it. As for Echatane, it was the Metropolis of Media; and it feems they made choice of it for the coolness of the Air; and why might they not do it, notwithstanding they be laughed at for changing their places and termed Nomades from their flitting from one Region to another; the progressels of Princesbeing very requisite for the knowing and redreffing of the Greivances of their People; Besides these three; they had feveral other Manfions, and feveral retiring places throughout the Country. which were plefantly incompassed with Parks and Trees after the best Art and Contrivance, of which were most eminent Pasargada and Persepolis. The former Cyrus prized above all others, because there he overthrew Altyages (whereupon it had the name of the Troop or Army of the Persians) and here was part of the Royal Treasures kept. But in Persepolis was inestimable Wealth heaped up; it being in a manner filled with the Spoils of the (Eastern) World. In it was a Castle incompassed with three Walls wonderful for their height and thickness, wherein stood the Kings Palace, the Royal Court of Persia marvaid lous for its rich Ornaments of Gold and other Materials. Besides what was beflowed upon the House it self, here was a golden Throne on which it was capital for any Subject to fit. The King lay upon a golden Bed, and his Chamber was decked with a Tree of Gold, and moreover a Vine made of Gold, the Grapes wereof were composed of precious Stones, being the workmanship of Theodorus a Native of Samus.

8. But rather more remarkeable were the Gardens, Groves and Parkes adjoyning to the Kings Palaces, admirable in their contrivance and planting, and for being stocked with all forts of wild Beasts; if wild we may call them that are shut up betwixt Walls and Pales. These places of Divertisement they in their own Language called Paradises, the Romans Vivaria, and we Parkes: but in them were kept Bears and Bores, fierce beyond Madness it self as Ammianus expresseth it: They were well furnished with Springs of Water, and had Towers built in them for Receptacles to the Hunters, as fo many Castles of Defence against the Violence of the inraged Beasts. With the variety of Trees and the pleasant Walkes in these Paradijes, the Persian Princes were wonderfully taken, especially Cyrus the younger, who himself contrived one at Sardis, ordered the Walks, framed the Wilderneffels in them, and fet many of the Trees with his own Hand: And Alexander after his Conquest seemed so much to be of the same mind, that he fent for feveral forts of Plants out of Macedonia to increase the Perfian Store. But wherever the Kings hunted, if they were thirsty and were pleafed to drink Water, it was no other than that what was taken out of the River Choaspes which ran by Susa, thence it was fetcht in golden Vessels, and in them, only of Water being boiled, was preserved for their Use; being carried along with them whi therfoever they went as the lightest in Body, and sweetest of all others. To this Pliny and other Writers joyn the River Eulaus as a Companion, which rifing in Media takes it course also by Sula, so that we may question whether it was not one and the same laver; for Solinus also writes that these Kings would drink of no other Water. If this was so sweet, we may hence perceive the power of Thirst

ter, to say it was the best that ever he had drank in his Life; for, as Cicero well observes, he had (scarce) ever formerly drank thirsting. But as they drank but of one fort of Water, so onely one fort of Wine would content them, and that was the Chalybonian which grew about Damascus in Syria; far fought and deer bought, being it feems, fit for Persian Kings as well as English Ladies. With this it was permitted them to be drunk one day of the Year, which they dedicated to the fervice of Mithra. Otherwise, it seems that by the Laws they were obliged to this fort of Temperance.

9. But if not Drunkards they might be Gluttons; and yet Xerxes by the Story of Herodotus concerning Magagreon one of the Abderites who entertained him, appears to have eaten but once a Day. But it's to be thought this Meal like that of Children, lasted well night all the Day long, if he dined betimes; or all the Night if he supped; for if he had dined as well assupped, his Entertainers had not been able to fustain the Charges. What way soever they travelled, their Subjects were wont to entertain them at Supper, all the Cities being obliged to it either by Law or Custom according to their Abilities, for which Money was raised no otherwise than as Tribute; and fo great was the expence sometimes, that it amounted to twenty, thirty, Tallents or more. When at their own charge, their Diet was most exquisite and costly. They had of Delicacies which their several Provinces produced, the first Fruits as it were presented to them. They used Oyl made of the Persian Wallnut, and another fort made of a Thorne growing in Caramania; but it is observable that amongst all the several Spices, Sawces and Pickles reckoned up by fuch as write of this Subject, there is no mention made of Pepper and Vinegar, the best of all. Amongst all their Feasts those exceeded which they made on their Birthdays, which they beleived to rife to fuch exquisiteness, that in their own Language they called them Tycta or Perfect. On those Days they combed and cleanfed their Hair, and were wont to give Gifts to their People; neither could they well deny any Petition, then put up unto them. As their Meals were eminent both for quantity and richness of Dishes, so also for cleanlyness and neatness in serving thereof. Brissonius gathers from the Hebrew Copy of Esther that Artaxerxes was served with seaven Eunuches. To be sure such as waited were as clean and neat as Water and rich Clothes could make them. And because the Lives of Princes are precious and in danger, they had their Tasters who when they had given the Liquor to them, in a Viol, took fome of it out with a Spoon or Cup, and pouring it into their left Hands, supped it up.

And probable it is that for fear of Poylon they used the same Caution in their

Meat as in their Drink, which generally hath been observed by other Kings, though these of Persia some will have first to have introduced the Custome.

10. But upon this account it was that the Office of Cupbearer (enjoyed by Neemiah the few) was as a place of especial trust, so of great esteem and honour; and so it was in the Court of Alexander where Phillip and Follas the Sons of Antipater prepared and tasted his Drink. Sufficiently known it is what a number of Butchers, Cooks and other Ministers of the Throat and Palate attended in that of Persia. To this purpose is observable what is told by Athenaus concerning those that followed the Waggons and Baggage of Darius, and were taken at Damaseus by Parmenio. These were two hundred and seventy seven Cooks: of Scullions who made clean Utenfils belonging to the Kitchens, twenty nine; thirteen Persons that provided Milk, and seventeen who took order for his Drink, of Cellar Men and fuch as purified his Wines feventy: of Ovntment-makers forty; and fuch as made Garlands and Ornaments for the Head fixty and fix. In the Court a Table daily was furnished as dedicated to the Genius of the King. The Room where he dined was furnished with Women Singers, with which and other forts of Musick those Princes were wonderfully pleased, as well as with other Meriments at their Meals. For Parmenio wrote to Alexander that after the taking of Damascus he found, besides what we lately mentioned, no fewer than three hundred and twenty one of those Wenches that were Minstrells. When the Table was removed they left finging; but when the King called for Wine they renewed their Melody, and were wont with their vocal and other forts of Musick all the Night long to lull him on sleep. No fort of Luxury was wanting that could be devised; for rewards were proposed to such as could find them out. Most commonly the King sate at meat by himself, Concrimes the Queen with him, and some of his Children: but of Araxerxes it is said that he took his Mother to the Table, placing her above him, as his Wife beneath him, and that with his Company at Meals, he sometimes honoured Offaces and Oxates his Brothers.

Brothers. Moreover they were wont at certain Feafts, to entertain their Kindred Sect. as the Romans did theirs in their Chariftia; others also sometimes in respect to some notable service, Strangers though they were, who could not be admitted to the Feast of the Kindred; and from the Books of Efther and-Ezra we are informed, that formetimes they entertained their Captains, Satrapa's, and great Officers.

11. But of such as they admitted, some supped within and some without the Room where the King did eat, and from those that supped within, the view of the King was intercepted by an Hanging or Curtain, fo as he might fee them but could not be seen. The number of his Guests exceeded not that of twelve: As for the order of their fitting, Cyrus placed those he least trusted on his Right Hand, and whom he most trusted on his Left; because the Left Side is most exposed and least defensive: In like manner, as still at this day amongst the Eastern Nations, it's most honourable to go on the left hand, because such an one hath the advantage, commanding the Sword of his Companion which hangeth on his left Thigh. The honour was great to be thus entertained, and need there was for it, the freedom they enjoyed with it being so little, For look about them they must not, but hang down their Heads, lest any of the Eunuchs should espye them to cast an eye upon some of the King's Women: And they must also forbear all complaints, and take all patiently that was faid or done unto them. And yet these Kings were nor so insolent as by report were those of the Parthians, their Successors; for if they entertained any of their Friends at meat, the Guests took their Repast on the ground, and fed like Dogs upon what they cast from their Table, which was placed aloft from the floor: Nay sometimes upon some slight account, being taken out of the Room, they were beaten till blood followed; but in that plight were to fall down and worship him that beat them, as having conferred on them some special favour. The Kings of the Parthians did eat by themselves and on an elevated ascent, and they alone as Earthly Gods were served at a Table furnished with foreign meat. Those rather were to be envied to whom the Kings of Persia sent dishes of Meat from their Table, for fo they were wont to do to their Friends; which custom was begun by Cyrus, as Xenophon Writeth of him. To be fure with great quantities of Meat they were wont to be served, the remainders whereof went to the Waiters and Attendants: for not only their dyet, but also that of Slaves and of the very Dogs, as Plutarch observes from the late mentioned Writer, was served up to the King's

They had feve- Table.

12. For propagation of the Royal Offspring it was permitted the Kings to have feveral, and those Legitimate Wives. Darius had two danghters of Cyrus, Atolla the Widow, Aristone whom he married a Virgin, Parmys the Neece of Crus, and the Daughter of Otanes at one and the same time. With what magnificence they Celebrated their Nuptials, we may learn from the History of Esther, how not only that King appointed a Festival to be kept by the People, but entertained his Persian and Median Nobility for a month, and granted Remission of Tributes to the Provincials, tftat they might with more chearfulness attend the solemnity. Thence also we may perceive, that they set Diadems on the heads of such of their Wives as they had the greatest affection for; as also that these Queens were gorgeously apparelled. And indeed we are told by Cicero, that their Husbands were wont to bestow on them Cities or Territories for furnishing them with Cloaths and Ornaments, so as the Revenues of one was for the attire of the Head, another for Necklaces, and others for other Trinkets which were most in fashion and of value in those Ages; insomuch that the Akers prided themselves in bearing the Names of fome of them: Particularly Socrates in Plato's Dialogue, which goes under the Name of Alcybiades, tells how he had it from one who went Embaffador to the Perfian King, that he passed through a large and fertile Country, which extended well nigh a days Journey, and by the Inhabitants was called the Queen's Girdle. Athenews allo relates, that Antylla a City of Egypt, not far diffant from Mex-andria, was by the Kings of that Country and those of Persia, appropriated to the purchase of their Wives Girdles. So rich were they in their Cloaths, Oyntments, and other Accourtements, that well might they feem to themselves too great to be cheap, and accompany with any Subjects. And indeed no Jealousie possessed their Husbands in this kind, so as they never doubted the Children they bore to be their own, nor fo much as appointed them any Keepers legitimate Wives they added Miftreffes or Wenches, the number of which was li-

Vaftly rich in to watch them, or any other Guardians of their Chastity than Love or Fear alone. But so much did the Persian Kings indulge their Carnal Appetites, that to several

Sect. 5. what we find of Artaxerxes, that by his Wenches he had an hundred and fifteen Sons; and of Darius that three hundred and fixty furnished his Court, and followed him on his Expedition. Nay it was told of a Surenas, who was next in place to the King of Parthia, that even he had no fewer than two hundred following him in the Camp. Some write, that three hundred women daily attended in the Persian Court, and took their fleep in the day time, and passed all the night in singing and Minstress. But the King's Mistresses had a Gynaceum of their own, wherein they were separately kept and attended by Eunuchs, with all things conducing both to their Health and Cleanliness. By times the King took them to his Bed, and they followed him not only in Expeditions, but when he went out to hunt.

13. Of fuch Children as they had by their legitimate Wives, they took especial Their Eldest care, and chiefly as to their Education. As soon as the eldest or Heir to the Kingdom was born, he was committed to the trust and overfight of the most eminent Eunuchs, who made it their business in the first place so to order the swadling and forming of his Limbs, that he might, if possible, become a most beautiful Person. When he was seven years old he learn'd to ride, and to teach him that skill, had the best Masters that could be found; and now by degrees he was taught to take delight in hunting. At fourteen he was delivered to those they termed Royal Pedagogues, four men the most wise, just, temperate and valiant persons that could be found in the Nation. Of these the first being most eminent for Prudence, taught him the Doctrine of the Magi, fuch as Zoroafter the Son of Horomaze taught, which showed the worship of their Gods. The second being of high esteem in Acts of Justice, studied to frame his mind to the love of Truth and Sincerity. The third, who was as remarkable for Temperance, endeavoured to make him Lord and Commander over his Carnal Lusts and Appetites: And the fourth and last, having a great Name for his Fortitude, laboured to render him void of all Fear and Cowardife. When he came to be King, he was awakened in the morning by one of his Bed-chamber, who bad him arife, and take order for fuch Affairs as Meloromaldes was pleased he should advise about; agreeable to which Custom was that particular Injunction of Darius after the burning of Sardis, that one of his Attendants at Dinner should three times say aloud, Remember the Athenians. Every day they gave their attendance at Sacrifices, for the performance of which, thousands of Oxen, Affes, and Deer sometimes fell in one day. But this was not to be done without the presence of the Magi, who as they assisted in the private Consultations relating to Civil matters, so especially in Religious Concernments: And some report, that as the Kings facrificed they made discourses concerning Piety, as they were wont to harangue concerning Valour, before their Armies engaged in Fight. 14. Great Attendance and Ceremonies of State, they esteemed necessary for prefervation of Respect due to the Majesty of the Soveraign Power; and indeed upon this account Fulian the Emperor was blamed for turning the Eunuchs, Cooks, Barbers, 2nd rent and fuch like out of the Court upon the death of Confuntius; Royal Authority be contemplified. ing contemptible if there be no Pomp observed in the Palace. Out of the Court videntar Ingethe King was never feen on Foot, but either mounted on Horseback or in his Cha. vium. riot, or if he walked it was upon Tapestry: The Chariot was drawn by white Horfes, bred in Niseum a Region of Media, famous for a breed of extraordinary bigness. When he alighted he was not to step upon the ground, how near soever it was, nor to lean upon any of his Attendants, but to make his frep upon a golden Footstool, with which one of his Servants ever followed and attended the Chariot. As they rode they were not to read or force their minds on any grave or ferious matter, upon which and other accounts Seneca had reason to call them Barbarous, as not being cultivated by any fort of Literature. When they were to travel into Media, they were wont to make Proclamation three days before their fetting forward, that the Inhabitants should kill all the Scorpions they could meet with, because that Country abounded with them, and such as dispatched many they were wont to reward; and they were obliged to make progresses into all their Provinces by virtue of an ancient cuftom founded upon the mutual interest both of themselves and their people; for the necessities of the Provincials the grievances and oppressions under which they laboured, they could not fo well understand in their own Court. By their presence in the several concerned places they might best compose the differences betwixt feveral Cities, restrain the turbulent humour of factious Persons by reason and good words, curb the Insolence and Rapacity of Magistrates and null all unjust Sentences and Decrees: In conclusion, lend their present and helping hand whereever it was wanting. Into fuch Provinces as they could not go themselves, they sent their Deputies to understand and report the true state of them:

Such Governors as were found to have by their forecast and due Administration. benefited the Countries committed to their charge, they rewarded and promoted to higher places, and others who had ill managed their affairs, they punished and removed: For if the Fields were not well and duly tilled, Merchandise industriously followed and mechanick Arts as diligently practifed, Tributes could not be paid. nor money circulate throughout the Body politick, though it be necessary for the preservation of the whole, that it should so do. To make this more effectual, they had two forts of ordinary Officers in the Country, viz. the Governors of Forts and Garrisons, who were to defend the Provincials from all force and violence; and the Prefetts of Cities, who faw that all the Inhabitants thus protected, should follow their business, for the publick security and advantage. 15. The Kings of Persia were wont in Person to hear Causes, and sit in judgment upon Capital matters, wherein they used deliberation, giving no hasty Sentence. nor condemning any for one offence, except the mildemeanors of his life did overballance his merits: But a Sentence of Condemnation once given by the King, could not by the King be revoked; fuch Persons being apprehended by their Girdles, were instantly deliver'd to the Serjeants & Officers, and so led to Execution. If the King was angry with any, his face was covered, as we learn in the case of Haman.

But from amongst the most knowing men of the whole Nation, were certain select Persons chosen, whom they called The Royal Fudges, who had their places for life, and decided Controversies in all cases; held their Circuits about the Provinces, and attended upon the King in his Journeys. As it highly concerned King and People that they should be just and not mercenary, so were they very severely punished when any corruption could be discovered. The Story is commonly known of Sifamnes, whom for his guilt in this kind, Cambyfes caused to be flea'd alive, and his Son to fit upon the Judgment-Seat covered with his Skin; and though Ammianus vide Valeti Son to its upon the junginess.

Marcellinus doubteth concerning the truth of it, yet little need there was he should Notes in American Marcellinus doubteth concerning the truth of it, yet little need there was he should note in the same of the sa fo do, for besides this related by Herodotus, there is another, and more severe, 260. mentioned by Diodorus Siculus. Tiribazus 2 Governor, being by Orontes accused, for holding fecret Intelligence with the Lacedamonians, Artaxerxes referred the hearing of the matter to three Judges; whom finding afterwards to have been corrupted with money, he caused their Skins to be pulled over their Ears, and spread upon the Bench where he had appointed others to fucceed them. As for fleaing alive, fomething like it is also related to have been practifed by Pyrrhus upon a Tarentine, for having a delign to betray Tarentum; how having put him to death, he caused a Chair to be covered with Thongs made of his skin, and delivered it to Milo, to whom he committed the custody of the Castle, with the Garrison.

16. By the advice of these Judges who seem to have been seven in number.

and to have been their Privy Gounfellors, the Kings not only punished Offenders:

but rewarded fuch as well deferved of the State; a Commonwealth being preferved in a fafe conftitution both by Rewards and Punishments. They thought fit amongst others to reward fuch as begot many Children, but especially those from whom they had received some especial good or advantage, tending to the preservation of their Government or Persons, whom they termed their Benefactors: To these they were wont to affign the next place to themselves, to honour them with a kiss, to cloath How they re them with a Vest of Media, as the Greeks then termed that which afterward was warded defer called Serica; and to adorn them with a Chain of Gold, with golden Bracelets and a Scimitre; which Ornaments could be wore by none but fuch as the Kings defigned to honour, and took their Original from the Medians and Babylonians. But of all other Ornaments, those of gold belonging to Horses for Saddle or Chariot, were most esteemed by the Persians; yet sometimes to their Friends they were wont to assign Lands and Territories for their maintenance: Nay it is said of Themistocles, that he received several Cities from Artaxerxes, particularly Magnesia; (out of which he raifed a yearly Revenue of fifty Talents) to find him with bread, Lampfacus with wine, and Myus with other provisions for his Table, to which some add two others for his Cloaths and Bedding. Sometimes they would give the honour of Captain over an Army, which was reckoned as an extraordinary favour but the most noble Gift of all was that of a golden Mill, (as Ctesias writes) which among others was given by Xerxes to Megabyzus, by whose means he became Mafter of Babylon, and weighed fix Talents. This was esteemed the most noble gift, although that could not be but most acceptable which the Party himself did ask, for sometimes they gave their Favourites liberty to ask what they would, as appears by feveral examples. And this by the Laws he had liberty to do, who was nominated King by his Father or Ancestor yet living; yet the Persian Kings were wont

BOOK II.

Sect. 5. to be very munificent in their Largeffes and Donatives to deferving Persons, without asking.

17. And especially to Foreign Embassadors sent to them upon occasion. Ælian reckons up the particulars with which they fometimes were prefented, viz. A Babylonian Talent of the pureft Silver, (a Babylonian Talent was in value feventy two Attick Minæ) two Viols of filver, Bracelers, a Cymitre, and Chain of Gold each worth a thousand Daricks, besides a stole of Media otherwise called Dorophorica by the the Gracians. When they gave their faith to them, they were wont to give them their right hands, which was a fecurity inviolable; but their ordinary Oath was by the Sun, whom they thought the greatest Deity, and called by the name of Mithras. What time they could spare from publick business, they usually spent in hunting, in which diversion as Noble and most resembling War, they chose often to Exercise themselves: When they went to hunt they carried along with them one half of their Guards, and were accompanied with the Flower of the Persian Youth. For Their hunting the following of their Game they kept fuch a multitude of Indian Dogs, that in the Plain of Babylon, four large Villages were affigned to maintain them, being freed from other Tributes. Not only in open Fields and Champions were they wont to hunt, but in those fenced places they called Paradifes, did they persecute and kill poor Beafts, kept up as in so many Coops or Cages, which to destroy was no Maftery. It was not lawful before the King had defifted, to let fly against any Beast, or to offer to Combat with him; which was fo strictly required; that the story goes how when in this Exercise, Artaxerxes was set upon by a Lyon, and it was goes now which in this was the state of the killing him; was condemned to lose his Head, because he dispatched him before the King had spent one dart upon him.

18. But to come to the subordinate Government, the Kingdom of Persia was divided into Provinces, which were governed by fo many fingle Persons in Chief: The Provinces in their own Language they called Satrapies, and their Governors Satrapa. How many they were is uncertain, the number being varied according to the pleasure of Princes as is most probable: SomeWriters making mention of twenty, and others of above an hundred more than that number, in the Reigns of feveral of the Eastern Princes. And sometimes one and the same Satrapa governed two or more Provinces, being by Latine Writers, when they would call them by Names of their own, termed Pretors and Prefects; although this ought not to be prachifed; for feldom are the employments of Officers the fame in diverse Kingdoms or States. By the Greek Historians, when they also are of that humor, they are called Eparchi; the younger Sons of the Kings were wont to be employed in these The duty of Commands, which were noble and furnished with great Authority: For, to their care the Provinces were committed to provide for their Defence and universal Emolument; to raise the Tributes, pay the ordinary Magistrates their Salleries, and give their affiftance in all Emergencies, of which they were to certifie the King by Letters, or elfe by special Messengers. Upon occasion they were called to Consult with him about great affairs. They were much honoured by the Provincials, very well attended by young men of good quality at home, and when they went to hunt: and had a Noble Guard for their credit and protection. They had under them Secretaries Royal, who read the Kings Letters and dispatched other business; they received allowances from the Publick, and it was not the manner or agreeable to the policy of the Persians to put them out of their Offices, so long as they well discharged them: But left their long continuance and great Power, which in honest men begets experience and opportunity to do good, should give them opportunity to oppress the people, or any way evilly to demean themselves; the Kings were accustomed yearly to send some of their chief Ministers into the Provinces, with full Authority to make inspection into their state and condition; to affist the Satra-How their be- pa's if need should be; to restrain their violence and amend what was amiss themfelves, or else to make report of what they found. The People were overjoyed at their coming, and as if the King himself came to bring them relief, called them his Sons, his Brothers, and his Eyes.

19. Besides the Satrapa who governed single Provinces or more, there were other subordinate Officers, who prefided some over particular Cities and their Towns: others had command in the Castles of the said Cities. For one and the same Person was not fet over both the City and Cittadel of the fame, but it was thought best po-The Prefect of licy to divide the Commands; so as one might be a spy upon the other, to such purposes as we have formerly declared. But when the Satrapa came into the Province, it was his duty to overfee both, and as by his care of Artificers and Husbandmen, Sect. that they minded their Employments, and that Tributes were duly collected, to discharge the duty of the Prefect of the City, so by protecting them all to do what was incumbent on the Phrurarch or Commander of the Garrison. This Phrurarch was chosen by the King and displaced by his order alone, as was the Chiliarch who commanded Soldiers disposed and quartered about in several Regions, for the fafety of the Provinces, and brideling if need were the extravagant Power of the Satrapa. Besides these, each Province had its Treasurer for receiving and keeping all the Royal Revenue belonging to it; which Treasure or Treasury in their Language they called Gaza. So great was the Income arileing from Tributes, that accounts being cast up, fourteen thousand five hundered and fixty Talents of Eubas were yearly brought into the Kings Coffers, and Fustin speaks of a yearly product of three hundered thousand Talents in this way accruing unto Alexander. But over and above Tributes and Stipends, every Province contributed its share to the maintenance of the King and his Army; the Satrapy of Babylon for four Months of the Year, and the rest of Asia for the remainder. The Armenians fent in Horses by way of Tribute; for, of this noble Creature besides what were for War, eight hundered were kept for Stallions, to ferve fixteen thousand

Mares; for, twenty Mares were kept for every Horse. What numbers of Indian

They were adorned with golden Chaines, wore Vefts imbroidered with Gold, and Sleeves to their Coats sparkling with Gemms, being chosen out of the best of the Nation, and that Nation alone. Of these there were athousand select Persons, who for that they had golden Aples fixed to their Lances, were by the Greeks both called Doryphori and Melophori, the Name and Service of which Alexander kept up after the overthrow of Darius. With a great Number of Satellites besides these, were the Kings protected either in Battle or in their Palace, chosen also from amongst the most faithful of the Persian Nation, till Darius the last King broke the Custome. And these had their Prafect or peculiar Captain, and one of them followed the Kings Chariot with the golden Footfool lately mentioned; neither received they any pay, but had allowances, for their maintenance, of necessary Provisions and the Meat which came from the King's Table. Of the Doriphori, there werefome which being next the Kings Perfon in the greatest trust and dangers, were called his Kinfmen, honoured with the liberty of kiffing him. and a Feast, to which no stranger was admitted. Besides there were another fort who being called Homotimi from their being equal in honour, watched before the Gates of the Palace, till, by the Kings order they were difiniffed; although all the Persian Noblemen were wont also, as we faid, to give their Attendance at the Gare.

Others will have Cardarigan to be the name of Dignity amongst the Persians, to whom they say it was ordinary to take Names from Dignities, and receive those that were given them by their Parents. As also that the Darigmedun was of highest esteem, and to be compared with the Curopalates at Conftantinople. They also tell us that the Pherochanes injoyned the same with Son Downing the Magisterian Dignity in the Emperors Court; and others say that Zieb was a sur nosler. also their Chamberlains, or those of the Bedchamber and their Cupbearers; for, fuch Cyrus thought fittest to be trusted nearest to his Person, though so great were the Infolences and Abuses committed too often by them, that they were abominated by some Princes in after times. But in the Persian Court Eunuches waited also on the Queens, and had custody of the rest of the Kings Women. But for matters of State they had their Secretaries attending, which by the Eastern Nations were called Scribes; we mean by Names answering to the fignification of this, who wrote their Letters, Edicts and Decrees. Their Edicts and Rescripts ordinarily began thus; The King faith, or the King faith thus; and they were 'Test About fealed with his Ring. But what Character the Ring had ingraven is uncertain. Some have faid the Kings own Image; others the Image of Cyrus the first King of the Persians, and others the Image of Darius his Horse, which by neighing procured him the Kingdom. The Edicts were fent by Meffengers throughout the Provinces, but kept in Memorials, and registred in the Archives of the Kingdom. For besides two places of kecord, or two Treasuries as they termed them, in one of which Books belonging to Science were kept, and in the other Papers relating to Accounts and the publick Revenue, there were other Paper Offices wherein were preserved for the use of Posterity, Chronicles or Commentaries of whatsoever happened of any Importance, which others might confult upon occasion, and the Kings themselves sometimes would have read unto them, as we find in the History these we may call Admissionales who stood at the Dore to carry all Messages in unof Mordecai the Jew.

23. The Kings, however Barbarous, had the most learned men in the art of Phylick, that the neighbouring Nations could afford, to attend them, whom according to the Laws of the Roman Emperors, we may term Archiatri. Such they had out of the Azyptian Nation, and Darius would have put some of them to death for being unskillful as to his particular case, but they were pardoned at the Intercession of Democedes a Greek Physitian of Crotone, who did the Cure. Of Greek Physicians who then were more learned than any other, its to be presumed they wanted not some. For, Cetesias who served in the Army of Cyrus the younger, being taken prisonner became Physitian to Artaxerxes; and from the Epistles of great Hippocrates it appears that he was very much courted to come and live with the same Monarch. These Monarch's had also some at hand who should tell them the time of the Night or Day. They had fuch as bore up their Train. And when they rode, they had a number of Servants who carried Scepters before them. And if we should mention all the Officers belonging to them, and relating to the more private or ordinary fervices of their Courts, to their Patrimony, or Res privata, as the later Romans called it; if we should discourse of the Officer appointed to relieve Strangers, of the Curators of their publick buildings, and of fuch as had the charge of Horses and of Doggs, we might possibly seem to be too The Pollage. tedious if not impertment. Of the Cursus publicus, we cannot be filent, instituted as is reported by Cyrus the great, who observing how far one Horse would run in one day, appointed certain Stages and Mansions for changing of Men and Horses, and delivering of Letters or other things given in charge from one Post to another.

This was called Angarion and Angaron, and the Men themselves Angari and A-fanda. If what Plutarch writes concerning Darius the last King of Persia be true, that when he lived a private life, he was one of the Kings Aftanda, it was no vile or mean Imployment.

24. Such were the Kings of Persia, and so they lived or defired to live, if they A Poyson they could not, they made provision for the most speedie and easiest Death. They and when re- were provided of a Poylon made of the Excrements and inwards of a little Indian followed to dyc. Bird called Diesarus, of which who foever took a very little quantity in a draught of Drink, expired shortly after without any Pain or Torment. This Poyson being given them by the Kings of India, was efteemed as a very choice and extraordinary Present, and being kept if need should be, for the use of the King and his Mother, it was not lawful for any other Persian to have it. Being dead, their Funerals were celebrated with all magnificence, and the Sacred Fire as they accounwhere buried ted it, was then put out. Their Maufoleum or place of Interment, fome fay was at Persepolis, although Cyrus was buried at Pasargada, where his sepulcher was kept by Magi, who for their maintenance had a Sheep every Day, and an Horse every Month allowed them. And Fosephus makes mention of a Tower built at Echatane by Daniel, when he flourished in the favour of Darins, which continued to his time, and remained to fresh that it feemed to the beholder to have been finished but that day. In this Tower, he faith, the Kings of the Medes, Persians, and Parthians were wont to be buried, which custom continued to his very time; and that the custody of the said Tower was intrusted with a Priest of the sewish Nation. Their Monuments were wont to have Epitaphs inscribed upon them., and particularly those of Cyrus and Darius, both the one and the other are related : But this was no new thing in the East, if the Epitaphs of Ninus and Sardanapalus be not counterfeited, as we have no reason to believe they were.

25. From the Kings of the Persians, it's fit we pass to speak something of the manner of their Government, of their Rites and Customs; and how their Religion ought to be confidered in the first place; but that it must be referred to one more proper. As for their civil Rites and Customs, they are reported to have been founded upon excellent Laws and Constitutions, and such as excelled all others in this respect, that they tended to the prevention of Punishments, by preventing of the Crimes themselves. In other Kingdoms and States we find very wholesom Ordinances indeed for prevention, but still it is of the like for the time to come, and ill manners have produced good Laws; or if they have been made by Legislators antecedent to a Society or Common-wealth; yet though not in practice they have been, yet in Theory they have supposed the Commission of those mischiefs they endeavoured to redress. But the Persians chose rather so to instruct Children and so

way of Educa- to principle their Youth, that they should abhor Thest, Rapine, Murther, Adultery and the like, by a good Education; and, that fmart of the Rod might prevent Execution and choaking by the Halter. They left not Children in the hands and power of Parents to dispose of them as should suit their humor; neither when come to ripeness of Age, permitted them to live as they listed, but by a fort of breeding in a publick Forum and other rules, so endeavoured to mould and frame the Spirits of all free-born men, that there should be no need of Terror arising from pains of death. This institution and these Rules are laid down by Xenophon in his Cyropadia, or his Books concerning the Institution of Cyrus the elder. Indeed these Books, Cicero was of opinion to have been written, not fo much by any true Historical Account. to make an impartial Relation concerning Cyrus his breeding, as in way of a Romance to give an Image and Representation of a just and perfect Government. But as for what concerns the Rites and manners of the Persians, he himself professeth, as Briffonius urgeth, that he feigneth nothing; and not once affirms, that fuch Ordinances as were made by Cyrus, were observed to his own time: Now, an Eve Witness, and one who had himself travelled through so many Provinces of the Perfian Empire, who dare adventure to suspect? Besides many things written by him are attested by Herodows and others. This plea of Brissonius may at least prevail for a fulpention of our misbelief. 26. However it will not be amiss to say in short, from this information of Xenomer, most choice Persons were appointed from amongst the Seigniors to instruct them. Strabo writes, that Boys came not into the fight of their Fathers till four years old, which Age Herodotus extends to five and Valerius Maximus to feven That of Bog's, years; adding this reason, that so their Parents might more patiently bear the loss of them, if they chanced to dye within that time. From five years to twenty, as Herodotus, or as Strabo faith to twenty five, they especially instructed them to speak truth, a lye being effeemed as a fervile vice, and most opprobrious of all others, by that Nation. And what was highly fuitable with veracity, in the next place they were taught to be just in all their ways, and give to every man his own.

27. That this they might the more readily do by examples fet before their eyes, as Augustus at Rome permitted the Sons of Senators to be present in the Court, to teach them the way of Government; so the Persian Youth was admitted to hear Causes and Decisions, although afterwards Xenophon confesses and bewails, that from their hearing of fuch cases, they learn'd to practise more injuries and Violence of their Empire. And as amongst Boys themselves and young Men, differences continually arife, either for things stollen, reproachful words, or upon some other occasions; their Masters were wont to spend time in examining these complaints, and to punish the Offenders, whether such as falfely accused, or were proved guilty; and thereby shewed them how to become Judges when their time should come. The good Ex- But as without Sobriety and Temperance, which curb and reftrain immoderate Appetites, no virtue can exert it felf, and these things are taught more by example than Precepts; their Masters by their spare manner of living and exemplary continency. Thewed them the way, and gave them incentives to a fober life; and before them they took their victuals, not with their Mothers, and not till the fignal was given, their meat being bread, their fawce Nasturtium, and their drink water taken from the nearest River. By this course of Diet and Abstinence they enjoyed health; and exercise being joyned to it, their Bodies became so dry and solid, that they feldom spate or had occasion to wipe their Noses: And we cannot let pass what Ammianus Marcellinus relates concerning the dead Bodies of the Persians that were killed at the Siege of Amida, how they could eafily be distinguished as they lay, and known whose they were by reason of their dryness, when those of the slain Romans speedily putressed, and could not be discerned after two days. 28. Their manner and course of Instruction was this, besides the good example their Masters gave them in submitting themselves to the dictates of the Seniors.

In Tables and pleafant Tales they involved wholesom hints and documents for framing of the lives and manners of their Scholars. They taught them Songs wherein were extolled the praises of their Gods, and great and laudable Actions of their Anceftors; they inftructed them in the nature and virtue of Plants, that as occasion should serve they might shun the hurtful, and furnish themselves with Remedies against distempers, and preserve their health by proper applications. But the thing Next to lying, which they endeavoured to make odious to them next to lying, as the most hainous a fault to be in thing the Nation abhorred, was being in debt: They esteemed a man in debt no better than a Lyar, as by it so made ipso facto, considering what excuses, evasions, denyals, and perfidious Answers such do make, and that they conceal their Persons as well as their Intentions. But this is a misfortune rather than a fault, and a burthen to which ingenuous Spirits are constrained often to submit; that is rather a crime.

Ingratitude.

wilfully to make deserving Persons unfortunate. Therefore nothing more did they abhor than that black and ugly Vice of Ingratitude, as indeed containing in it felf all other Vices; infomuch that by their Laws and customs an action lay against that man who being unmindful of a benefit received would not make a return when it lay in his power. Ammianus faith that their Laws made against Ingratitude, in severity exceeded all others; as that those were also severe which were made against defertors, than whom few were more odious amongst the Persians. 29. tion had fuch Reverence, that it was counted worse than ill breeding to sit down in presence of their Mothers, except they had their permission so to do. And they gloried in this of old, that amongst them none was found to have laid violent hands upon them; for if ever any thing like to this happened, upon diligent inquisition it was found that the wickedness had been committed by some suppositious or adulterous brood; neither could they once believe that any but a spurious off-spring would attempt such a crime, it being contrary to Nature for a true Parent to be murthered by a legitimate Iffue. The Piety indeed of Artaxerxes Mnemon is very remarkable which he shewed toward his Mother, though she had procured the Sons were in death of his dearly beloved Wife. It's evident from Ariftotle that Sons were the Dominion under the Dominion and Power of their Fathers, and this Power in the opinion of the Philosopher was Tyrannical; for they used them, he faith, like Slaves. Such. during the Infancy and Youth of the Common-wealth, was that of Sons at Rome. who differed little in their condition from Slaves, their Fathers having power of life and death over them as well as the other. In conclusion as to vices, Herodotus, and not only he, informs us, that fuch things as were unlawful to be done, were also unlawful to be spoken.

Education of

30. But farther as to the Education of Youth, the Sons of Noblemen were educated while Boys, in the City at the entrance into the King's Palace, and in the Provinces at the Gates of the Satrapa where they learn'd Lessons of Temperance and Continency, and were Spectators of Punishments executed upon ill Livers. As to Exercife, they were taught from five to twenty, or five and twenty, to shoot in the Bow. to Ride and manage an Horse, and cast Darts; and this Exercise continued incumCHAP. might require their help. Besides this, they were used to Run fifty in a Company. a course of thirty or forty Furlongs, one of the Kings Sons, or some Son of one of the Satrapa's being Captain of the Company: And Dancing also they practised after their own Country manner, the better to obtain a Command of their Limbs. Being thus employed and rendred fit for fervice, the Magistrates made use of them for anprehending Thieves and other Malefactors, and doing other business wherein Diligence and Agility were required. 31. (chosen out of their own Classis) if need was, with their Council and Advice, or went to the Wars where now they fought not like velites or with miffile weapons, but hand to hand, having on a Breast-plate of Brass, bearing in the Right Hand a Basket Target, and in the Left a Sword, as a Persian in Armour was wont to be painted. When arrived at Fifty they were reckoned amongst the Seniors, and by benefit of their Age obtained mission from warfare, and were not compelled to pass in fervice out of their own Country, but flaying at home attended the deciding of and Estates, but publick Officers and others were accused before and sentenced by of those of fif- publick and private Causes; for not only did they hear matters relating to Money them; it being lawful to any of the People to accuse. As they sentenced and depofed, the creation of Magistrates belonged also to them, and to them alone Offices of Magistracy, and afterward the honour of Seniority to such as had passed through the publick Discipline. Such had, when Boys, been educated in the Forum as we have faid, and thence passed into the Classis of the Eph. bi, and after that into the other of perfect Manhood; for it must not be imagined that in what we have faid of the Persian Institution and breeding up in these Classes, all Persians were in-differently concerned; it was only their Children who had wealth or Estates to be at the expence, and could maintain their Sons in the publick Schools of Justice. But if fuch Sons were so educated and born Subjects of the King, they were admitted of what Nation foever, Hyrcanians as well as Persians or Medes.

Other Cu-

32. As to their more general Customs and demeanour, Laughter was by them very unfeemly, especially when vehement and extraordinary or in publick, neither was it decent to be feen to make water or evacuate, but this was done fecretly and at home. Neither were they wont to do these things or to eat and drink in Journeys, but these Journeys Xenophon confesseth, in his days were wont to be so short, that there was no great need of any Refection. And who confiders their fort of Diet will nor wonder that they had little temptation to eat, or occasion to evacuate; for besides Bread they ordinarily eat nothing but Nasturtium, except a Cake made of Flour with water and some Oil, and besides they made use of Salt and Cardonum. But this fort of Diet we may believe to have been in fashion in old times, in the days of Cyrus, when the Persians lived with great labour and parsimony by reason of poverty and the barrenness of the Soil they inhabited. Afterwards when the Median and Lydian Triumphsgave them a tafte of foreign delicacies, they fell like those they conquered into excess and riot: Now ordinary food would not content them, Wine now must discharge the duty of Water and that to intemperance, from the ill example of their Kings. We have feen how guilty Cambyfes was of this crime, but Xenophon especially dates the decay of the ancient Discipline from Artaxerxes, and those about him their giving up themselves to intemperance in this kind. But from the History of Esther it's apparent that in the days of Ahaswerns, they were arrived at that extravagancy as to compel one another to drink, elle what reason could he have to prohibit this practice? when hot with drink they would also have women introduced.

33. Yet Herodotus writes that in their Cups they were wont to Confult about as high as State Affairs, but if they debated any thing at Table, they were wont the next Day when more fober to confider of it, and then to confirm or reject their former Opinions! though they would also call to the Test when drinking, whatout of their Wine they had considered, whether matters of War or others, and forme fay their drunken Councils they most approved. After the diffolution of the antient Discipline, not only the Kings but Nobility, and all the People according to their Wealth loved to fare after the most deligious fort. Especially on

But by the time of Ammianus Marcellinus it appears that the Nation was returned to Frugality again, Herodotus writes that in his Days they used sweet Meats, or second Courses, but Ammianlib 23: he relates that they shunned Curiosity and Luxury of Featls as a Plague, and espe valesas. cially greediness of Drinking. Neither, the Kings Meals being excepted, had they any fet or appointed Hour of Dining, but every mans Belly was his Clock or Dial, and when it called upon him he eat what came to Hand; neither after he had enough did any throw in any fuperfluous Meats. Extraordinarily Cautious they were; fo that passing through the Gardens or Vineyards of their Enemies, they neither defired nor touched any thing therein, for fear of Poyfon or fome fort of Treachery. Besides what Fustin long before had written concerning the Parthians being sparing in Diet, Procopius adds concerning the Persians that therein they were hard and fingular. And he interprets what Xenophon writes that their custome was to eat but once a Day; that it was towards Evening.

Their sumptu- purposed to be sumptuous in their Entertainment, they had beautiful Boys to wait at Table; they used Ointments, Garlands and Perfumes. The Attendants were not to speak one word, not so much as gape or spit, it being indeed a custome amongst them, for all to keep silence at the Table, except he that sung a merry Song, which should be as a condiment to their Meat. They wanted no Bakers, Confectioners, Cooks, nor Butlers upon occasion; nay they had Artists who made it their Trade to finde out Allurements of the Belly. Cupboards and Tables they had set forth and adorned with all forts of Cups and drinking Vessels of great value and rarity. When Pausanius had defeated Mardonius and was become mafter of his Baggage, feeing all his Furniture, in Vessells and Tapestry of Gold and Silver, he commanded his Cooks and other Officers to prepare him a Supperafter the same manner as Mardonius his Custome was to be served. They diligently obeyed his Orders, to the admiration of Paulanius who was amazed to behold the golden and filver Bedds, the rich Furniture and the whole preparation. That they were wont to take their Repafts upon fuch Bedds covered with coffly Carpets is otherwise evident, and as curious they were in their Bedds whereon they slept, for which they had their peculiar Bedmakers, in the mystery of whom the Greeks were no whit skilled; forhat when their King made Prefents of those Bedds to them of that Nation, they presented also the Bedmakers with them. Their Beds were not only furnished with costly Curtains, but their Rooms hung with curious Aslessor Hange Hangings of Purple and other Colours, drawn with Images as our modern fort of Tapestry. These Hangings the Greeks called Aulau, and the Romans from them ; but because many such were found in the Palace of Arralus King of Asia who made the People of Rome his Heire, they imagined them to named from his Aula or Court. Indeed Actalus, as Pling writes, first mixed Gold with them, and thence fuch golden Tapistry might well be called Attalica, But the Babylonians invented the variety of Colours interwoven, and their City to that fort gave a Name. The Phrygians first wrought that kind with a Needle, which received the name of Phygians. In the word with many Licia called Polymita were wrought at Alexandria. In conclusion the Persans used Carpets not only for hangings on their Wall; but to tread off upon their Floores. Of Oilitments they had good flore; especially in their Baths, where they had Slaves to attend them, as all fo to carry them on their Shoulders, and what not; being as Minimians describes them crafty both in Prosperity and Adversity, Proud, Cruel, and exercising the

And though they did not as Annians tells us, make use of Boyes, yet was: there no natural shame amongst them, but they would marry or lye with their they frequently made use of which afforded no pleasant smell, and that was Garlick, wherewith they even filled their Kitchins, thinking that thereby Serpents and on the renemous things were driven away. When the Table was uncovered, what own Mothers and Sifters. And that they might lawfully fo do with their Mothers, Sect. 4 was the opinion of their Magi, though Alexander when he had conquered them removed this inceftuous course, allowing them well to reverence but not marry their Mothers. The custom of marrying their Sisters it's faid they received from the Affricans, and however that of Mothers was forbidden by Alexander, yet this of Sifters was propagated even to the Macedonian Race of Ptolemies in Egypt, where it continued the ordinary practice of these Kings to marry their Sisters, and to receive the Kingdom with them by the appointment of their Fathers. But however Alexander carried himself in this matter, Agathias complains of the Persians of his time, (after that of fultinian) not only for lying with their own Mothers, Coulins, and Sifters, but with their own daughters also: The ordinary time of marrying was at the vernal Æquinoctial; before the Bridegroom went to bed, he eat an Apple or some marrow of a Camel, neither did he tast any other food on his wedding yet were they given to Jealousie over both, and nothing did they punish more than Adultery; yet also were they antiently given to Boys, if Herodotus be to be credited; however Ammianus acquits them of that Vice: Nay it's faid that Gelding of Boys proceeded from them, as also the Name of Spadones from Spada a Village where Castration first began; though some also fetch this Extravagance from the Allyrians and Medians: Ammianus writing that Semiramis first offered this violence and injury to Males. To the custody of these Eunuchs they committed not only their Wives and Concubines, but also their Male Children. That they might omit nothing of pleasure they were also delighted with Musick; and the better to consult their ease they rarely went asoot, but either rode on Horseback or in Chariots. Riding, yet by their Ancestors as one of their principal Exercises for War, was used not for laziness, but to facilitate great and honourable Atchievements, but they turned it into fo great a fort of Luxury, that they burthened the Beafts they rode on with Saddles and Trappings, laying more Tapestry upon them than on their beds, though they also were furnished so as best to conduce to the pleasure of soft & delicate lying. Moreover the women were carried up and down in Litters, and a fort of Chariot they called Armana wont to be drawn by Mules; but so close shut up as not to be seen. These also were adorn'd with costly Carpets and Tapestry, and adorn'd with Gold or Silver: For the middle fort of Persians flowing with Luxury, their wealth consisted rather in coftly Furniture than in money; they gloried in Gold and Silver Veffels. and if any was in difgrace with the King, he was to be ferved in Earthen ware. In imitation of the Royal Paradifes they diligently planted and cultivated their Gardens, fet with Trees both of Fruit and pleafant shade, not only in rows and Walks but Groves and Wildernesses for the Summer season. That they planted Vineyards is also believed, and at first they were generally Artificers and given unto manual labour; but as Luxury crept in, Artificers began to be despised, when they had applied themselves (or the better fort of them) to the practice of Arms. Yet notwithstanding were not such Arts as were necesfary for subsistence and pleasure laid down and utterly neglected, for that both Husbandry and Handycraft Trades should diligently be exercised, it was the work of Presidents of Provinces acurately to see, as also Governors of Cities and but in room of that they kiffed, and if they were of equal degree they kiffed the Mouth, if of unequal he who was chiefeft in dignity offered his Cheek to be kiffed by the other: Indeed if one of meanest condition had occasion to accort a Person of Quality, he fell down and did him reverence. But none they effected fo much as their Neighbours, and by the diffance from themselves they measured all the goodness of the Inhabitants of the Earth, valuing their next/Neighbours most, and those least who were most removed from them: And yet they abominated all Leprous and scabby Persons, suffering them not to abide in their Cities, though they might have an Eagles Nose as they say Cyrus had, whom they prized above all Mortals. All Persians were a Tiera, and when they would salute to purpose, they would take Their Cloaths that Cap from their Heads, in reverence of the Persons whom they saluted: They used a loose and large Vest reaching to their Ankles, and taken from the Medes, the stole of whom was usually of that called Sericam. They wore also an inward Tunick which they called Candys, and hanging down from their Shoulders had fleeves to it! and was, as they pleased, of divers colours. To keep them yet more warm, they had another fort of Garment called Cannaces: they work not only Sleeves but

The women wore large and laced Girdles, and the Nation had a fort of Shooe peculiar to it felf, elegant enough in the times of Luxury; though at first, as in all other things, ill accoutred in this particular. They delighted to appear gay in their Necklaces of Pearl, their Bracelets and Chains of Gold adorned with precious frones. As this cuftom they took from the Medians, fo of the Lydians they learn'd to bore their Ears, and thereat to hang Gems and other things then in fashion, as the Lybians also were wont to do. They not only loved to have their hair long, but to Nature added Art, wearing Periwigs or adventitious hair, which they also learn'd of the Medes, as they did to paint their faces and to colour their Eyebrows. In case of mourning they rent their hair from their heads, and tore their Clothes; nay we read that they would also cause their Horses and Cattel to be like them by making bare their hides. They also had their proper mourning weeds, and yet their women esteemed it the most contumelious thing imaginable, to put their hands to the dreffing, spinning, or ordering of Wool. 39. Of their Tribunals and form of Judicature, we have already spoken. If the

fentence given against a Malefactor was Capital, it was executed either by Beheading, Crucifying, Burning, Burying alive, Fleaing, or Stoning. Beheading was a favour indulged to the Nobler fort, but it was not done with an Axe after the fashion of the Romans and the English, nor with a Sword as most Nations of Europe practice, but with a Razor or a Knife as the Spaniards cut the Throats of their Nobility with a crooked Instrument, and together with the Head the Right Hand was alfo cut off, and fometimes fixed to a Gibbet. They were wont also to Nail even Great Men to Croffes, though fometimes not till after their Heads were off; and this fort of punishment Alexander, after his Conquest, inflicted upon several Satrapa themfelves. Such as they flea'd alive they fometimes cast to the Dogs, and making bottles of their Skins hung them up high. There were yet other forts of Punishments which we have related in the History of Persia, as the flatting of the Heads of Prisoners between two Stones; and the device of the Boat, and forcing the Party to eat honey and milk by pricking the Eyes with Needles, as the Reader may remember. But these Punishments were inflicted for those they esteemed the most grievous offences. For still lighter crimes they had lighter censures, as Exile, Mutilation of Members, as of Nofe, Ears, Hands, or Feet, which they too ordinarily executed upon their Greek and Roman Prisoners, and branded them in the Body: Sometimes they digged out the eyes of noxious Persons, and so Princes were wont to serve their Competitors. Besides, some they noted with Infamy, as by taking from them the trimming of their hair which they esteemed as the greatest Ornament. Of others they confiscated the Estates; and for a perfect discovery they were wont to examine guilty persons by torture. 40. But the greatest punishment of all was that which being inflicted for the high-

High Treason est offence, extended to the greatest latitude of Persons. This was, when for high Treason committed against the Prince, all the Kindred or Relations suffered together with the Malefactor. This the Persian Kings practised though so severe, and yet some of them, particularly Artaxerxes Longimanus, was so full of humanity that as Ammianus Marcellinus writes, when delinquents were to be punished, in room of their heads he would cause their Trave to be cut off, and instead of their Ears the strings that hung down from their Caps upon them. The greatest affront they esteemed it to be termed more cowardly and lazy than a woman, and the greatest indignity to be forced to ride on the bare back of an Afs. They were to be commended for this, that their faith they usually kept inviolable. So respective were they to their Kings, that they strowed Flowers and Garlands in the ways where they were to pass, as they did also upon occasion of publick rejoycing. Their ordinary Coin was called Staters: one fort was framped with the Image of Darius, and thence the pieces had the name of Daricks, though some also with that of an Archer, according to the jest of Agesilaus, when he departed home out of Asia. These were probably of Gold; but in after times the Persian Kings only coined Silver money. In

For that cause, when young, they learn'd and practised Riding, Shooting, and casting Darts, and Hunting, which they esteemed as more than a resemblance of a Battel. When any Army was to be raised, Orders were given out to some Satrapa for this purpose. Their Soldiers they called in their own Language Cardaces, as some say from a Country, others from Carda fignifying a Lot. Herodian writes, that in his time

had got by booty or plunder. But Ammianus Marcellinus observes in his days, that for their Military Methods, Discipline and Exercises, or Trainings, they were to be feared even by the greatest Armies; trusting in the valour of their Horse, wherein all the Nobility and the splendor of the Nation was concerned. As for the Foot, they being covered with their Targets like fo many Mirmillones or Sword-players, Mirmillones obeyed orders rather like fo many Scullions or the vilest fort of men; and always camaders fur reobeyed orders rather has unany sentences this multitude followed as condemned to perpetual flavery, neither ever being fip. Befides, faith he, this Nation over and above thole it long four treehath abundantly conquered, had fent many others under the Yoak, so bold and skil-refile ac genuinful it was in Martial Contests, if it had not been constantly vexed with civil and foreign Wars. What he faith of the Persian Foot is attested by others who make the Infantry inconfiderable, and rather thought to ferve and attend the Horfe, though for this purpose they will have the women also taken along in expeditions.

43. As for their Arms they wore Acinaces or Daggers, hanging at their Girdles upon their Right Thighs: In their hands they carried their Copides, which were Scimiters or Swordsmade crooked something like Sickles, and otherwise called Sagares, which it's faid was also the weapon of the Amazons: But for defence of his Body, the Persian Soldier wore a Breastplate of Brass or Iron (or both) made with joynts like fins or scales of Fishes; and well might Ammianus write that their Foot covered themselves like so many Myrmillones; for the Persians had their Gerra or Targets made of Wickers fo large, that they might cover their whole Bodies, like to those used by the Romans and Galls. A fort of missile weapon or Dart they had also called Paltum, made of the Cornus Tree as were Arrows and other things. Under their Gerra or Targets hung their Quivers at their Shoulders full of Arrows, Herodian reporting, that in his time they came not abroad without their Bows; and their Succeffors the Parthians herein did so succeed, that if possible they exceeded them in the practice; for not only their Foot but their Horsemen had their Arrows hanging by them; and not only in their pursuit but against pursuers themselves when running away, they were wont to let them fly. They made use, moreover of Slings for throwing of Stones, and those of a considerable bigness. Ordinarily they wore no Helmets, but their own Tears which was their Ornament for the Head both at home and abroad; and so were for their Thighs their Bracca or Breeches, which they used in, as well as out, of Fight.

44. But

Sect. 5. Horfes they cheifly used.

44. But their chief Refuge as well as Delight (which Ammianus hints) was in their Horse; and their Delight contributed to their Refuge. For while they were fober and industrious, they so used themselves to riding, that never were they to be seen on foot, but if feasted, if they went upon publick or private business, if to the market, to meet, discourse or talk, if Freemen, they went on Horseback. But, as all good Institutions are wont to degenerate, this Riding afterwards was only used for Pompe and show, when more Trappings and Tapestry were laid upon a Horle than was wont to be put upon a Bed or in a Chariot. And golden Bridles, he who had not, was out of the Eashion either at home or in the War. In a Word, whereas at first the Nobility were they that composed the Cavalry, afterwards Cooks, Victuallers, Bath-holders and fuch like were fuffered to lift themselves in the Troops, after that Luxury and excess crept in amongst them from the Medes. And as from the Medes they received their Luxury and particularly in riding, though possibly not riding it self as some have written, so the

The best out of best Horses they were wont to ride. For in Media was Nifaum, where the Nifean Horses were bred, the goodliest of all others that were to be seen in the East: those of India being nothing comparable to them; and though great as they were, yet what is wonderful, they excelled in fwiftness as well as bulke. And some bulke it was necessary they should have, both to bear the burthen of their Riders fo armed as they were at all points, and to support their own Armour wherewith they themselves were also covered, framed after the manner of Scales of Fishes on their Fronts and Breafts, if for the Sadle; and their Sides, if they drew at the Chariot. The Horsemen thus accounted the Greeks called Cataphracti, but the Perfians Clibanarii.

45. But not only did they fight from Horfes, but also from Chariots, which differed too according to the use and imployment they had for them. For some were adorned with Gold and Silver; and others were armed with Sythes and fuch crooked and cutting Irons as fastened to the Body, Axletree and Wheels, were intended for cutting and tearing all they met in their paffage, being governed by two Horsemen, who with Ropes fastened to them, erected and let them fall as they faw convenient. By their long use of this fort of armed Chariots, they shewed that they were not ineffectual in War, but by reason of their carelessines in managing them, and the unskillfulness of the Drivers, they often did them more harm than good; and the Romans, however once a Terror, made them no better than a laughing Stock, finding them eafily overturned by the inequality of the ways, and especially by casting Loggs and other Impediments before them. But in some of them the Persians were wont to carry their Impediments, viz. their Wives and Children, their Mothers and Concubines, pretending that the fight of these dear Relations would provoke them to Fight for their prefervation. Some write that above all things, the King took care for Forage, and all necessaries for their Armies before they fet forward, which ordinarily were carried upon the Backs of Camells.

46. The order and method of their March, was this as it is described by Quintheir March. tus Curtius. It was their custome to set forward when the Sun was first risen. Then warning was given from the Kings Pavilion by a Trumpet, and by an Image of the Sun inclosed in Chrystal placed so on the Top, as it might be seen glistering by all. The Fire which they termed Sacred and Eternal, was borne before on filver Altars, being followed by the Magi, who fung some of the Songs of their Country. And the Magi were followed by three hundred and fixty five young Men, as equal to the Days of the Year in Number, covered with Purple Vestments. Then followed the Chariot Sacred to Fupiter drawn by white Horses, behind which came an Horse of extraordinary greatness, called the Horse of the Sun, and those that drove or led the Horses, had in their Hands golden Rods, and were clothed in White. Not far from them marched ten Chariots very rich in Gold and Silver workemanship. And next to the Chariots a party of Horse of twelve Nations, differing in Armes as in other Fashions. Then were to be seen the Troop of them called Immortal's confifting of ten Thouland, excelled by no Barbarians in the wealth and splendor of their Accourrements: they were adorned with Chains of Gold, wore Clothes imbroidered with that rich Metal; and their fleeved Coats gliftered with Gemms. Behind them, at a little distance came those called the Kings Kinsmen, being fifteen thousand Persons, who had the Name also of Doryphori, or Spearbearers, though accoutred rather like Women than Men, and in their Arms being Effeminate.

47. Next to them went a Troop of Men who were to take up the Kings Robe:

They went before the Chariot wherein he fate aloft; the fides of which were fet Sect. out with the Images of their Gods, the Yoake was adorned with gliftering Gemms, and from the Axletree stood up two golden Images, each of the length of a Cubit, whereof one bore the refemblance of Belus. There was the shape of an Eagle stretching out it's Wings. The Kings Apparrel was throughout notable for Luxury. He had his Purple Tunick with white Spots. Golden Haukes as if falling together with their Beaks, adorned his golden imbroidered Palla. At his golden Girdle, wherewith he was Effeminately girt, hung his Dagger which had a Gemm for its Scabbard, and the royal Ornament of his Head, which they called Cidaris, was compassed with a blew Circle studded with white. Ten thousand Spearemen followed the Chariot, who had their Spears adorned with Silver, and bore Darts headed with Gold. On the right and left hand of him went about two hundred of the most Noble of his Relations, behind followed thirty thousand Foot, and after them were led four hundred of the Kings Horses. At a furlong distance Sifygambis the Mother of Darius was drawn in one Chariot, and in another his Wife. The Troops of Women that attended the Queens, rode on horseback. Then came fifteen Cariages they called Armamaxa wherein were the Kings Children with those that brought them up, and a company of Eunuches no ways despicable in those Nations; then the Kings Concubines three hundred and fixty in number, in Royal Apparrel and Furniture. After them fix hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels carried the Kings Money, being guarded with a party of Archers. Near to them marched the Wives of the Kings Kinsmen and Friends; then rode Flocks of Lacquies and mean Attendants. And the Rear was brought up by feveral Troops of light armed men, headed by their feveral

48. The Army in its March having not always Cities Townes or Mansions The manner of wherein to lodge, great Care was taken for its Incamping. For fafety and defence, by the multirudes of Hands, they eafily cast up a Trench, and sometimes fortified it by Wood and Stones, but always inclosed themselves with their Cariages. In the Camp, to all forts of Officers both Military and other, places were affigned, and the feveral Tents of Command had their Markes and Tokens fixed upon them, whereby they might be diffinguished, and called out upon occasion. The Kings Pavilion was as his Court at home, having its feveral Rooms and Appartments wonderful for wealth and bravery; and fo proportionably were the Tents of the Satrana and great Men, who had their Sumpter-horses for conveyance of all forts of rich Furniture into the Field. And they delighted to be as Rich and Gay in their Clothes, as in the Furniture of their Tents. They took with them their golden Chaines and Bracelets. The Scabberds of their Swords were adorned with Gemms. Their Trappings and Bridles were of Gold, so that as Alexander told his Men they rather bore Booty for the Conquerors, then Armes to Fight , fo Luxurious they were even in the most serious Actions of their Life, when degenerated.

49. Ordinarily their Armies were raised out of their own Countryes, vet sometimes they also took in Auxiliaries of the Greeks. Their Soldiers were divided into Tenns, Sixes, Twenty foures, Hundreds, Thousands and ten Thousand; for, Commanders of all these are to be found in Writers; they had also besides their Foot-Officers, Commanders of Horfe, particularly three in the Army of Xerxes. There were Commanders of Chariots and of the Harmamaxa wherein the Women or Baggage were carried. The Kings were wont carefully to muster their Men: and to take an account of their Numbers. The last Darins followed the device of Xerxes, practifed at Dorifens, to make a place which should contain ten thousand, and by filling the place, measure out his Soldiers as Grain or any other forts of things are measured. When the Persian Kings proposed to make War upon or invade any Country, they were wont after the manner of the Babylonians to fend to demand Earth and Water to be fent them, as Symbolls or Tokens of Subjection and fervitude, those two things composing the places of which they challenged the Dominion. With what disdain the Athenians and Lacedemonians received this Message we have seen, and how they treated the Great Kings Ambassadors. Such as fent the Symbolls owned him as their Lord and Soveraign; as the Handers, Amyntas of Macedonia and some others were forced to do.

50. What number of Animals the Kings were wont to carry along in their Expeditions, we have feen sufficiently in the History of their Warrs. Ammianus writes that they themselves were not obliged to, be in Battells ; but that Darius in Person fought against Alexander we read, and that he was armed with his Dag-

Before they joyned, the Persians were accustomed to make a confused and terrible Noise. The Word was given by the Commander in Cheif, and Orders as well by other fignes as word of Mouth; as when Sapor fet upon a City he erected a red Flagg, as a Token that then his Men should fall on. Proceeded to But the Royal Enligne or Standard is reported to have been an Eagle fitting on a Pelta or a short Target made like an half Moon. Carefully were the wounded provided for by Officers, whose peculiar charge and care it was. Such as fought fourly were bountifully rewarded, those that died for their Country honourably remembred, and on the contrary Ammianus tells us they had Laws bitter and fevere against Desertors. Some of their Kings would be cruel to such Enemies as vete against Deteriors. Some of their miles would be that to make a similar before their Hands; and propose Rewards to fuch as would bring them alive. Of Wiles and Stratagems in War they knew little, as thinking it a differenceful of which and outdangering in via they are much as unitaring in a uniquate in thing to feal a Victory; Yet did they keep fuch careful Watch, that they could not be furprized, who to preserve themselves awake, sing Songs in the Night concerning the Justice and Felicity of their Princes. As for Scouting, the Persian, in diligence and fecrecy, feem to have excelled all others.

51. So defirous they appear to have been of War, that in their Paintings and Landskips, fearcely any thing but Battles and Slaughters of Men or wild Beafts acked Towns. tacked Towns, and also of Mines, not to blow up the Walls as fince the use of Gunpowder hath been prachifed, but to open Passages within them, that they might enter the be-fieged places. Of the Balista, Scorpions and other fort of Machines used by them Ammianus and others make mention. But, instead of our Wildfire they had several Oiles which would do the same Execution, one fort made of an Indian Worm, which as Ælian writes, being shot in earthen Vessels against the Gates of a Town, would fet them on Fire: and another called the Oyl of Media or Naphta, in their own Language, a Bituminous matter, which burning could not be extinguished with any thing but Dust, as neither the Oyl of the Indian Worm with any thing but any tuning out Juni, as including the state of the state of the state of Townes they made use also of Traps to catch the besieged; and of Moriees, or peices of Iron soursquare with Pricks to hinder the Paffage of their Horfe. 52. For defence and Offence at Sea, the Perfians had their long Ships, their

On their Borders they had strong Castles on high and scarcely accessible Hills very Strongly fortified, which had their several Governours, whose fole work it was to look unto them. But in Winter they abstained from War, as impatient of Cold. Observable it is that when they Adopted, it was not by words or writing, but by arming the Persons to be adopted. Commendable it was that the Kings took it in distain that their Subjects should be Slaves any where, and therefore fuch as were taken in War, they readily redeemed. In conclution, after thirty Years of Service performed, when fifty Years old, the Perfans obtained an honourable Miffion.

53. Peace is the end of War, and this the Perfian Kings might sometimes be obliged by the badness of their Success to admit of. Sometimes with Presents they would contract Amity and Friendship with the Kings their Neighbours, as How they con- Cambyles with him of the Ethiopians. Sometimes they would make a League, and then the Ceremony was performed after this manner: A Goate, a Bull, a and then the Ceremony was performed aner this manner: A Goate, a bun, a Wolfe and a Ram was killed, and the Blood being put into a Target, the Greeks dipped therein a Sword, and the Perfuns a Spear. But as we faid, had they fill had Peace with their Neighbours, we had heard little of them; They would fearcely have borne a share in our Hiftery of the World. For notwithflanding this Policy of theirs extolled by Xenophon, so illiterate were they that we had had little or nothing of their Affaires communicated to us, had not their Actions been with the Greeks; from the Penns of whom we receive what account we have of them; not trufting to other pretended Hiftories faid of late to have been taken out of their Archives.

54. But by way of Agypt and Greece, many things and words of Perfun Original have been communicated to the western World. Some Fruits have thence things came out of Profesia arrived in Europe: As the Peach, by some called Nux Mollusca, but ordinarily in Latin Malum Persicum, said to have been brought into Greece by those that followed Mexander in his Expedition. That the Walnut, especially the better fort, allfo came out of Persia, Pliny believed, from the Greek Names of Persicum and Bafilicon given to it. The Limon or Cirron, also grew in that Country, though in

Allyria and Media in greater abundance as should appear by its Names of Malum Allyrium and Medium. Athenaus also writes that the Cocks called by the Latines Gallus Gallinaceus, first came out of Persia, and was dispersed into other Regions: being by the Greeks called the Persian Bird. But that learned men interpret Atheneus concerning this Cock, I should rather have thought it to have been the Turky. that Bird which hath feveral Names in feveral Languages, each Nation calling him by that Country out of which it thinks it first received him. For though we call him a Turky (as any man coming out of that vast Empire a Turk) yet the French, and others a Cock of India. From India to Persia there was good access, Athenaus also relates that out of Media the neighbouring Country, Pheasans sirst were brought, being kept by Ptolomy King of Mexandria in his Palace. Shall we mention that Persian Skinns elegantly painted, were much prized in other Countries, and made use of by the Persians themselves, in their dining Roomes? 55. Besides Things, several Persian Words have arrived in Europe, whereof fome have been used even by Greeks and Romans, to fignify what they could not otherwise, it seems, so well express. For Gaza, though used for Treasure, is a Persian word, and so is Paradise, with which even Sacred Writers thought fit to ferve themselves. Many other there are ordinarily known, though rarely or scarcely used for any thing but what they properly fignified in Perfa. Such were Satrapa, Paralanga, Tiara, Candys, and many others which ignified the County of t fied the Sun in the Persian Language; Xerxes Martial or a Warrious, and Artaxerxes a great Warriour, or, as Ammianus interprets it, a Conqueror of Battells as Achemenes a Commander of Kings, for by both thefe the Persians in his time stiled Sapor their King, when they ecchoed out his Name in the Army. The Generals of their Armies some say were called Megabyzi. N the time of Cyrus the Great, and afterwards, lived Polycrates the famous Tyrant of Samus, who from a small beginning arrived at such extraordinary power, as no petty Prince of the Greekifb Nation was ever accounted equal to him for wordly Felicity.

2 The word Tyrannus (which we English Tyrant) Suidas thinketh Tyrans. to have been derived from the Tyrhem, a people of Italy, because they were cruel and given to Robbery. Others thought it was derived of the City Tyre, by means of it's Riches and Glory. Most anciently the word was of no ill

Tyre) either knew it not or would not use it, yet the Poets who follow him, call those Kings that lived before the Trojan times by the appellation of Tyranni. Afterwards through the dissolute and cruel demeanour of some Princes, and the ansipathy of the Greeks towards Monarchy (after they had generally erected Oligarchical or Democratical Governments) it came to be taken in a bad fence. Herein it is especially given to those who, being once private persons, enslaved their Citizens by invading without any just Title the supreme power; as to Polycrates, Pifistratus, Dionysius, and Apathocles. It's also applied to the Children who succeeded their Fathers in the usurpation; and it is also given fometimes to these who governed by the defire and confent of the People, as Gelon of Syracufe, betokening as to this particular, a perty Prince of Regulus: For it is feldom or never in ancient Authors, when it is taken in an ill sence, found applied to any but the usurping Lords of Cities (not any notable Kingdom) and fuch Cities as had before been governed in the way of a Commonwealth. And what is faid of those Governors called Tyranni, must be extended to their Government, in the Greek Language called Tyrannis, which we English Tyranny, though not in any ill sence wherein the Athenians used it not when they would have Solon to take the Fyrannis or Government upon him, though the word was harfh. This is hinted to take off any thoughts of the ignorant, as if the word reflected upon Monarchy, the best of Governments when all shall be confidered.

3. Samus is an Island in the Mediterranean Sea, lying over against Ionia, not far vid. Strahman fevered from it, containing in circuit fearce an hundred miles, fo called from the 1-14. heighth of it by the Ancients in their language. On the West it looks towards the Island Icaria, but on the East the continent of Mia, being near to Eppelus, and the

and afterward promontory of Mycale, from which it is diffant but five Miles. The most antient Inhabitants were Carians differing much from the Greek's both in Language and Manners. But when the Sons of Codrus led out Colonies from Attica, Androclus Vid. Manalid. one of them here fetled one, by which the City of the same name with the Illand was built; having a very large and commodious Haven. It was presently much beautified with frequency of Inhabitants, Riches, and multitudes of Buildings, and being very famous for the Temple of Funo, which was especially worshipped in this place, it was reckoned amongst the twelve Ionian Cities, being partaker of the great Council of Panionium, and counted not inferior to Miletus, Ephelus, or Chius, the most eminent amongst them. From Herodotus it should appear to Liv. 3. have at first been governed by Kings, the Inhabitants as he faith, in the Reign of Amphicrates, making War upon Agina which was hurtful to both fides: and this was the cause that in the Age following the Æginetans did as much by the Samian exiles which had retired into Crete. But in what Age Amphicrates lived he doth not mention; yet this is apparent from his words, that the Samians because Islanders remained untouched by the King of Lydia and Persia, when the other Ianian Cities in the Continent were forced by them into fubjection. 4. But when Cyrus flourished in Asia, and Pifistrates at Athens, Polycrates the Horodon lib. Son of Acces one of their own Citizens offered violence to their liberty. When 3. 49. 39. first he seized on the Soveraignty, he made his two Brothers Pantagnotus and Sylofon partners with him, but afterwards he flew the one, and ejected the younger,

Polymans his and fo having all the Power in his own Hands, he contracted amity with Amalis, who at that time reigned in Ægypt. In a short time his Affairs so prospered, that he became famous through Ionix and all Greece, for wherefoever he made War he prospered, with his hundred Biremes or Gallies with two ranks of Oares on a fide, and one thousand Archers, invading all his Neighbours without any difference, for that he held it for a Rule, that he gratified his Friend more by restoring what he had taken from him, than if he had taken nothing away. He subdued many Islands and many Towns in the Continent. The Lesbians coming to help their Friends of Miletus with all their Force, he overthrew, and took so many, as served him to draw a Dirch round about the Walls of Samus. His Affairs being thus prosperous, were not unknown to Amasis, but being every day more prosperous than other, at length Amasis suspected that his Friend and Allie, for this prosperous Fortune would have fome disaffrous end, and therefore he wrote to him, and defired him that to make fome certain Change therein, he would pick out that which was most dear to him, and in the loss whereof he would be most troubled, and make that away, to that he should never more enjoy it. He accordingly took ship and cast into the Sea his Signet, which was an Emrala fet in a gold Ring; but it so hapened, that a Fisher taking a very large fish, presented it to him as only worthwof it, and in the Belly of it his Servants, when they cut it up, found the Signet. Ariafis hearing this, took fuch affurance that an unfortunate end must follow, such prodigious success, that lest he should be troubled with the miscariage of a Friend and Allie, he renounced his friendship. 5. When Cambyfee was railing his Forces for his Expedition into Agypt, Poly

The Corinthians, were also drawn in, having a particular quarrel of their own , the occasion was also given at the same time, the Samiani having taken from the Corinthians certain, Boyes which they were carrying from Periander their Tyrant to Alyattes King of Sardis to be made Eunuches.

6. The Lacedemonians coming with a great Fleet to Samus, belieged the City. but endeavouring the florming of it were repulfed with some loss, and having in vain spent forty days in the Siege (fo valiantly was it defended by Polycrates) they then returned home into Pelaponnesus. A Story went, that Polycrates stamped some Lead, and covering it over with Gold, with it purchased the departure of the Lacedamonians; but this was the first Expedition which the Dores made against Afia. Afterwards at such time as Cambyles fell fick; that fell upon Polycrates which Amalis had forewarned him of .; At this time one Orates a Persian was governoun of Sardis, Ionia, Lydia, and the Sea-coasts, in the place of Harpagus, who either for that he was upbraided that he got not Samus, to near to his Province, into the King's hand, or for that Polycrates slighted and gave no answer to a Messenger which he fent to him (both which are reported) fought earnestly to work his destruction. Knowing he had an Ambition to become Master of Ionia and the Islands, he fent to him to tell him that he heard how excellent things he cast in his Head, but that he wanted Money to accomplife them, wherefore he having now. heard for certain that Cambyles determined to kill him, offered to him, that if he would receive him, he should have half of the King's money which he had in his possession, whereby he might get the Soveraignty of all Greece. And if he doubted of his faithfulness, he desired him to send one of his most trusty Servans to whom he would give fatisfaction.

and to make the thing fure, fent Meandrius his Secretary over to Orates, who knowing him a cunning and circumspect Man, filled several Chests with Stones, and covering them at the top with Gold, thereby deceived him. Polycrates was yet diffuaded by all his Friends from going over himfelf, for that the Oracles were againft it, and his Daughter dreamed that the faw him up aloft in the Air, where he was washed by Fupiter, and anointed by the Sun; but he was angry with her for her importunity, and notwithstanding all diffwasions went over to Orates, taking with him amongft others, Democedes the Son of Calliphon of Crotone in Italy, the most famous Physician then in his Country. He went over into Magnefia as far as the River Maander, and then Orates laving hold of him, nailed him to a Cross. Of those that accompanied him, the Samians he dismissed, telling them that they must account it for a great Favour so to be used by him, but all the Strangers and Slaves he took to himself, and reduced them into the State of fervitude. This end had Polycrates, with whom none of the Syracufian Tyrants, or any other of Greece for magnificence were to be compared. Him succeeded one Maandrius his Vicegerent or Procurator, of whom Herodotus telleth many Stories, and who by the help of Otanes the Persian Satrapa, being removed by the approbation of Darius the Son of Hystapes, Syloson the Brother of Polycrates fucceeded, Samus paying very dearly for it, what by the War, and the enfuing feverity of Syloson. When Syloson died, A gees his Son succeeded him, by the favour of the Persians; but was not long after thrust from his Tyranny, when Aristagoras the Milesiandrew all Ionia into rebellion against the Persians; which happed about the eighteenth year of Darius.

> 9. In the third Year of the fixty fix Olympiad, and the eighth of the Reign of Darius, fell out great stirs at Athens, which never ceased till they produced a change in the Government. Pifistratus the famous Tyrant at his death left three Sons, Hippias, Hippharcus, and Theffalus, and the principality (as it should seem from * * De Politica Heraclides) to them all; though Hippias, as the eldest, had supream Jurisdiction. He had hitherto for the space of thirty years enjoyed his Fathers Kingdom, being Hist. 116. 8. loving and affectionate towards his brethren, and moderate towards his Subjects: thursdides Hipparchus was accounted a wife man, and lover of learning, being fomething lib. 5. given to be amorous, and Theffalus bold, and head-ftrong. It hapned that Hipparcus fell in love with one Harmodius, a young man of the City, and forely fol-licited him to unlawful dalliance, who therewith acquainted one Aristogiton, a man Stirs at Athens. of a middle rank amongst the Citizens, and who most passionately loved him. He fearing he should be deprived of this his dear one, consulted with himself how he might destroy, both Hippharcus and the Tyranny. Hipparchus still going on to sollicite Harmodius, but in vain, at length resolved to be revenged on him, and executed it on his Sifter, which being on a certain folemnity to carry up the Basker that was to be dedicated to Minerva, he put her by as unworthy of the Office; though some of late have thought that he ravished her. 10. Harmodius taking this in very evil part, and Aristogiton much worse, prepared all things necessary for their Conspiracy; but expected the great Feast called Panathenaa, on which day only the Citizens might be in Armour without fuspition, for discharging the Solemnity. They provided not many men before hand, for the more close carrying of the business, and because they hoped all the rest would without any hesitation be ready to come into them. When the day came, they and their party being ready with their Poniards, espied a man talking with Hippias; Whereupon they thought they were discovered, and therefore refolved to do that, wherein especially they were concerned, if they could, and Hipphareus flain fo rushing in violently upon Hipphareus, they slew him in the place. Aristogiton by Hamodius defended himfelf for fome time from the Guard; but the multitude flocking in, and drifted him to the wastaken, after he had received many Wounds, and his friend Hamodius flain he wastaken, after he had received many Wounds. he was taken, after he had received many Wounds, and his friend Harmodius flain outright. Hippias having notice of what had passed, came cunningly upon the Citizens that were armed for the Solemnity, and by his Guard picking out fuch as had Daggers about them, or whom he suspected, thereby prevented at this time all further trouble.

11. Hitherto he and his brethren had not been diffruftful of their own fafety, and of the Piffirst therefore had used no great Guards about them; not rendring their Power very tide, in the burthensom to the people, but acting according to the Rules of Vertue and Prudence. They exacted only the twentieth part of the publick Revenue, exceedingly beautified the City, waged War, and left the Citizens to their former Laws; only some one of them was alwaies Magistrate, and other men held of them yearly Offices, Pisstratus the Son of Hippias, and Nephew to the founder of this Kingdom, as it appeareth from Thucydides, having fometimes had the Power in his Hands. But Hippias after this, fearing himfelf, exercifed his Power very feverely against the Athenians, putting many of them to death, and to establish himfelf by forein alliance he gave his Daughter in marriage to Hippoclus, the Son of Eantedes the Tyrant of Lampfacus, knowing them to be in great grace with Darius King of Persia. To find out the complices of these two young men, he tortured, amongst others, a woman named Leana the Paramour of Aristogiton, but she was so constant as to endure all, and biting off her Tongue, spicit in the Face of the Tormentors, lest therewith she should discover any one; in memory of which the Athenians afterwards Confecrated in the Castle a Lionesse without a Tongue, as also Erected Statues to the memory of Harmodius and Aristogiton, as the liberators of their Countrey. These Statues were taken away by Xerxes into Asia, and long after sent back by Alexander, or Antiochus, or Seleucus, as is feverally feverally delivered by Historians. They also Decreed that their Names should never be given to any Slaves.

12. Though these two did not actually produce the freedom of Athens, but perished in the attempt, yet it was attributed to them, because that in the fourth year after, some imitating their Example expelled Hippias, and effectually procured it. At this time the Alemaonida (or those of the Family of Alemaon, who was great Herodotus lib. 5. Grand-son to Nestor, and being cast out of Messenia by the Heraclida, came and cap. 62. 406. lived at Athens) being driven into exile by the Pififtratida (or Pififtratus his Sons) having fometimes endeavoured in vain the recovery of their Countreys liberty, still lay in wait for a more convenient opportunity to accomplish it. Being full of Money, they hired the Amphystiones to let them build a new Temple at Delphos, which was very magnificent, and corrupted the Pythia (or the woman that received and delivered the Oracles, flanding in a Tripos, or three footed Stool) as often as any of Sparta came thither, still to propose to them to set Athens at liberty. This being constantly done, the Lacedamonians accounted it a piece of their Religion to do it, and fent Anchimolius, a man of prime Rank amongst them, with an Army to expell the Pififtratide, though their Friends, and fuch as had deferved no otherwise than well of them. They being aware of this, had contracted friendship and alliance with the Thessalians, and now procured from them a supply of one thousand Horse, which by a common Decree they sent under the Command of Cixeas their King, which falling in upon the Camp of the Spartans, flew amongst many others Auchimolius the General, and beat the other to their Ships, in which they returned home.

13. Afterwards the Lacedamonians fent another Army by Land, under the Conduct of Cleomenes the Son of Anaxandridas, who invading the Athenian Territoduct of Cleomenes the Son of Anaxanariaas, who invading the Annenian Territo-ries was encountred by the Thessalian Horse, which he put to flight, and having print cap. 64. killed above forty of them, the rest shifted away, and betook themselves as they excould into Theffaly. Cleomenes then coming up to the City besieged the Tyrants, being thut up within the Pelafgick-wall, but being unprovided for a Siege, and they furnished sufficiently with Provisions, after a few days he was about to depart The Piffirst homeward, had not one thing fallen out. As the Children of the Piffirstide were de builted privately to be conveyed out of the Convey privately to be conveyed out of the Countrey, they were intercepted, which overturned the Affairs of their Parents, and forced them to Covenant with the Athenians, for their Ranfom, within five days to depart out of Attica, which accordingly was done, Hippias going straight to Sigeus, and thence to Lamplacus, from which place he went to Darius, and in the twentieth year after returned with his Army, and died (as some say) in the Battle at Marathon. Signers was a Town fituate upon the Hellespont, which Pisstratus took by force out of the Hands of the Mityleneaus, and made Hegelistratus his base son, by a woman of Argos, Tyrant there. Hippias was offered from Amyntas the King of Macedonia, either Anthenius, or Iolios, a City in Macedonia; but he refused both, and betook himfelf to Darius, whose Army he afterwards conducted into Attica.

14. The State of Athens great before, grew greater after this grand mutation, Hunderd in which two men contended for the chief Authority: Clifthenes one of the Alema- cap 66. onide (the Nephew by his Mother of Clyfthenes, the Tyrant of Sieyon) and Ifagorss the Sonof Tisuder. Clyfthenes being too weak for the other's faction, that hemight engratisce himfelf with the people, whereas they were before divided bur into four Tribes, encreased them unto ten, and whereas formerly they were named from the four Sons of Ion, viz. Teleon, Agicor, Argadans, and Hopletes, now he changed these for other Heroes which were, I. Hippothoon the Soin of Neptune, 2. Antiochus of Hercules, 3. Ajax of Telamon, 4. theus, who flew Immaradus the Son of Euroolpus, 6. Agaus, 7. Oeneus the base Son of Pandion, 8. Acamas the Son of Thefeus, Q. Cecrops, and 10 Pandion; 15. Hagoras envying Clyfthenes that respect, which hereby he obtained, procured Cleamenes the King of Sparta (with whom he had contracted Friendship ducivil Warshes ring the War with Hippias) to come once more against Athens. He sent a Mef-Civil was be-with fagor sense first, and presently procured him to be banished, and yet came thicher with and chifteent an Army, and besides many of the Family of Aleman formerly cast our with Clyfthenes, now also expelled 700 Families proper for War, under pretence of their being contaminated with them in the bufiness of the death of Cylon. Then endeavoured he to diffolve the Senate, and commit their Power to those of Isagoras his faction; but both Senate and People relifting, Ifagoras and he with their men feized on the Caffle wherein they were besieged two days: On the third the Lace-

16. To Clyfthenes is also ascribed the introducing of the Ostracism into the Athenian State, being generally granted to have been brought in a little after the ban-Alian. Var. issument of the Pissiferatide. For, considering the Calamities which had hapned top 24, in their time, the Athenians for the time to come would have all of equal Power Pistamulis.1. By the Offracism therefore they forced absence from the City Arifield & Pa for ten Years upon the most powerful amongst them for Glory, Nobility, or Elo-nidia. quence, left they should grow too great; without any Ignominy, or difgrace; they being neither deprived of Goods, Lands, or any thing, fave their presence at home for that time. The form of it was this. Each of the Citizens wrote the Name of that man in an Ovster Shell (whence it had the name of Ostracism) who feemed to him to be the most powerful for the overturning of the Democracy, and then brought the Shell in as a fuffrage into the place defigned, and fo he that was found to have most written with his Name, was for ten years ordered to leave the City. But two conditions were required that this Judgement should stand in force: That no fewer then fix thousand should be at the meeting, and the giving of Suffrages; and that those that gave them should be no younger than fixty years old. The first that was banished by this Law, was (as Elian tells us

Clysthenes the Author of it, though (according to another) Hipparchus, and Harperration is

17. But Cleomenes the Lacedamonian King perceiving himself damnified both by Harodous lib. 5. Word and Deed from the Athenians, raised forces throughout Peloponnesus, intending (though diffembling the matter) to be revenged upon them, and fet up Ilagoras as Tyrant over them. He invaded one part, and procured the Baotians on one fide, and the Inhabitants of Chalcis on the other, to fall in upon other places. Choministo no The Athenians thus diffressed on all sides, yet first went against the Peloponnesians purpose inva- lying in Eleusine, and when the Armies were about to joyn, the Corinthians, first bethinking themselves of the injustice of their cause, withdrew themselves, and fo did Demaratus the Son of Ariston King of Sparta, and the Collegue of Cleomenes, having never differted from him formerly. Then the rest of the associates feeing that the Kings agreed not betwixt themfelves, and the Corinthians were gone, drew off also in like manner: the Athenians then to be revenged, fell upon the Baotians, of whom killing many, they took prisoners seven hundred, and then passing over into Eubea the same day, chastized the Inhabitants of Chalcis in like manner. Thus, four times the Dores out of Peloponnesus came into Attica; twice in a hostile manner, and twice to the help of the Athenians. First when they brought a Colony into Megare, which was in the time of Codrus, the second and third times to expel the Pilistratida, and now the fourth, when Cleomenes with the Peloponnesians invaded Eleusine.

The Island Atina.

18. The Thebans and the rest of the Baotians, seeing themselves too weak for the Athenians, defired help of the Inhabitants of Lgina, an Island situated in that part of the Sea, which severed Attica from Argolis, being five miles distant from the former, some eight in Circuit, and the Country of Lacus, (whence the Lacida) having a City of its own Name. The Leginetans bearing an old grudge to those of Athens, and puffed up with a conceit of their Wealth, easily imbraced their Society, and when the Athenians were busie with the other, pasfed over in their long Ships into Actice, and wasted the Coasts thereof. The Lacedamonians at this time understanding how they had been deluded by the Alomeonide their corrupting the women that gave out the Oracles, and thereby their losse both of their old Friends, and all thanks also as to the Athenians; hearing further by the Oracles which Cleamenes had brought out of the Citadel of Athens, that that State should much distress them, and especially seeing how weak it was under Tyrants, but now how it increased in strength after the recovery of its liberty, called back Hippias, refolving to reftore him. He was ready at their call. but then it happened that Solicles the Corinthian Ambassador and others of their Confederates utterly difallowed of this practice, and therefore feeing there was no hope of recovering his former Condition, he returned into Afia, and there laboured with all his might to possess Artaphernes the Satrapa of Lydia against the Athenians, that they might be conquered by Darius his Brother. They fent to Artaphernes, to defire him not to give credence to their Exiles; but as when two or three years before, when they fent to enter into fociety with the Perfians, he told them Sect. they must give Earth and Water, as symbols of subjection (which the Ambasfadors doing, were much blamed at their return) fo now he told them, if they would be fafe, they must receive Hippias. They refused the Condition, and chose rather to be professed Enemies to the Persian, and thence presently after joyned with Aristagoras, who withdrew the Ionians from their obedience, which provoked Dari-Arifagora, who wanted when, procured the Expedition of Xerxes, and the quarrel A. more to undergo the yoke, Darius in the twenty feventh year of his reign, and the third after his victory, fent into Greece to demand Earth and Water as tokens of Subjection. The Athenians and Lacedamonians threw the Messengers into a well, and bad them thence fetch Earth and Water to carry to their Master, but the Inhabitants of Ægina and other Islanders, for fear of the Perfians, promised obedience. The Athenians presently took offence thereat, as judging that the Eginetans did it out of a grudge to them, that they might fight under the conduct of the Persians against Athens, and therefore they fent to Sparta to complain of them as Traitors to Greece. Cleomenes was fent from that State, and came to Ægina, with an intention to apprehend the principal authors of the revolt; but one Crius there openly opposed him, threatning him, in case he laid violent hands on any, for that he knew he did it with out any publick decree of the Lacedemonians, who else would have fent the other King with him. This he faid at the instance of Demaratus the other betwirt clear King of Sparta, who disagreeing with Cleamenes ever since the invasion of Artica. now also grievously accused him in his absence. Hereupon Cleomenes returned home, cast out Demaratus, upon pretence of his illegitimation, from his Office, and put Lutychides his kinfman in his place. 20. The Father of Demaratus was Ariston, of the posterity of Procles, a man can be seen as worthy as any of his Ancestors; who having no children by two wives (for which cause he divorced them) to satisfie the desires of the people (which greatly wished for some iffue male from him) married a third, which already was the wife of his friend Agetus, covenanting with him for her, (she being the most beautiful woman next after Helena) which by the Laws of Lycurgus he might do. Being married, it hapned just after seven months, when he was according to the custom sitting amongst the Ephori, his houshold servant came and fignified to him that he had a Son born, with the fuddainness of which thing being disturbed, he rashly swore that it was not his, coming so much within the time. The Ephori then neglected it, and he afterwards repenting of his rashness, brought up the Child as his own, and because he was so desired by the publick wishes of the People, gave him the name of Demaratus. After his death Demaratus succeeded, a man of great worth, and who obtained a crown in the Olympick Games, which never hapned before to the Kings of Sparta. But that speech of his Father was now objected against him, by his Colleague and Emulator Cleomenes the Son of Anaxandridas, who accused him also for their retreating formerly out of Attica, which occasioned all the difference betwixt them; and all this was aggravated by Leutychides, who fought for his place, and had a private quarrel with him about a woman, of which he had hindred him by taking her to himfelf to wife

21. Great contention hence arifing, the Spartans resolved to fend to Delphos, and enquire of the Oracle whether Demaratus was the Son of Ariston; which being done, Cleomenes procured a friend he had at Delphos, to corrupt Pythia, fo peng done, cremens procured an interest against Demaratus. Hereprocess and Languistic put that being drawn by bribery she gave the answer against Demaratus. Herein his place. by Cleomenes procured him to be removed from the Kingdom, and Lauphides his kinfman to fucceed him; yet though thus handled, he ceased not to love his Country, and continuing at home, disdained not to bear inferiour Offices, till further affronted by Leutychides, who to infult over and deride him, at fuch a time as he was overfeeing the exercises of the Boyes, sent and demanded of him how he liked of that Office after the Kingdom. He answered, that he had tried both, but the other not, and that that question should be the original either of great mischief or happiness to the Lacedamonians, and then getting him home with his head covered he facrifized to Jupiter, and fending for his Mother conjured her to tell him the truth concerning his Father. Being affured

Sect. 1. from her of his Legitimation, he went out of the City, under pretence of going to Delphos; but tooke the way to Elis, and thence to the Island Zacynthus, and so to Darius King of Persia, the Zacynthians having refused to give him up to his Country-men who purfued him. He was received with great honour by the Persians, who bestowed Lands upon him to maintain him in a Princely equipage; and there his posterity is reported to have endured a long season.

22. Not long after Cleomenes received his just reward, his own hands being his executioners; for, his treachery against Demaratus being come to light, and fearing to be called to an account for it, he first fled into Thessalie, and thence returning into Arcadia stirred up the Inhabitants against the Spartans, and attempted to fwear them to be true to him whitherfoever he should lead them. The Lacedamonians hearing of this, and fearing what he might do to them, recalled and reftored him to his former dignity; but when he was come home, having not had before this time a very setled head, he now fell into a Phrensie, as he met any one in the City, pushing their faces with his Scepter. His friends bound him with wooden fetters, in which condition, partly by intreaties, and partly by threats, he got a Sword of his Keeper, wherewith beginning at the calf of his leg, he cut up his flesh upwards to the thighs, and, when he ripped up his belly, died, leaving no iffue behind him, but a pattern of Justice to all Greece, which being amused at his end, most attributed it to the corruption of Pythia, and that in justice done to Demaratus; the Athenians attributed it to his invafion of Eleusine, and his destroying the Temple of their gods; but the Argives concluded this Judgment to have fallen upon him, because he had basely killed fuch of their Country-men as escaped from a battel fought with him, after he had got them out of the Temple of Argos, and had burnt down the grove which he had taken. This passage betwixt the Lacedamonians and Argives, is to be related though it be in the same order Herodotus hath done it, it having hapned long before to trientile the death of Cleomenes, and as Paulanias faith, in the beginning of his reign. 23. For Consulting the Oracle at Delphos, it was answered, that he should take

Argos, and hereupon he raised an Army and invaded the Territories of that State. The Argives in their own defence made haft to meet him, but he fetting upon them as they were at dinner, put many of them to the Sword, and belieged the rest in the grove at Argos, whither they fled. Then learning their names from fuch fugitives as were with him, he called them man by man out of the Wood to redeem themselves (which at the Lacedamonian rate was two Mine a man) and fo fifty of them coming out of the grove (in which place they could not fee beforehand what was done to their Companions) he put to the Sword. At length one of them [climbing up a tree discovered the matter, after which no man would come out; but then he fet fire to the grove and burnt it and them together. After this, asking to whom of their gods the grove belonged it was answered to Argus, and so he found and acknowledg-

but the major part were fatisfied with his excuse and acquitted him. As for Argos it was rendred by this overthrow fo defolate of men, that the Slaves governed all things, till fuch time as the fons of the flain grew up and recovered their Patrimony; after which the Slaves conquered Tyrinthe, and held it, till perfwaded by Cleander a certain Wizard, they returned, and made War upon their Mafters, which continued long, till fuch time as the Argives with difficulty reed Himself deceived by the Oracle. Returning to Sparta, he was accused as having been corrupted, for that he might have taken Argos if he would:

mained Conquerours.

24. Cleomenes being dead, the Æginetans sent and complained of Leutschides for the injury he had done to them, in causing together with Cleomenes ten of their principal men to be kept as Hostages, at Athens. He was given up to them, but fearing to carry a King of Sparta away prisoner, though for the present the State had given him up, they took him onely to Athens to procure them the liberty of their Hostages. But the Athenians put them off, as refusing to deliver them without the authofered to Diffia- rity of two Kings, feeing both of them committed them to their custody, and the journey being to no purpose Leutychides was dismissed and so returned; but yet he also paid for the injury offered to Demaratus.*For leading an Army into Thessalie, of which as of the War he had full and ample power, he was corrupt- Lib 6. 12,87: ed with money, and betrayed the interest of his Country, after which being discovered, as he held the money in both his hands fitting in his tent, he was apprehended and carried to Sparta, where being called to account, he fled to Tegea, and there died in exile, his house being razed as a traytor to his Countrey. 25. But

25. But the Aginetans, of old, Enemies to those of Athens, were now much Sect . more incensed against them for detaining their Hostages, and set themselves to fludie a revenge. At that time there was at Sunium (the utmost promontory them exp. 87. of Attica) a Gallie which (according to the custom observed every year since the time of Thefens) was then going to Delphos, aboard of which were the principal men of Athens: on this they leized, and taking the men prisoners, bound them all. The Athenians hereat inraged, laboured with all might on the other hand to revenge this, and agreed with one Nicomachus to have the City betraied to them; yet for that they could not get their Fleet together foon enough, they came a day too late, and miffed of that enterprise. But through the councel of Themistocles, having rigged a Fleet of seventy Gallies (twenty of which the Corinthians fold them at an inconfiderable rate, because by the Law they could not give them) they fer upon the Aginetans, and overthrew them in a Sea-fight. They betook themselves for aid to the Argives War betwixt the athenians their old friends, but having offended them not long before, they received a and Agintans, publick denial, yet underhand a supply of one thousand Volunteers, most of whom fell in Aginia by the hands of the Athenians, against whom yet the Æginetans afterwards, reinforcing their power at Sea, in another battel became Victors. But what the iffue of this War farther was, is not declared by Herodotus, who yet elsewhere affirmeth, that it gave occasion to the safety of all Greece, by putting the Athenians upon the care of Sea-matters, whereby when Xerxes came, they became the bulwark thereof. Probable it is, that this War which was begun before the battel of Marathon, was not composed till the time that Xerxes was about to invade Greece, when we read that all the Gracians (and these two States amongst the rest) resolved to lay aside all private quarrels amongst themselves, the Aginetans being observed by * another to have * Exist in had the Dominion of the Sea twenty years, untill the passage of Xerxes, which coronice.

26. Whilest the Athenians were busie in the War against Eginia, Darins sent his Forces into Greece against them, and the Eretrians (inhabitants of the Island Euboca) which though they took the Citie of the latter, and made them Captives, yet were they overthrown by the former in the battel at Marathon. After the fight two thousand Spartans came to Athens (being hindred hitherto by their superstition, which forbad them from a Law of Lycurgus not to stir out till the full Moon) whence they proceeded to Marathon to see the number of the flain, and then commending the valour of the Athenians returned home. Of these were slain in this fight Callimachus one of the Polemachs, Justicalie as Cynagirus commended by many Writers, who when the Persians fled, and betook themselves to their ships, held one of them with his hands till they were cut off, and then with his teeth, till at length he was flain; and Hip. pias the late Tyrant (who now hoping to recover, after twenty years banishment, his old power, became the conducter of the Persian Forces) though neither Herodotus nor Thucydides make mention of his death, yet is reported by later Authors here to have been flain. Themistocles now a young man behaved himself gallandy in the battel, but the success is ascribed to the valour, and conduct of Miltiades, to whom, when Ariftides one of the Captains had affigned his day's Government, the rest when it came on their turns did the same, after allide. that by the same help he had carried it into the Councel for a battel. Yet did he not fight till his own day came, and then ingaging, overthrew the Enemy in that memorable battel.

thenceforth they were forced to yield to the Athenians.

27. His father was Cimon, who in the Tyranny of Pififtratus departed from Hood, 1886. Athens, and thrice obtained the Garland in the Oylmpick Games; yet being reconciled to Pilistratus afterwards returned, but after his death was slain by his faction. His eldest son, was called after his Grand-father Stelagoras, was brought up with their half-Uncle Miltiades in the Cherlonesus, over which he was Prince.

His other fon was this Miltiades, fo called after this his Uncle, which dying without Children, Stefagoras succeeded him, but not long after was killed by one that connterfeited himself a fugitive, and died also without issue. Then did the Pilistratide fend Miltiades to succeed his brother in the Principality of the Cherfonefus, and there he ruled when Darius undertook the expedition into Scythia and he it was that gave the Ionians councel to break the bridge, and leave him there wandring with his Army. Being fetled, he married Higelippla the daughter of Olorus King of Thrace; but the Scythians provoked by Darius, and making an excursion as far as the Chersonesus,

After some years Darius being angry with him, sent a Fleet of Phanicians to subdue the Chersonesus; whereupon he fled with five Gallies from Cardia, and came to Athens; but as he fled the Phanicians intercepted one of them, and therein his fon Metiochus, who being presented to Darius, received from him house, lands, and a Persian Wife. Being returned home, he was accused for possessing the Tyranny of the Chersone fus, but was acquitted, and having per- * Paulanlib. iwaded the Athenians to cast Darius his Ambassador into the pit, was afterwards declared by the people one of their Captains, and thence had occasion to obtain this famous Victory at Marathon.

He fayled to the Island Paros (one of the Cyclades in the Ægean-Sea, and famous for the best Marble) the inhabitants of which having affifted the Persians at Marathon, he befieged, demanding one hundred Talents of them. They would not hear of par-

There, when he was arrived, he was accused by Xanthippus (the fon of Ariphron, and Father to Pericles, his Emulator) of Treason, as having voluntarily miscarried in the Enterprise about Paros. He could not be present himself to answer, his Thigh now corrupting, which held him in his bed, but Stefagorus, or Tifagoras, his brother (according to Cor. Nepos) or rather, other of his friends were there for him, bidding the people remember the battel at Marathon, and the taking of Lemnus, which he, having expelled the Pelafgians, had Marthon, and the tearing power. The people spared his life, but fined him fifty Talents, which sum this expedition cost them. One tells us it was not contain the state of the out of any regard to his Crime so much, as having lately been under the Ty- vita militalis. ranny of Pififtratus, they feared now the power of their own Citizens, and him especially, who having been much practifed in Magistracy and Power, and enclined naturally to a love of it, could fcarcely as they thought bear the condition of a private life; fo that though being called a Tyrant, he obtained that power not by his own feeking, but was ever found to be just, moderate, and humble; yet having a great name for Military matters, and thereby great interest, they chose rather to condemn him though innocent, than continually to be in fear; though they might have thought on the Oftracifm.

Three years the Gracians had rest, as from without, so within themselves. till the coming of Xerxes; only the War betwixt the Athenians and Eginetans still depended, until common danger drew them to a composure. and eafily changeable, according to the juncture of affairs; but Ariftides conflant and grave, only intent upon Justice, and who neither in jest nor earnest would give way to lying, fcurrility, or deceit) yet now with others was recalled by his means for the fafety of the Country, and voluntarily laid afide all private quarrels which came into competition with the publick fafety. The firname of Full which first got this man love, afterward procured him envy, Themistocles whispering this into the ears of the multitude, that whilst he took upon him to centure all things, he had prepared for himself a Throne, in the ruine of the Courts of Judicature, being defended with a fufficient Guard. The multitude puffed up with their fuccess at Marathon, and designing great things in their heads, could ill bear any that excelled them in fame and glory, and therefore flocking into the City they banished him by the Oftracifm, cloaking their envy at his glory with a specious pretence of fear of Tyranny.

Ariftides hearing this, answered nothing, but wrote his own name, and gave it to the man, and when he departed out of the City, with hands lifted up to heaven prayed (contrary to what Achilles did when he found himfelf ill ufed by Agamemnon) that the estate of Athens might never happen to be such as to liad. 4. give them occasion to think of Ariftides. But in the third year after, when Xerxes now marched through Thessay and Baotia towards Attica, the Athenians repealing their Decrees, recalled all that were banished, especially for sear of Aristides, left joyning with the Enemy, he might by his Authority draw many of their Citizens to revolt. They were mistaken concerning the mans disposition, for before the Decree for his return was made, he had not been wanting to provoke the Gracians as much as he could to defend their liberty; then joyned with Themifocles, though one most averse to him, and for the publick good advanced him to the highest degree of Dignity. He joyned in endeavours with him for procuring the Graciaus to fight, and understanding that Psyttalia a little Island before Salamima was possessed of the Enemy, he passed over thither with a party of such as voluntarily followed him, and put them all to the fword, except some of the chiefeft, to whom he gave quarter. He disposed Soldiers so throughout the Island, that on which quarter foever any of either party should light, he might seize upon them, and fo preserve his friends, and provide that none of the enemy should escape; upon which account a Trophy was erected in Pfyttalia. And when Themistacles

And though by the envy of the Captains his glory was depressed, yet was he accounted the most prudent man of all Greece, and being invited down to Lacedamon, by the judgment of that severe State, as the praise of valour was given to their own Eurybiades, so that of prudence and dexterity unto him. They gave him a crown of Olives, and the best Chariot they had, as a reward,

After this, the Gracians overthrew Mardonius, whom Xerxes had left behind him, at the battel of Platan, and the same day the Persian Fleet at Mycale a Promontory of Ionia, which they hereby restored to liberty, Xanthippus being Archon at Athens; in the second year of the seventy fifth Olympiad, and the feventh of the Reign of Xerxes. During which passages abroad, little hapned at home but in relation to them; the sum of which elsewhere hath been related.

33. As for learned men which flourished during this period; some of the seven Learned Men. Wise men of Greece lived in the time of Cyrus, and about the beginning of the Persian Empire. These seven were, Pittacus of Mitylene, who was born about the thirty second Olympiad; Bias of Priene, Chilon of Lacedamon, and Cleobulus of Lindus, all who flourished about the fourty seventh Olympiad, with Thales num Larting. of Miletus, who being born about the first year of the thirty fifth Olympiad, foretold an Eclypse of the Sun, which hapned about the third year of the fourty eighth, in the reign of Alyattes, and Altyages, and about the beginning of the fifty eighth. having helped Crafus over the River Halys, by draining it with a ditch, then died. The fixth was Solon of Athens, who died the same year with Thales, and the feventh Periander of Corinth.

34. Besides these there was Xenophanes the Colophonian, who being born in the fortieth Olympiad, came into Sicily, when Hieron and Epicharmus flourished, about the seventieth Olympiad. Epicharmus lived ninety seven years as Lucian writeth, and invented the Comedy eight years before the beginning of the Persian Empire. Phocylides flourished at the same time, to whom a Poem yet extant concerning *Lib.7.40.7. Laws is afcribed, though Scaliger thinks it made by some Hellenistick few. Befides these, Anacreon the Teian Poet, who as * Pliny writeth, was choaked with the stone of a raisin. Simonides a Poet of the Island Ceos, where he was born in the City Iulis. Having lived fome time at Athens with Hipparchus the Son of Pifistratus, he went into Sicily unto Hiero, by whom being asked what God was, he demanded a days time to confider of it, and after that another; still professing that the more he studied the point, the more he was to feek in it. Some fay he found out the Art of Memory, and that being very covetous, he first exposed the Muses to sale. In the second year of the fifty eighth Olympiad, and eight before the Persian Empire, died Anaximander the natural Philosopher of Miletus. Anaximenes his Scholar flourished about that time. Theagenes of Rhegium the most antient Chronographer. Democedes of Crotone a Phylician, being taken Captive with Polycrates by Oetes the Persian, was carried as a Slave to Darius, with whom he lived in great efteem, after he had cured his foot and the breast of his wife Atoffa, 35. There flourished also in Darius his time, Cadmus of Miletus an Historiographer, there having been another of this name and place, according to Suidas, who in four Books wrote the History of Miletus and all Ionia: and Strabo nameth Cadmus, Phercydes and Hecataus as those who first of all Greeks wrote Profe. Hecataus flourished at this time, and gave light to Herodotus. Phrynichus the Athenian, a tragical Poet, who first caused a woman to be personated, and invented the verse with four feet. Heraclitus the Ephesian, a contemner of Heathenish Idols, who out of fear wrote his Book of Nature in fuch an obscure manner, that that thence he got the name of Scotious or Dark. Zeno of Elea, or Velia, in Italy, Scholar to Parmenides, who conspiring against Nearchus the Tyrant, endured torments to death, rather than he would discover his complices. Pythagoras the fon of Mnefarchus the Samian, but born at Sidon in Phanicia, about the fifty third Olympiad. Being twelve years old he learnt of Thales and Phocilydes, from the latter taking the transmigration of Souls. Travelling into Agypt and to Babylon, he 7ultin.lib. 20. drunk in the learning of both places. About the fixty eighth Olympiad he went Plin. 1.2. 6.8. into Italy, where he lived first at Crotone, and then at Metapontus. Here he taught and constituted the Italian School or Sect, as Thales had done the Ionick. Whereas others fuffered themselves to be called Sophoi, he would be called out of modeftv Philosophus. In the fixty seventh Olympiad he found out the nature and course of the Planet Venus. In the fourth year of the seventieth he died at Metapontus, where he was fo admired, that his house was made a Temple, and that part of Italy called Magna Gracia. Amongst his Scholars was Milo the famous Wrestler; and women through him became famous for learning, their Epiftles being yet extant.

The Persian Empire.

Of such things as fell out among st the Græcians, from their Victories at Platza and Mycale, until the beginning of the Peloponnesian War.

Containing the space of fourty eight Years.

He Persians being overthrown in Greece both at Sea and Land, and so Toursed, 1, 2, driven utterly out of Europe; and those that fled into Asia in Ships being also defeated at Mycale, Leutychides the Spartan who there commanded in chief, returned home with his Affociates of Peloponnefus. The Athenians with the Ionians, and those that inhabited upon the Helle-Spont, besieged Sestus, which the Persians had seized on, all Winter, and reduced it; after which they also all departed home.

2. The Athenians having brought home their Wives and Children, after the Iden ibid. overthrow of Mardonius, had the popular Government restored by Aristides, and Platate & Corn, Nipos in fet themselves to rebuild the Walls of their City in a greater compass, and strong- temislatic er than had been formerly, being thereto especially induced through the perswasion of Themistocles. The Lacedamonians above all others were hereat exceedingly troubled, as confidering that having obtained fo great Glory by the two Victories at Marathon and Salamina, the Athenians would yet contend with them for the Principallity, and upon that account they wished them as weak as might be. They The Athenians diffwaded them therefore from going on with their work; alledging that it was dangerous for Greece to have any fortified place without the Peloponne us, which the Barbarians might feize on, and possess. They said they would fend answer by Ambassadors of their own, and Themistoles took the business upon him. He first went alone, and ordered that the rest should follow, but not till the Wall was brought to a reasonable height; that in the mean time both Bond and Free flould ply the work; and sparing no place, whether Holy or Prophane, Private or Publick, take all such stuff for building as they might soonest light on When he came to Sparta, he demanded no audience, but sought to protract the time, pretending to support the Callague. ing he expected his Collegues. The Lacedemonians complaining that nevertheless the Work went on, and that he went about to deceive them, the other Am baffadors arrived, of whom after he knew that the Fortifications were almost finished, he laboured to perswade the Ephori (who now had the chief Power in that State) that the things were false, which they were made to believe, defired them to fend Persons considerable whom they might trust to make inspection.

3. They sent accordingly three of their principal men to Athens, and with them Themislooles his Collegues, to whom he gave in charge that the Lacedemonians should not be dismissed till his return. After their departure, he demianded audience of the Magistrates and Senate, and then freely and openly professed, that the Athenians by his Advice, and agreeable to the common Law of Nations, had ded by Themis fenced their publick and private Goods with a Wall, that they might more eafily defend them; and neither could that be to the damage of Greece, of which Athens was the Bulwark against the Barbarians, for here the King's Navy had twice fuffered Shipwrack. He told them, they did ill to regard more their private ambition, than what was profitable for all Greece; and, to conclude, if they expected the return of their Ambassadors, they must dismiss him, or else never expect to see them again; which accordingly they were forced to do with much private regret, though ashamed to own the Cause. He advised his Country-men further to finish the work of the Piraus or Port of Athens, which they had begun a long time before, whilst he was Archon; for he perswaded them first to apply them-and keep him as an Hostage till their return.

And with fo great a defire was he carried out for the inlargement of the Dominion of that State, that observing the Lacedamonian Navy to be drawn up at Gytheum, and so, easie to be set on fire, he much desired to have it done, and Plutario in Themissock. told the Pepole he had a thing of great moment in his Head, but fuch as was not Val. He gaped after the Kingdom of Greece, and to that end, entred into conspiracy with Xerxes, whose Daughter he asked to Wife, and being accused of much favour shewed towards the Persians, yet for that nothing could be proved, he was dismissed, having the Government of the Fleet only taken from him. Yet returned he to the Hellespont, under pretence of the War to continue his intelligence with Xerxes; but being expelled from Byzantium by the Athenian Soldiers, he returned not to Sparta, but staied at Troas, and for that was again complained of, as holding clandestine Consultations with the Persians, and not having any just and warrantable Cause there to remain. Hereupon he was called home by the Ephori the fecond time, and cast into Prison, but appearing a-

The Athenians being thus advanced by the Associations by the means of driffilidis ates for their moderation, under pretence of revenging the States upon Xerxes, obof Arrivals draw the chief tained also liberty to lay a Tax upon them all, how much Money one, and how power to them many Ships another should find. Officers they appointed to receive the Tributes, the fumm of all which amounted to four hundred and fixty Talents: Delos was appointed for the Treasury, and the place to meet in, to deliberate of the Affairs of all the free States. This affels (as Plutarch writeth) was made by Ariftides at the defire of the Gracians, who relied upon his integrity; and his moderation so much appeared herein, that afterwards the Athenians inflaved the States, and drawing the Tributes to their private use, first doubled, and then tribled the sum. For now, whereas the whole Tax imposed by him amounted but to four hundred and fixty Talents, Pericles added almost a third part (as Plutarch reckoneth) and increased it to fix hundred, and after his death it was brought to one thousand and three hundred Talents.

6. The Athenians having fetled the Tribute, under the conduct of Cimon the Toxyd Son of Miltiades, took from the Persians Eione, a Town of Thrace, situate upon the River Strymon, which they deprived of its Liberty. Then expelled they the Dolopians out of Seyrus (an Island in the Ægean Sea) and therein planted a Colony of their own; then waged they War with the Carystians in Eubara, for denying them Obedience (which was composed) and belieged the Naxians that had revolted from them, whom they forced to fubmit. This being the first of all Greek Cities, which, contrary to the League, was subjected to Bondage, after it, others were as occasion served, which was taken hold of by the Athenians, either for that they fent not the full Tribute, or Ships, or would not ferve in the War when Affairs required it. The Athenians also severely exacted what had been appointed, and compelled fuch as refused, having forgotten their former mildness, now in Power, and carrying it very imperioufly towards their Affociates whom they

this was also the beginning of that inveterate hatred betwixt Corinth and Athens. 10. During the War betwixt the Lacedamonians and their flaves, hapned ano-Diedous at ther in Peloponnesus, betwixt the Argives and the inhabitants of Mycena, up-01/min. 78. on this occasion. The Myceneans standing high upon the antient Eminency of their City, would not be subject to the Argives, as the other Cities of Argolis were, but would live according to their own Laws and Customs, having nothing to do with the Commonwealth of Argos. Moreover, they contended with them about the Temple and Rites of Funo, challenged to themselves gives fall out, the Right of Administring the Nemean Games, and whereas during the War with Xerxes, the Argives had made an order not to help the Lacedamonians at Thermopyla, except they would yield them part of the Command, the Myceneans alone joyned themselves to them. These things made the Argives jealous that their power increasing with the return of their antient spirit, they would contend with them for Empire it felf, and therefore of a long time they defired to destroy their City. Now seeing they had a good opportunity, whilst the Spartans being busied at home could afford them no relief, they raised a great Army out of their own, and the Neighbouring Cities, and therewith fetting up. on them, overthrew them, and laid close fiege to Mycene. They stoutly resisted for some time, but being exhausted by the War, and the Lacedemonians (being busied with the Helotes, and lately distressed by the Earth-quake) not being able to relieve them, the Defendants being most spent, the City was taken and levelled with the ground, the inhabitants being made flaves, and the tenth part of them confecrated to the god of Argos. So, this City happy in more antient times, a Nurse of famous men, and renowned for worthy exploits was lived. 11. The difference raised betwixt the Athenians and Corinthians, about Mega-Thursd. Uh. 11 ra, proceeded fo far, as the former invaded Peloponnesus, and joyning battel ra, proceeded to lar, as the former invaded recogningly, and joyning parter bisdure the with the Corinthians and Epidamium, were worked; but engaging the fecond opposite time at the Illand Cearphales, obtained a victory. Not long after; the War as 2.6 is betwixt the Athenians and the inhabitants of Egina was again renewed, brought to destruction, and continued desolate to the time wherein our Author

wherein the former obtained a great victory at Sea, and took feventy Velfels from the Islanders, and then besieged the City, to the relief of which The difference three hundred men were fent out of Peloponnefus. Now the Corinthians judging it a fit season to be doing something, for that they were both occupied in the War of Agina and Egypt also, (where their Forces were affifting Inario the fon of Plammitichus against Artaxerxes) invaded the Territories of Megara. But things hapned otherwise than they expected, for the Athenians left not the fiege at Agina, but fent out of the City of Athens fuch as were both above and under age for the War, to the aid of Megara, which at length carried away the victory, and forced the Corintbians to return home with great lols. At this time the Athenians began to build their long Walls from the City to the port. 12. After this arose a War betwixt the Phosians and the Dores. The Lacedemunians being Patrons to the latter, fent to their aid eleven thousand and five hundred men, which Army forced the Phocians and brought them to terms. But being a A War be- nor through the Ishmus, for fear of the Athenians, and fo Staid in Baotia for an twint the Pho-opportunity: especially being defired by some principal men of Athens, who have bout to return home, it dared neither do it by the Criffean Sea (or Gulf of Phocis) thing the popular Government, hoped by the help of this Army to dislove it, and hinder the building of the long Walls, which made much for the interest of the people. But the Athenians hearing of this ftop came out of the City to a man against them, having with them one thousand Argives, and a great number of other Sect. 2. Allies, fo that the whole amounted to fourteen thousand. Who when the Thessalian horse joyned with them gave battel to the Lacedemonians near Tanagra, a great and famous City of Baotia, not far from Thebes. The Theffalian horse revolting to the Lacedemonians, they obtained the victory, and then presently marching into Megaris, wasted it and so returned home through the Isthmus. Yet the Athenians resolving not to give way to Fortune, seventy two days after this defeat marched again into Baotia to revenge themselves, which by the overthrow of the inhabitants they reduced, together with Phocis rased the Walls about Tanagra, and compelled the Opuntians of Locris to give them one hundred Hostages of their richest men. At this time they perfected Ideas ad ann. 4. their long Walls; Agina was yielded to them, the Walls of which they pulled & ad Olym. down, took away their shipping, and imposed Tribute upon them for the future. And Tolmides their Captain coasting Peloponnesus with a Fleet, burnt the

But in Egypt the Anhenians had bad fuccefs, Inarus being taken and Cru-Toncyd lib. 1. cified, and few of their men after fix years returning home : fifty Gallies also being fent to their relief were most of them taken and funk by the Phanicians. Other Expeditions they made also with like success, save that they overthrew the Sicyonians again in battel; which made them after three years willing to make truce with the Peloponnesians for five years, by the advice of Cimon, whom being banished by the Ostracism they had recalled; during which time they warred in (b) Cyprus under conduct of Cimon, and in Egypt in the service of Amyrte. (b) Diodorno us the King, with good success. (c) After this followed the Holy War, as they and olymp. 82.

called it, the Sparians taking the Temple at Delphos from the Phocians, and giving it (c) Toneyd. 11 up to the Delphians, from whom the Athenians again took it and restored it to the private Phocians. Afterwards the (d) Baotians revolted from the Athenians; who there Diodorus ad upon in great indignation under conduct of Tolmides invaded them, took Charonea Olymp. 83: and other Towns, in which putting a Garrison, and returning homewards they light and a upon the Enemy, who killed and took them all, and amongst others Tolmides was flain, who had made this bold attempt, contrary to the advice of Pericles the Son with Bastia, & of Xantippies, who now had begun to grow eminent. Hereat the Athenians ex-

Entra revolts ceedingly dashed, to redeem their prisoners parted with all Baotia, and not long after all Eubaa revolted from them, their credit being now on the decaying hand. To the recovery of this Island Pericles was fent, who scarcely being landed, news came that Megara had also revolted, and that the Peloponnesians were about to invade Attica.

14. This constrained him to return, and the Peloponnesians accordingly inva-Toucyd lib. 1. ded Attica under the command of Plistonax the son of Paulanias the Lacedamo Diotous ad nian King. They wasted all as far as Eleusine; but Pericles there opposing them, 3, 6 ann.4.2 corrupted Cleandridas Counsellour to Plistonax with gold, whereby they were deterred, and returned home, where Cleandridge was rewarded with death, and Plistonax with banishment. Pericles having so easily dispatched his affairs here, returned into Eubea, which he wholly reduced, pulled down the Walls of Chalcis, and banished only the Inhabitants of Hestica, which he peopled with Pricits redu. a Colony of his own Citizens. This various fortune inclined both fides to an accommodation, and procured a League to be made for thirty years betwixt the Athenians and Lacedamonians, with their allies on both fides, whereby Nith both sides saa, Achaia, Page, and Trazene, were set free by the Athenians, and it was made lawful for any City that had not been affociate with either part, to joyn it felf to which it best liked; which Article afterwards was urged by them of Corcyra to Athens, whereby they demonstrated that they ought not to deny them the liberty of affociation. 15. Six years after, a War arose betwixt the Inhabitants of Miletus Toursed.

and those of Samus, about Priene a Town in Ionia, under the Mountain Diederus as Mycale. The Milesian affairs going down the wind they fent to Athens, 01ymp.84.an.41 where they grievously accused the other, with whom joyned also many of the Samians themselves, who not being imployed in the Government, defired to have it changed. The Athenians being perswaded by them manned out fourty ships against Samus, by which power Pericles restored the Popular Government, exacted eighty Talents, and taking for Hostages fifty Boys, and as many Men, which they kept in cuftody at Lem-

their Ambassadors to Corinth with some Spartans and Sicyonians to bear witness of the matter, and offered to put it to a reference before equal Judges: But the

16. The Athenians, having notice of this prefently dispatched away fixty Gallies against Samus, with fourty four of which Pericles and his nine Colleagues failing for Miletus, ingaged with the Samian Fleet confifting of feventy Vessels (whereof twenty were laden with Soldiers) at the Island Tragia, and obtained the victory, and afterwards with the other part of the Fleet, and a new supply of fourty ships, failing to Samus, overthrew the Inhabitants, and closely belieged them both by Sea and Land. Pericles, whilst things were thus ordering, heard that the Phanicians were coming to the relief of the belieged, to meet whom he took away with him fixty Gallies, and bent his course towards Caria, after whose departure the Samians perceiving the Guards thinner than usual, broke out of the Haven, put to flight the ships that lay nearest, overthrew the next, and fo recovering the mastery of the adjoyning Sea, for fourteen days exported and imported what they pleafed. But Pericles being returned with fixty other ships from Attica (commanded by excellent Captains) besides thirty others from Chius and Lesbus, they were belieged closer than ever, and being spent with the War. in the ninth month of the fiege yielded up the City. The conditions were hard enough, viz. To demolish their Walls, give Hostages, deliver up their ships, and pay the charge of the War. Byzantium affrighted at this success, returned also to it's former obedience.

17. Shortly after this, fell out those motions which occasioned the Corinthian, A. M. 3566. and so by consequence laid the soundation of the Peloponnessan War, about the 2.V.C. 314. second of the eighty fifth Olympiad, and the twenty fifth of the reign of Artaxerx- Artax. Longin. es Longimanus.

18. The Inhabitants of the Island Corcyra, who were a Colony of the Corin-pra thians, fome eighty five years after their plantation in that Island (formerly called Olymp. 85.44.2. Pheachus, fituate one the Illyrian shore, and being very populous) sent out a Colony which built a City called Epidamnus, and afterwards Dyrrachium, but not without the leave of Corinth the Metropolis, which at their request had affigned a Citizen of their own (Phalius of the posterity of Hercules) according to the Law and Custom, to be Prince of the Colony; and out of the number of their own Citizens and other Dores made up the number. This new Colony feated in a very convenient place, in a short time flourished exceedingly, and abounding with plenty of all things, as usually it hapneth, fell out of luxury unto civil diffentions about the Government, and hereat occasion being taken by their next neighbours the Taulantians (who made War upon them) suffered no lit-Stirs at Epi-dammins, a Co- tle dammage. At length the People incenfed against the great ones expelled them the City, who thereupon betaking themselves to the Taulantians, procured them to diffress Epidamnus both by land and sea, by which the people being straitned sent to the Corcyreans their Founders, and Patrons, humbly to befeech them that by their authority they would make an accommodation betwixt them and their exiles, and bring the Taulantians to cease their Hostility. The Corestreans, whether disapproving the cause, or minding something else, rejected their petition, who then by direction from the Oracle at Delphos, betook themselves to the Corinthians, Founders of them both, and gave up their Colony into their hands. They were glad of this occasion, and presently promised them all affistance, being angry with the Coregreaus, who upon their good fortune were grown infolent, and paid not the respect to them which was due from a Colony to the Metropolis; for they were fo rich and strong, that giving way to no City of Greece in the former respect, they had also one hundred and twenty Gallies readily furnished, which drew envy upon them from the Corinthians, infomuch that now by the help of their Friends they refolved to chaftife them, and fent a Party of Soldiers to defend Epidamnus, together with new planters to be imbodied into the Colony.

19. The Corcyreans took this heavily that they should intermeddle with the afing out be-twist the cor fairs of their Colony, and being follicited by fuch exiles as had fled to them, fent operans and a Fleet to Epidamnus, commanding it to receive the exiles without delay, and caft out the Covinthians the new Planters with the Covinthian Garrison. But the Epidamnians refusing Corinthians neglecting their Message, as resolved for War, they also made preparation for it. They still continuing the Siege before Epidamnus, the Corinthians fent a Fleet of feventy five Gallies, armed with two thousand fighting men this Diederus ad ther, but leaving fourty for the carrying on of the Siege, with eighty more they Olymp 85, acres ingaged with them in a Sea-Fight near the Promontory of Actium, and got the 3, 5 4.

CHAP. II.

The coreyrasus Victory. The same day Epidamnus was yielded to that party they had left at the Siege, and so hereby getting the Dominion of the Sea far and wide, and growing proud upon their good Fortune, they invaded the Territories of the Allies of their Enemies, to fuccour whom the Corinthians manned out another Fleet, and landed an Army at Actium. They pitched also there their Tents against them, but Winter drawing on, they both departed without any Act of Hoftility; the Corinthians all that Year, and the Year following, out of hatred to the other using all their endeavours for rigging a new Fleet, and procuring plenty of Rowers out of Peloponnesus and other parts of Greece.

20. The Coreyreans before this time not joyned in alliance with any other State, Thursd. now began to look about them how they might strengthen themselves. They Olympas, at. i.

fent to Athens, defiring to enter into fociety with that State, and to have affiftance from it; and the Corinthians having notice hereof, fent their Ambassadors to op-

They enter in- pose them. The Coreyreans were first heard, making a large discourse, and then to fociety with the Corinthians larger than they. The matter was brought twice before the People, which at length refolved that a defensive League should be made with them of Corcyra, that the one should assist the other in case they were assaulted by an Enemy: but to make any Invasion Assistance was denied, lest they should break the Leagues formerly made with other States. The Athenians resolved on this course, for that they saw plainly they must have War with the Peloponnesians,

The defign of and therefore defired to have the Corcyreans who were very powerful at Sea, on their fide; and they thought it would be for their interest to have the Corinthians and their Affociates to fpend their Stock upon those of Coregra, which Island they also looked upon as very commodious for passage either into Sicilie or Italy. Ten Triremes therefore were decreed to affift the Corcyreans, in case they were in any danger, and three Captains fent, one of which was Lacedemonius the Son of Cimon, whom Pericles envying for his Fathers fake, procured that no more Affiftance should be fent, that so the business might miscarry under him; but afterwards out of plain Shame he fent another Squadron of Ships which came too Platareb in late. These Generals had in charge by all means to decline the Fight with the Prists. Corinthians, except they fet upon the Corcyraans, whom then they were to protect to the utmost. 21. This Squadron of ten Ships joyning with the Corcyreans, made up their Fleet

one hundred and twenty Sail, with which they gave Battel to the Corinthians (who had ninty of their own, and fixty from their Allies) betwixt the Island Corcyra and the continent of Epirus. This Fight (described most accurately by Thucydides) was the most valiantly fought, and with the greatest number of Ships, of any that those times had happened betwixt the Gracians themselves. The Athenians being mindful of the Charge received from their Superious, at the first rather thought to deter, than to fight with the Enemy, succouring the Corcyraans in some places; but they being fully worsted and put to flight in that Wing wherein they stood, they then with all their might fell upon the Corinthians, and fooiled their Victory in that part, and rendred it Ambiguous as to both fides. On The corinthi- the same day both parties rallied for a fresh Ingagement, and they were sounding assoverthrown in a Sea-fight. to the Charge, when unexpectedly the Corinthians espied twenty Athenian Ships, which Pericles had now fent to affift with the other ten, at which fight being utterly discouraged (as fearing more might follow them) they fell off again, to the admiration of the Corcyreans, who knew nothing of the coming of these Ships. Great Slaughter was made on both fides; the Corinthians loft thirty Ships, and Corcyreans seventy, besides one thousand of their men taken Prisoners, whom as the Corcinaans carried homewards, they took Anastorium (a Town situate upon the Bay of Ambracia) in their way, and therein left fome Planters of their own. This Battel was fought in the twenty ninth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, the tenth of the eighty fixth Olympiad, and five years almost before the beginning of the Peloponnesian War, Lysimachus being Archon at A-

22. Eight hundred of the Prisoners which had been formerly Slaves they fold, and the rest (many of them being of the chiefest Rank of the Corinthians) they kindly entertained. Thus was Corcyra as it were made victorious, and the Athenian Ships dismissed, which proved the first cause of the Corinthians making War upon the Athenians. Others followed, which not only inraged them, but the other Peloponnesians against the Athenians. Potidas, a Town situate in the Strato lib. 71 Isthmus of Pallene (formerly called Plegra, and afterwards Cassandrea from Cas lander King of Macedonia) was a Colony of the Corinthians, but affociated Thucyd. Diod. with the Athenians. The Inhabitants thereof were now commanded by the later olymp. 86. to demolish that part of their Wall, which was next Pallene, to give Hostages, ann. 2. and to cast out the Magistrate which every Year the Corinthians used to send them, and receive no more from them afterwards. This the Athenians did, for that they perceived the Corinthians to be much exasperated against them, and feared that joyning with Perdiccas King of Macedonia, with whom they were at odds, and upon whose Kingdom Potidaa bordered, they would follicite the place to revolt, and by its example would entice the rest of the Towns thereabout from their alliance. But Perdiccas being first aware hereof (against whom the Athenians had Armed his Brother Philip and Derdas) in great wrath fent to Lacedamon to stir them up with the other Peloponnesian States to make War upon them, and invited the Potideans to revolt, with other Towns in

23. The Athenians being not ignorant of all this, to prevent the revolt of the Towns, fent order to the Captains of the thirty Gallies lately fent into those parts, first to see the execution of their Commands laid upon Potidea, and take all possible care that the other places should not give ear to any finisfer advice. They of Potides fent to Athens, defiring earnestly that nothing of extremity might be put upon them; but yet they dispatched also Ambassadors (together with some from the Corinthians their Founders) to Sparta, to desire aid thence, that they might provide for the worst. Having no good Answer from Athens, but affrighted with the coming of the Fleet; and on the other hand being promised by the Lacedamonians, that in case the Athenians fell upon them, they would straight invade Attica, they took the advice of Perdiccas, and revolted with the Chalfidensians and Bottieans. The Athenian Fleet having notice hereof departed from Thrace, where they had arrived, and fayling to Macedonia, joyned their Power with Philip and Derdas against Perdiccas. The Corinthians to help their Friends at Potidea, fent one thouland and fix hundred men, partly of their own, and partly hired out of Peloponnesus, of heavy Armour; and four hundred besides light armed, who fourty days after the revolt of the Town came into Thrace, under conduct of Ariftaus, the Son of Adimantus. 24. The Athenians hearing of this aid, to give greater strength to their A. Tairs Touryd, lib. 1: in Thrace, fent to their former Forces two thousand armed men, with a Fleet of Diodorns ad fourty Gallies, under the command of Callias, the Son of Calliades, with whom olymp. 87. were joyned in Commission four others. Being arrived in Macedonia, they ann. 1. found their Friends who had joyned with Philip to have taken Therma, and now intent upon the Siege of Pydna, and joyned themselves to them; but seeing how their Affairs would be endangered by the Conjunction of Perdiccas with the Corinthian Forces and Potidea, they made up a Peace with the King, and attempting Berrhea in their way, made hast towards Potidea, and pitched their Tents at Gigonum, whither another Athenian Fleet of seventy Gallies also came. Perdiccas the Macedonian King again revolted to the Potidaens, and joyned himself with the Corinthian Army, betwixt which, and that of the Athenians enfued a The Athenians Fight, wherein the Athenians were worsted in that Wing wherewith they fought with the Corinthians; but got the better against Perdices, which Aristeus the Corinthian General feeing, after he returned from the purfute, broke through, and fled into Potidea. Of the Athenians were flain one hundred and fifty, amongst whom Callias the General, but of the contrary part few less than three hundred. The Athenians after this Victory drew a Line against the Town, and a supply of one thousand and fix hundred fresh men being fent from Athens under the Command of Phormio, closely besieged it both by Sea and Land. These were the mutual causes of the Heart-burnings of the Corinthians and Peloponnesians against the Athenians, and of the Athenians against them, about Corcyra, and Potidaa, both of them Colonies of the Corinthians, of which the Athenians defended the former a-gainflits founders, whilft they endeavoured to chaftife it and they again inticed the later, with other Towns which were Tributaries to Athens, to renounce their alliegance to that State.

25. Po-

25. Potidas being thus blocked up, the Corinthians were highly concerned, Section 1. both for the Town it felf, and fuch of their own Citizens as were therein; and resolving that it was no time now to be idle, sent to their associates of Pelopon-Thursd nefus to meet them at Lacedamon, where they grievoully inveighed against the The States of Athenians. Liberty being given to every man to speak, several others also redspanding flarply accused them, but especially the Deputies of Megara, for many inju-accuse the ries, and chiefly for that, contrary to the agreement made with them, they had interdicted them the Ports and Market of Athens. The Corinthians curiningly fuffered the rest to speak first, that by them the Lacedamonians might be incenfed against the Athenians, but then, after all, more fully and earnestly laid open their Faults, aggravated the injuries received from them, preffed the great danger which threatned Peloponnejus from their Power, checked the Lacedemonians for their too much remissels in vindicating the cause of their diffresfed Friends and Allies, and plainly declared, that if now they would not do it, they must strengthen themselves with other Confederates. 26. It hapned at this time that there were at Lacedamon some Ambassadors sent from Athens upon other business, who understanding how things went, desired also to be heard, and this being obtained, sought to allay the Stomach of the

as though they came to plead the cause of their State which they neither could

That they had increafed their Strength they denied not, which to endeavour was agreeable to the Law of Nature, as also that the weaker should obey the more potent, so that it was without injury, though not without Force, which was absolutely necessary for the maintenance of any Command, and was practised not only by themselves, but the Lacedamonians also, and would ever so be in the like Cases. Again, they laid before them the uncertainty of the event of War, and concluded with a religious protestation, concerning their innocency, and delire of

27. The Lacedemonians having heard both Parties, debated the bufiness aking of Lace- mongst themselves. They were generally inclined to make War presently upon dama his pru- the Athenians as the Authors of many Injuries, which Archidamus, one of their Kings, and a very prudent, and moderate man observing, by a grave Speech dehorted them, not from undertaking a War for the fafety of their Allies, but rushing into it; for that the strength of Athens, and of their own State (as he faid) being compared, there was need of a fufficient time to make Provision for it, in which not only the affiftance of the Gracians, but of the Barbarians allo was requifite. He shewed that the Athenians could not be subdued by the wasting of Attica, having also Provisions in a readiness, and that it was no policy for them being unprovided to deal with fuch an Enemy: but that rather the thing was to be deferred till things could be in a readiness, in which time the Athenians might perhaps be in a better mind, and give fatisfaction without constraint; and this could not turn to the disgrace of the Lacedemonians, in that they followed the Example of their Ancestors: Lastly, that by how much they took Arms with more advice, they should by so much conclude with more happiness and celerity. But Sthenelaides one of the Ephori, and who spake last, diffenting from the Judgment of Archidamus, very sharply perswaded the People to take up Arms against the Athenians, as violators of the former Leagues, and War was decreed accordingly, not fo much at the inftance of their Confederates, as out of fear of the growing Power of Athens. This was done in the fourteenth Year after the ending of the Eubaan War, and the Truce made

War should be decreed by the common consent, it might be carried on with their joynt Force: then departed they to their feveral homes to know the The Laculation minds of their superiours, and the Athenian Ambassadors returned. After their departure, the Lacedamonians, before the matter should any further proceed, fent to Delphos to enquire of the Oracle concerning the event of the War. whence receiving fuch answer as they wished, they again sent for their Allies. and propounded the business to them, who unanimously decreed it, and it was exceedingly pressed by the Corinthians, who, before this meeting, for fear of the loss of Potidaa had fent about it. It being not expedient to begin the War unprovided, all were defired to repair home, and make all Provisions possible (in which was almost spent a Year) and in the mean time Ambassadors were fent to Athens to make demands, of which, if any were denied, a more fpecious pretence might be obtained for the War.

ges to Athens.

29. In the first Embassie they demanded the expiation of a piacular Offence. in which Pericles was involved by his Mothers Kindred. For, knowing him to be a man of great Counsel and Courage, by all means they endeavoured upon this account to have him banished; but the other objected to the Lacedamonians, that they had drawn out of the Temple of Neptune some of their Helots, and flain them, and starved Paufanias to death in that of Pallas Chalciaca, where he took Sanctuary. After this the Spartans fent to require them to abstain from Potidea, to fet at liberty Egina, and especially they pressed them to let the Inhabitants of Megara have the liberty of their Port and Market, without which they must expect nothing but War: but to none of these Demands was there given a fatisfying Answer, the Megarians being accused for appropriating to their own use the Ground which belonged to the Goddess of Eleusine, and receiving such fugitive Slaves as fled from Athens. In the third Message Ramphius and his Collegues added but this to the other demands, that the Lacedamonians were desirous of Peace, and would give it, in case the Athenians would suffer all the Gracians to be free, and live according to their own Laws. These things thus often the Spartans demanded, to amuse the other party till they themselves could be provided, and to catch at a specious pretence for a quar-

Many speaking pro and con, at length Pericles the most excel Ephoro ad 0lent of all the Athenians of that Age, both for doing and speaking, with his Elo-speaking, drew the Multitude to his Mind. After he had inveighed against the Lacedemonians as fwollen with Envy, he excused themselves, and incouraged the People by agreeents drawn from their Ability to undertake the War. He advised that this Answer should be returned: That the Decree against them of Megara should be rescinded in case the Lacedamonians would give such freedom of their City to the Athenians and other of the Affociates: that they would fet all Cities under their Jurisdicti-

He added, that this was both just and honourable, and if they undertook the War chearfully, they should find their Enemies less considerable: that out of the greatest Extremities the greatest Honour was wont to accrue both to their State in general, and to each Citizen in particular, which he made good by inftancing in the Median War, at which time the City was far less considerable than at present, and whence it arrived to this pirch of greatnes: He told them it was fit ithey should imitate their Ancestors, and leave not the Empire received from them diminished unto po-

SECT. III.

From the beginning of the Peloponnesian War, to the ending thereof.

Containing the space of twenty seven Years.

N the fifteenth Year after the recovery of Eubara by the Athenians, and Thursdaliba: the Truce concluded for thirty years; the fixth moneth after the Bat- at am. i. tel fought at Potidea; in the fourty eighth Year of the Priefthood of Diodors at Chrysis the Prieft of Argos; Anglias being the principal Ephorus at at xong. Sparta, Pythodorus Archon at Athens; in the first Year of the eighty Hilling. 11h. 21 seventh Olympiad, the thirty third of the Reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, of the World the 3574, began the Peloponnesian War, henceforth there being no Commerce with one another without an Officer at Arms, and Hoffi-lity exercifed without intermission.

2. In the fecond Moneth of Pythodorus his Government, and the beginning of him War begin the Spring, three hundred Thebans seized upon Plataa, by the Treachery of neth with the some in the Town, it being affociate to the Athenians; for they perceiving a War to be drawing on, and knowing that Town to be always in Peace adverse to them, thought good to make fure of it betimes. The Inhabitants thinking more to have got in, than indeed did, at the first yielded it, but then again apprehending the Truth, resolved to rescue their Liberty, and set by Night upon the Thebans, whom they knew to be weary, ignorant of the Town, and would be much troubled with the Dirt, by reason of abundance of Rain which fell that Night: The Device prospered, and they slew almost half the number, taking the rest Prisoners, which were one hundred and eighty, and amongst them Eurymachus the Author of this Expedition. It hapned that from Thebes another Party came too late to the help of their Pellows if need should be, who seeing what was done, confidered whether they should not fet upon such Plateans as were abroad in the Country, and waste irround about, thereby to redeem their Friends. The Plateans (as the Thebans faid) fent to them, being afraid of this and offered them to release the Prisoners if they would forbear to fpoil. their Grounds; but in case they did, threatned to put them to Death; whereupon the Thebans withdrew; and yet for all this the Plataans put their Friends to death. The Plateans on the other hand alledged, that they never made any Promife to difmiss them; but in case they should agree in Treaty. But they fent to Athens to give them notice there of this Attempt made upon their

3. The Message being carried before the Thebans were put to death, the Athenians fent word to Plataa, that they would do nothing against them till they heard further from them; after they had first seized upon such Baotians as were in their Dominions. Then after the truth was known, they fent an Army which victualled the place, and taking out the ufeless multitude of both Sexes, put a Garrison therein. Thus the League being plainly broken on both fides, both parties prepared themselves for the War, both sent away Ambassadors to the Persian, and other Barbarians, and set themselves to obtain new Alliances. Now were old Prophecies and Sayings in all mens Mouths, which they interpreted according to their affection. Most were inclined towards the Lacedamonians, who professed themselves the vindicators of the Liberty of Greece, and hating the Athenians, either for that they defired to shake off their Yoak, or feared to undergo it. On the Lacedamonian fide were the Peloponnesians except the Argives and Acheans, who were Friends to both, all but the Inhabitants of Pellene amongst the latter, who at the beginning sided with the Lace-

4. With the Athenians stood the Chians, Lesbians, Plateans Messenians inhabiting the Athenians. Naupactus, most of the Acarnanians, the Corcyreans, Zacynthians, and the rest of the tributary Cities all over, the Carians inhabiting the Sea-coasts, the Dorians their neighbours, Ionia upon the Hellespont, several Towns of Thrace, and other places not few, the Islands lying betwixt Peloponnesus and Crete towards the Sunrifing, and all the Cyclades except Melus and Thera. The Chians, Lesbians, and Corcyrgans, afforded shipping, the rest, men and money, as Thucydides writeth, who in this Catalogue passeth by Eubara and Samus, though they abounded with shipping, and sided with the Athenians. Presently after the action about Platea, the Lacedemonians fent abroad to their affociates to meet at the Ifilmus, which they did accordingly, two third parts of each of the Cities. Here Archidamus the Spartan King and Captain General, having first gravely advised them not to trust too much to their own strength, though they made up such Archidamus in- an Army as the eldest of them had never seen, sent to Athens to see if that City vadeth Attica. would now remit any of it's former rigor; but the Meffenger being fent back without hearing, he marched for Attica, the Bactians at the same time having invaded the Territories of the Plateans.

5. Ere Archidamus invaded Attica, Pericles his friend, who by the Athenians with nine others was appointed General, foreseeing that if he should spare his Villages, either upon the account of their particular friend-ship, or by order from the Spartan State, to render him suspected, it would create him abundance of envy and ill will, to avoid all fulpition, called the People together, and gave the faid Villages to the Commonwealth, and advised them to gather all their things out of the Villages, and contain themselves within the Citie, to take care of their shipping, and not to neglect their confederates, from whom they might he supplied with money, which toge-The Provision ther with good councel and advice is the sinnews of War. He told them of the Atheni- that they had fix hundred Talents of Tribute yearly coming in, befides other revenues; that they had in the Castle left fix thousand Talents of Silver readdy coyned, besides in bullion and plate five hundred Talents more, and money in the Temples, befides fourty pound of pure Gold about the statue of Pallas, which it was lawful to use in extremity, making it up again afterwards. They had ready nineteen thousand Foot-men, and twelve hundred Horse, besides others that used bows on Horse-back, and fix thousand Archers on foot: of Gallies fit for fail three hundred, and he added other things to make them couragiously begin the War. They obeyed him in fetching their goods into the City, and shutting up themselves there, though much to their prejudice and trouble; but fuch authority had he with the people, having first, to ingratiate himself, inlarged the authority and liberty of the multitude, whereby afterwards in effect he ruled alone. They fet themselves also with all their might to the rigging of their Fleet, and gathering together the forces of their Confederates.

6. The Peloponnesian Army entred Attica by Oenoe a Castle of the Athenians, upon the frontiers of Baotia, and there Archidamus staid, providing all things for the fform. Being formewhat long in his preparations, his adversaries thence found matter wherewith to accuse him, as one who affected the Athenians, and one purpose before at the Isthmus, and now also protracted the time till they should have removed all their goods out of Attica. He indeed thought they might be inclined to a composure for the saving of their goods, and therefore did delay his march, but finding no message sent, and not being able to take the Cafile, he removed about eighty dayes after the Thebans entred Plataa, in the height of Summer, Corn being now ripe, and invaded Attica, which he wasted as far as Acharne, the strongest Garrison of all the Countrey, and but seven or eight miles distant from Athens. When they in the Citie understood this, having not suspected he would have peirced so far, and afflicted for the loss they sustained, they began to be much moved, (especially they of Acharna, who seemed to themselves a considerable part in the State) and tumultuoully gathering together, now began to rail at Pericles, that he being General did not lead them out against the Enemy. He would not call the affembly nor any Com-

At length the Peloponneflans feeing the Athenians would not come out to fight, removed from Acharne, and wasting other places, departed through Baotia into Peloponnesus, and went several-7. Whilest they were yet in Attica, the Athenians, to divert them, sent out a Fleet of one hundred Gallies, on which were aboard one thouland Souldiers The Athenians of heavy Armour, and four hundred Archers, with which the Coregraans jounfend a Fleet ed fifty Veffels more, and other affociates contributed their numbers. Coasting into Pelopoune the Peloponnesian shoar, besides other harm done, they landed in Laconia, and is to divert the Petopomerian moat, believes their enemies, had taken Methone, then unwalled, and meanly manned, but that Brasidas the Spartan with one hundred men brake through, and getting into the Town, defended it so, as they were glad to retreat to their ships. Then went they to Elis, where they feized on Phia, and staying there two dayes, harrased the Countrey, and overthrew such as were fent to restrain them : but their ships being sorely toffed with a Tempest, and hardly recovering the Haven of Phia, and understanding also that greater forces were coming against them, they departed thence, and grievously distressed such places as they came to. At the same time also another Fleet was fent from Athens to infest the Locrians, and defend Eulea, which They eject the did much harm upon the Coasts of Locris, took Thronium, took Hostages with Inhabitants of them, and overthrew the Locrians that came out to relift them. In the same of the Inhabitants of Agina, for that they imputed to them the especial cause of the War, and judged that Island convenient for them to place a Colony therein of their own. The Lacedamonians out of requital for the kindness received from them during the Earth-quake, and War with their flaves, and out of hatred to the Athenians, gave them Thyrea and its Territories to inhabit (which separate Laconia from the Countrey of Airgos, reaching as far as the Sea;) but fuch of them as this place for its straight-An Eclypfe of nefs could not receive, were differfed up and down Greece it felf.

8. This same Summer, at the change of the Moon, hapned such an Eclypse of the Sun (at which time faith Thucydides, it is judged that it can onely happen) that at Mid-day the Stars were feen, which according to the Fnlian account hapned on the third day of August, as the astronomical Tables demonstrate. About the same time the Athenian Fleet of one hundred Gallies having in Acarnania taken several Towns, came to Cephallenia, an Island lying over against Acarnania and Leucas, which being inhabited in four Towns, they reduced without one stroak, and so returned home. In the beginning of Autumn, the Athenians with a vaft Army invaded Megaris, which wasting in an Hostile manner they returned, and so they did once a year, till they got Nifea into their hands. At this time also they placed a Garrison in Atalante, an Island belonging to the Loerians of Opus, which hitherto no body had peopled, left it should prove an Harbour for Robbers that from Loeris might prey upon Enhea. In Winter, according to their custom, they solemnised the Funeral for those that first died in the War on this manner. First, their bones for three dayes were laid out to be seen in a Tent, where it was lawful for their friends to come, and do fuch duties as was usual to the dead. Then when they were carried out, each Tribe came, and putting the bones of their fellows into Cypreffe Coffins, carried them away on Chariots, and one Cheft was carried empty for fuch as had not been found; the women of their kindred making lamentation as for them. Then were they buried in a publick Sepulcher, in the most famous Suburb of the Citie, called Ceramicus, where all flain in War were constantly buried, except they that fell at Marathon, who for their greater honour were buried in the place of the fight. After they were buried, fome one Eminent for prudence and eloquence made a Funeral Oration in commendations of them, which at this time was most excellently performed by Pericles. The scope of his speech was to shew they deserved immortal glory for shedding their bloud in their Countreys behalf, and to excite the living to feek after fuch renown. With this Winter ended the first year of the Peloponnessan War, whose History for its influence into the whole is the more considerable.

9. In the Spring the Peloponnesians again under conduct of Archidamus their former General invaded Attica, at which time fell also upon it, a most fearful plague, as it is described by Thucydides, who was sick of it, as seldom hapned; during the rage of which they plundered and wasted the Countrey all over. CHAP. II.

Autes the fer returning to his former Counsel, hindred the Citizens who were very defirous Sect. cond time in to iffue out and fight, and provided an hundred ships, with which and fifty of the vaded, when it was feized affociates of Chius and Lesbus, armed with four thousand foot and three hundred news letzed horse, he departed to Peloponnesus, the Coasts of which he fore wasted, and forced the Army to return home to defend it, which they were willing to do also because of the plague, after they had been in Attica fourty days. After the return of Pericles, his Army was fent under the Command of Agnon and Cleopompus, against Chalcis and Potidaa, at the later of which it was seized by the pestilence and greatly diminished, and Agnon with one thousand and five hundred, which remained of four thousand, returned home. But the people being fore afflicted by the plague and War together, were angry now against Pericles, as him that moved them to take up Arms, who calling them together sharply reproved them; and they confessed what he said to be true, and that he had advised them upon good grounds, but being inraged at their private discommodities, they fined him eighty Diodornic Talents, and banished him the City, and yet presently after according to the incon-frant nature of the multitude, recalled, and created him General with full power.

10. In the same Summer a Navy from Peloponnesus of an hundred Gallies fell upon Zazynthus, an Island addicted to the Athenians, which wasting, and being not able to do any more, they returned home. The Peloponnelians also in the end of Summer lent Ambassadors to the Persian King to desire aid. who were also commanded to go to Sitalces King of Thrace, to defire a League of confederacy with him; but they were taken near the Hellespont by some Athemians, through the affiftance of Sadocus the Kings fon, and free of Athens, and being brought thither, in revenge for some Athenians, Merchants, and others, flain in Peloponnesus, they were put to death. In Winter twenty Gallies were fent from Athens to Naupactus to secure the Straights lying betwixt Peloponnefus and Ætolia, and other fix to Caria and Lycia, to gather money, under Command of Melelander, who in a fight was there flain with part of his forces. Potidea now also being in despair of any supply from Peloponnesus, and fore afflicted with famine (which raged fo far as they are man's flesh) yielded to the Athenians. Of the belieged fuch as were Males had liberty to depart with one Garment apiece, Females with two, and a little provision. The City being thus emptied was replenished with a Colony from Athens, to which state this fiege food in two thousand Talents. And so the second year of the War ended with this Winter.

11. In the next Spring Archidamus the Lacedamonian King marched against the lib. 2. ed. Platea, and besieged it. The Plateans sent to him to desire he would forbear at 3. to use any extremity against them; but he returned them very harsh conditions, requiring them to forfake the Athenians, to give up their City, and all they had, Archidamusbe- for the time of War, and in the mean time to go and dwell somewhere else, promifing that as foon as the War should be over, they should have all entirely restored to them. They defired a Truce, till such time as they could send to the Athenians, their affociates, and know their mind, who being utterly against it, they then sent Archidamus word, that they were resolved to undergo whatfoever the chance of War should lay upon them, for that they neither could, nor would revolt from the Athenians. He then fell of wasting their grounds, and with all his might attempted the City, which was as valiantly and powerfully defended by the Inhabitants. No way taking, at length the Spartans attempted it by fire, which confumed most part of the Town, leaving but a few houses for the Plateans to live in. Yet still the matter succeeded not, and at length despairing to take the place by force, they raised a Wall round about it, which they fenced with a double Ditch to flut them in, and leaving sufficient Guards, departed home. Before this the Towns-men had fent out to Athens all their useless Company. This same year the Athenians fought with various success in Thrace and Acarnania.

12. In the latter end of this Summer, and the fixtieth Month of the year died iden in Period. Pericles, of the Epidemical Difease, or the Plague, as Plutarch reporteth though not by its sudden force as others, but in a way of Consumption, which, if so, was paids dich, extraordinary. As he drew towards his end, some of the principal men of Athens that were left alive of his antient friends, as they fate by him, not thinking that he understood any thing, discoursed much of his great and many vi-Ctories and Trophies which he had erected, placing therein the main of his commendation. He understanding the discourse, interrupted them, saying that he wondred they should especially take notice of those things, which fortune made common

Sect. 2. to him with others, and make no mention of that which was most worthy and remarkable, for No man, faith he, upon mine account hath put on a black Gar-His commen- ment. A man he was to be had in constant admiration, not only for his equity and mildness, which he shewed in so many businesses of concernment, and fuch enmitties as were exercised against him; but also for hisgreatness of spirit, that this he especially charged upon himself, not to include his anger in so great power, or his malice; neither to be implacable towards his greatest adversary: and this seemeth to be the reason that he enjoyned the sirname of Olympius without envy, because he was of so sweet a disposition, and in the greatest power preserved his life unblemished. The great miss the Athenians had of him made them foon perceive what man he was, whose power whilst alive they ill bore, as dasling their eyes; when dead, and they had experience of others, they confessed that no man could in that height of place have carried himself more moderately, or in that modefly more gravely, and that height of power which used to be branded with the name of Tyranny, appeared in him to have been the wholfom prefervative of the Commonwealth; fuch depravedness of manners, and excess of wickedness falling upon all things after his death, which he weakming and keeping under as long as he lived, procured that it exceeded not the ilrength of the remedy.

13. The Summer following being the fourth year of the Peloponnessan War- thursd. lib. 2 rifing, the Peloponnesians and their confederates made the third invasion of inition Attica, when Corn was now ripe, under the Conduct of the same Archida-mus, which they wasted up and down as long as their provisions lasted. In the third time the mean time all the Island Lesbus (except Methymna) revolted from the Athenians, having had a great defire to do it before the War, but that the Lacedemonians would not receive them. A Fleet of fourty ships were then prefently dispatched from Athens, and War was denounced to the Inhabitants of Mitylene, except they delivered up their ships, and pulled down the walls; which being denied, War was made upon them, their Gallies put to flight, The Attentions and the Haven blocked up. Hereupon they defired a Treaty, and obtained truce to fend an Ambassage to Athens about a Peace; but in the mean while they fent underhand Ambassadors to Lacedamon, to defire a straight League and alliance, with prefent aid. The Ambaffadors being ordered by the Spartans to flay at Olympia at the time of the folemnity of the eighty eighth Olympiad pleaded there their cause, and in the name of their City were received into the League, and affiftance out of hand was promifed to them. Another Expedition was then resolved on into Attica, but the Spartans being ready, at the Isthmus, whereas their affociates loitered, and the Athenians then with a Fleet of thirty ships prey'd upon Peloponnesus, they being advertised of the loss they suffained in Laconia, returned heme.

14. Yet the Peloponnesians in performance of their promise made to the Mitylensans, dispatched away a Fleet of fourty Gallies, which found another from Athens to oppose it, consisting of one hundred; for the Athenians now abounded in shipping, having ready furnished two hundred and fifty Gallies, on which they expended much, fo as to defray their expences, they now first of all were affested. exacting yet from their confederates the usual Tributes, which they paid with much repining. At the same time the Mityleneans and the rest of the Lesbians, made War upon the Methymneans, who perfifted in their obedience to the Athenians. These understanding of it, sent at the latter end of Smmer a band of men into the Island, which drew a line round about Mitylene, upon which Guards being fet, the Inhabitants were straitly befieged. In Winter the Inhabitants of Plan tea being greatly diffressed for want of victuals, and despairing of any aid from Athens, refolved to break through the Enemies Fortifications, though exceeding difficult to be passed, and save themselves by slight. Many for the difficulty of the thing changed their minds, but three hundred frood firm in their resolution, and taking advantage of an exceeding dark and tempestuous night, two hundred and twelve with remarkable courage and constancy brake through, and (the rest being repulsed into the City) came safe unto Athens. Towards the end of Winter Salethus was fent from Lacedamon to Mytilene, to encourage the befieged to hold out, by promife of help; and another Expedition to be made by the confederates into Attica. And so the fourth year of the Peloponnesian War ended.

Attica invaded the fifth

15. In the beginning of the fifth year, the Peloponnesians sent fourty ships to time, and the Lesbus to the relief of the Mityleneans, under the conduct of Alcidas, and they themfelves with an Army, over which Cleomenes (Uncle and Guardianto Paulanias their young King yet under age) was Captain, invaded Attica the fifth time, which Sect. they most grievously distressed; but hearing nothing from Lesbus that they liked, and being in scarcity of Victuals, they returned the sooner into Peloponnesus. The Mityleneans being forely diffressed in the same nature, whether the Magistrate would or not, yielded themselves to the mercy of the Athenians, which the Peloponnesian Fleet understanding before they arrived at Lesbus, went over to the Coast of Asia, and there having cast many things in their heads, without any thing of note performed, returned, through the perfwafion of their General, into Peloponnesus, being from Lesbus in vain pursued by Paches the Athenian Captain. He returning from the pursuite, settled things in Lesbus according to his own mind, fent Salethus the Lacedemonian Messenger (whom he took in the Town) with the authors of the revolt, and some whom the Towns-men sent to intercede for them, unto Athens, staying there himself for further orders. Salathus was prefently put to death, and the people being called together to confult about the Mityleneans, refolved, at the infligation of Cleon, a man of bitter feverity, that all those of ripe age should be put to death, as well as they that were fent to Athens, and all the women and children should be made bondslaves; and this decree was without delay fent to Pashes to be put into execution. But confidering of this rash and cruel sentence, they repented of what they had done, and the next day met to advise further of it, when again Cleon a man in great grace with them, pressed vehemently the former decree. But Diodotus one of a milder spirit opposed him, and having endeavoured the day before to no purpose to do it, now by very few voices carried it from him.

A severe sen-

16. Then was there dispatched a swift Gally, with order if possible to get before that which carried the former Decree, and command Paches to abstain from putting it in execution. Yet the former arrived at Mitylene first, having set forth a whole day before it; but whilft Paches was confidering of the sharpness of the Decree, and how to perform it, the latter arrived, and so the lives of the multitude were faved, being fo near to destruction, as scarcely any thing nearer. But to punish the revolt, above one thousand of those whom Paches had fent to Athens as authors of it, the People commanded to be put to death, Mitylene was deprived of it's walls and ships, all Lesbus except the Methymneans had hard conditions imposed upon them. The fields were taken from all the owners, of which the tenth part being dedicated to the gods, the remainder was distributed to the Citizens of Athens, the tillage thereof being left under a vast rent to the Lesbians; and all such Towns as were now subject to the Mityleneans, the Athenians reduced under their Dominions. The same Summer they feized upon Minous, an Island lying before the shore of Megaris, and the Port of Nifa, and fortifying it, made the Coasts more safe and convenient to all intents. In the mean time those that were left in Places were forced by meer famine to yield themselves and City to the judgment of the Lacedamomians, who fent five men to hear their Orators, and the Thebans their Enemies. These men adjudged them all to death, which accordingly was execu-

This was the fortune of the Plataans (who thought they might have had some favour shewed them for the merits of their Ancestors in the Median War) after they had continued ninety two years in foriery with Athens, and no more is to be heard of them till Platea was rebuilt by Mexander the Great!

During these things, a most lamentable sedition hapned at Corcyra, part of the Citizens being for Popular Government, and the rest for that of a few or the most potent; the former trusting to the aid of the Athenians, as conformable to their policy, and the other to the Peloponnesians. Twice within the City did they fight, and both the Athenians and Peloponnelians fent their Fleets to the assistance of their friends; but the Athenians being stronger at Sea; and fending fixty Gallies more to the help of the former Navy, the Peloponnesians withdrew themselves, having only lightly skirmished with the Enemy in the fight of Corera, before the latter Fleet arrived. Then those for the Popular Government, fliengthned by the affiftance of the Athenians, cruelly raged

And it was not only fatal to Corcyra, but to all Greece besides, being drawn into Example by other States which afterwards broke out into factions. 18. At the same time the Greek Cities in Sicilie fell into Diffentions, some being of the Dorick, and others of the Ionick Faction, the Head of the former Syracuse, and of the latter Leontium, which two made War upon each other. The Leontines craved aid of the Athenians, for that they were not only of the Ionian Stock, but conjoyned with them in an antient League of confederacy. The Athenians willingly took the opportunity to get fome footing in Sicile, to hinder the exportation of Corn thence into Peloponnesus, and especially to make way for their Power and Dominion there. At the end of Summer they fent thither twenty Gallies. In Winter these Ships affished with ten more from Rhegium in Italy, invaded the Folian Islands neer to Sicilie, and wasted fuch as refused to yield. At the same Season the Plague began again at Athens, which took away a great number of Soldiers, but much greater of the common People: Earthquakes also hapned in several places. And with this Winter the fifth Year of the Peloponnesian War ended.

The fixth Summer of the War.

19. In the beginning of the next Summer, the Peloponnelians came the fixth time to the Isthmus, with intent to invade Actica, under the conduct of Acis the Spartan King, but being affrighted with the frequent Earthquakes, they returned. In the mean while the War in Sicily variously proceeded; Laches the Athenian Captain taking some Towns. The Athenians sent out one Fleet to infest Peloponnesus, and another the Island Melus, which stubbornly withflood their Commands, both which did nothing of very great concernement. 'The Spartans planted the Colony of Heraclea, in the platform of old Trachinia a City in Thessalie, being for the convenience of its situation upon the Sea, and the Haven, very fit for carrying on the War against the Athenians. These received a great loss from the Anolisms, but in Winter thrice overthrew the Ambraciots, who were forfaken by their Friends the Peloponnesians, which made them now imbrace a Peace with their Adversaries the Acarnanians and Amphilochians (who called in the Athenians against them) and entred into a League and Society for ten Years with them. The War proceeding all this while in Sicily, a greater Fleet was fent under conduct of Eurymedon and Sophocles, to oppose the Syracustans, towards the end of Winter, at which time the Hill Atna beliched out great store of Fire into the Territories of Catana, fifty years after it had the last time so done. Thus the fixth Year of the Peloponnesian War ended.

Agis the Son of Archidamus the Spartan King, again invaded Attica. The A-Anisa the thenians having furnished fourty Ships for Sicilie, gave order to the Captains, in fixth time in their way to have an eye to the Coregrans, who were much infested by their own exiles, and were in fear of fixty Peloponnelian Gallies fent thither: and to Demosthenes was given the command of some Ships wherewith he should infest Peloponnesus. As all the Ships failed by Laconia, Demosthenes a man of a prompt and earnest Disposition, advised the other Captains to fortishe Pylus, which is a ragged Promontory joyned to the main by a little neck of Land. Before it lies a small barren Island of less than two Miles Compass, and within that a Creek which is a good Harbour for Ships, the force of Weather being born off by the Head-land and Isle. The Promontory which had antiently belonged to the Meffenians, and was now defolate, he pressed fore that they might seize upon, and make their own, being very convenient for the wasting of Laconia; but the other Captains differted from him, hafting for Corcyra, when in the mean time fuch a Tempest arose as forced them to take into the Harbour. Then did he again urge his former advice, and though he nothing more profited with the Captains, yet Pylus fornified the Soldiers defirous to make some stay there, and seeing the commodiousness by Dimostheries of the Haven, fell upon fortifying the place, and with wonderful diligence and the Athenian. pains perfected the Wall in fix days Then was Demosthenes left there to keep it with five Ships, and the rest directed their course for Coreyra.

21. The news of these doings at Pylus drew the Peloponnesians in all hast thither responsibility out of Artischifteen days after their arrival, and they brought their whole Force by hid at the both by Land and Sea to recover this piece of Ground, which they well forefaw Peloponnessans how bad a Neighbour it might prove in time. In the Island named Sphatteria, they placed a number of men all Spartans, which were to keep it by their turns, Sect. and stopped up the Haven on both sides, that there might be no entrance in for the Athenian Ships: then suriously did they assault Pylus both by Land and Sea, but it was as valiantly defended by Demosthenes; So that with several new onfets the Storm was continued till the next day, and then the Peloponnesians drew off to recruit themselves, and provide for a new onset. In the mean time came in fourty Athenian Ships (to which Demosthenes had before-hand sent to acquaint them with his condition) and with them some belonging to their Allies, which first offered fight to the Peloponnesians in the open Sea; but that being refused, set upon them in the Haven, brake, and sunk many of their Vessels, took fome, and forced the rest to run themselves on Ground, about which afterwards enfued a great contention, whilest the Athenians would become Masters of them. and the Spartans out of Shame, and Grief for their Friends in the Island, laboured with more earnestness to get them off, which they effected by some, and the rest fell as Prize to the Enemy, who now closely besieged the Spartans that were left in the Island.

22. Pylus being now fecure, but the Spartans in the Island as good as lost, the Magistrates were sent for from Lacedamon into the Camp (as the custom was in great Dangers) who perceiving that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens, than by composition with the Enemies, took Truce for a time with the Captains, till they might fend to Athens about a Peace. The conditions of the Truce were, that the Peloponnesians should deliver up to the other all their Ships, as well such as were upon the Coast of Laconia as there, to be restored to them if the Peace (bould not succeed, and that they (bould attempt nothing upon the Fort, nor the Athenians against their Camp. That a certain quantity of Victuals should be daily carried into the Island, but no Ships should pass into it secretly; that the Truce (bould end at the return of the Ambassadors, and if in the mean time it (bould be broken in any one point, it should be esteemed utterly void in all. The Ambasfadors coming to Athens put the People in mind of that moderation all men thus about a Peace, which class croffeth. ought to shew in Prosperity, and with what credit they might now, at their request, make a Peace. But Cleon a man very vehement, and much in request, with-ftood it, so that in stead of Peace on equal Terms, and recompence for harm received, the Athenians demanded certain Cities, which had been by the Spartans long before this War taken from them, and refused to continue the Treaty, except the Spartans in the Isle were delivered up to them as Prisoners. The Ambassadors returned without success, and the Truce being ended, both fides betook themselves to their Weapons again about Pylus. 23. The Peloponnessans demanding their fixty Ships which they had given up, and now at the end of the Truce were to be reftored to them in as good a condition, were put off, under pretence that they had broken the Truce. The Island was also asresh besieged, and the Spartans valiantly standing out, things went on but flowly, fo that Cleon himself, who much vaunted what he could do, was by the People, who now began to relent of their not imbracing a Peace, forced, whether he would or not, to command a new supply of men thither. He and Demosthenes (whom he chose for his Collegue) first offered Conditions The Spartansin to the Spartans, and then upon their refulal forced them, after the loss of one hunthe Island dred and twenty eight, to yield themselves to Mercy. The number of those that vielded were two hundred and ninty two (whereof one hundred and twenty of the Nobility of Sparta) which were carried to Athens, and being closely imprisoned, it was refolved, that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, they should all be flain; and then was a Garrison of Messenians (the old Inhabitants and bitter Enemies to the Spartans) fent into Pylus. The Lacedamonians forely discouraged by these Events, and fearing worse things, sent to Athens again about the liberty of the Prisoners, and delivery of Pylus, but the Ambaffadors were often rejected, and nothing done, the Athenians being still more puffed up by their good success. This Summer they overthrew the Corinthians in the Isthmus. A Fleet being also fent for Sicily, affisted the of coregra end- Coregra ans in their way against their Exiles (who having got footing in the Mountains, annoyed them) and by their help they now utterly subdued them, and using them with unwonted cruelty, the fedition here had an end. Anachorium a Town to Corinth, upon the Bay of Ambracia, they also took. In Winter Artaphernes a Persian being fent from his Prince to Lacedamon, was intercepted in Thrace, and brought to Athens, where his Letters being opened and read, they contained no fecret, and he was fent back with Ambassadors to Ephelus to the King of Persia, Artaxerxes Longimanus, concerning whom they there had intelligence that he was dead, and so the Ambassadors returned home. The Inhabitants of Chius being suspected by the Athenians, were commanded to demolish their new Wall, With these things the seventh year of the War ended. 24. In the beginning of the eighth year happed a partial Eclypse of the Sun.

clypic of the which the Aftronomical Tables shew to have fallen out on the twenty first day after the fulian account, before noon, half of the Diameter or above being obscured, the fourth year of the eighty eight Olympiad now drawing to an end; and an Earth-quake hapned on the first of the Moneth Munichion, which fome make to fall in with the fame day. The Athenians this year fell upon the Island Cythera, lying near to Laconia, and inhabited by a Spartan Colony, which they took, and putting therein a Garrison for a time, thence made excursions into Laconia. Afterwards they removed thence a great part of the Colony, and took, and burnt Thyrea, standing upon the Confines of Laconia and Argolis, given by the Spartans to the Eginetans, whom now they carried away, and plundering the Town fet it on fire. Conveying their prisoners to A. thens, the Æginetans were condemned to death, and the Cythereans being difperfed throughout the Islands, such as they left in Cytherea were subjected to a great Tribute. But in Sicily, at this time, an Universal peace was made, and imbraced by all the Cities, through the earnest perswasion of Hermocrates a Syracusian; so that the Athenian Forces were forced to quit the Island, for which at their return two of the Generals were unjustly banished, and the third underwent a great fine.

These two were Captains of the Fleet, and collected Tribute from the Islands; their Collegue Lamachus being gone into Pontus against the Heracleans, who being in League with the Persian King denied to pay it. His ships, by the vehemency of water which ran down the River, were shattered, and he lost one way or other the greatest part both of them. and his Forces; fo that he could not move thence, eitherby Sea, or Land; whereupon the Heracleans thinking it a more honourable part to do good than to take revenge, furnished him with provisions, and fent him away with a Convoy, concluding that the wasting of their grounds would be well recompensed if they should make friends of their Enemies. With this Convoy he passed through the Country of the Thracians in Asia, and so came to Chalcedon, 26. At this time the Inhabitants of Megara were much distressed, what by the feveral inrodes of the Athenians, and their own Exiles whom they had caft out, who now preyed upon them from the Villages. Wearied with these continual disturbances, they thought of recalling the Exiles; but the Magistrates understanding that, and presently apprehending what danger might arise to themselves from those men of whose banishment they hadbeen the cause, conspired with Hippocrates and Demosthenes, the two Athenian Captains, to betray the Town to them. The Gates were opened, and the Athenians had been Ma-flers of the place, but that some of the Conspirators changed their minds, and obstructed the business, which the other seeing seized upon part of the long Walls, and casting up a cross work against the Town, fer themselves with all their might to compass about the Nijaa, or Port, hoping, if they could get it, the more easily to obtain the Town. And the Garrison in it being prefently discouraged by the stopping of victuals, which they were wont dayly to receive out of the Town, yielded; the Spartans to mercy, and the rest upon condition of liberty to Ranfom themselves. Then the Athenians prepared for fetting upon the Town: but were hindred by the coming of Brafidas the Spartan, who hovering about Corinth, upon notice how things passed here, hasted, thinking to prevent the taking of Nisea, and after he had heard of its furrender, yet used all expedition, hoping to fave the Town, and to recover it. But when he came the Megarians were divided in their affections, yet both parties feared to let him in, for that they thought it best to reserve themselves for that party that should have the better, and Govern themselves according to Emergencies, and therefore he was forced to depart at this time without having done one thing or other. 27. Not long after, the Baotians came, and joyned themselves to Brasidas, and thereupon followed an Engagement with the Athenians, which ended with equal fuccess to both sides. That party of the Town which favoured the confirming them in their resolutions then departed home : The Athenians alfo following, fuch as fided with them for fear betook themselves to flight. Then were the Exiles recalled, having first taken an Oath to forget all things past, and not confult their own passion, but the good of their Countrey; but having got the power into their hands, and having the Guards of the Citie at their disposal, they caused one hundred of those they suspected to be apprehended, and being condemned by a forced judgement of the people, they put them to death. Then taking all the Government to themselves, it continued in an Olivarchical way a long time.

28. At the same time, several amongst the Baotians attempted to change the frame of their Government, being much defirous of Democracy as it was established at Athens; and to this purpose held correspondence with them there, plotting to betray feveral places into their hands; but the matter being discovered succeeded not, but onely to the loss of the Athenians, who were overthrown in battel. In the mean while the Lacedemonians being invited by Perdiceas King of Macedonia, and some of the Inhabitants of Chalcis (who promised them some pay for their men) resolved to send some Forces into Macedonia, and Thrace, to divert the power, and defign of the Athenians, who now began to be ill thought of by many in those parts, and feared by reafon of their growing strength. They made choice of Brasidas for their Geneto give trouble ral, a man of approved valour, and remarkable integrity. They did a thing at this time, which is noted with cruelty and injustice. Being something down the wind in their Fortune, they suspected the power and number of their flaves the Heldes, left in this their weakness they should attempt something against them, and took occasion at this expedition, by offering all such of them liberty as would chearfully imbrace the fervice, to observe who amongst them were most active, and when they expected to be manumifed, instead thereof they made away (though how is not known) about two thoufand of them, and sent seven hundred away with Brasidas, together with one thousand Mercenaries hired out of Peloponnesus.

29. Brasidas after his arrival, by fair means reduced Acanthus and Stagirus

(both Colonics of the Andrians) from the Athenians, and then in Winter fet upon Amphipolis a famous Colony of theirs, fituate upon the River Strymon, which almost compassing it gave an occasion to the latter name of it, being before called Nine-wayes. In a dark night he feized on the bridge, and all but the Citie it felf, and 'tis thought had taken it also had he led his Souldiers on, but fuch as had conspired with him to betray it being overmatched, and stiring not, he onely wasted the grounds about it, and attempted nothing further for the present. The Inhabitants who affected the Athenians, being more in number, fent to Thucydides the fon of Olorus, and the Writer of the Hiftory of Thursdides the the Peloponnessan War, then the Athenian General, lying in Thasus, an Island Historian, the inhabited by a Colony of the Parians, half a dayes fayl distant from Amphipolis, who with feven thips hafted thither to prevent the delivery of it, or however to fave Eione. But Brasidas being aware hereof, to obtain Amphipolis before his coming offered them most large conditions; that all should there remain, and live in the same State as formerly, as well Athenians as others; or if they liked better to remove, it should be free for them so to do, which they accepted of, hearing nothing from Thursdides, who yet came to Eione that very night, and faved it, whereas Brasidas else had taken it the next morning. Yet he took three other Towns near to Amphipolis, and left them to be Gar-

30. The Athenians were much moved for the loss of Amphipolis, which had been of great use to them in affoarding them Wood for shipping, as well as money, and besides this, how a free passage seemed to be open to the Lacedamonians to invade their confederates, who thereupon might be induced to revolt by Brasidas, who being a very moderate, and just man of himself, gave out, that his design was to set Greece at liberty. And even so it fell out, for the Cities hearing what had hapned, and great commendations of Brasidas, sent to him to hasten his march towards them with promife to revolt, thinking they might fafely enough do it, for that they fally perswaded themselves, that the power of the Athenians was not fo great as they found it afterwards, when it was too late to repent them of their rath and inconfiderate refolution, into which they were hurried

Sect. 3. by an earnest desire of liberty. The Athenians having intelligence of this, ufed all diligence to fend Souldiers into all of them, as the shortness of the time, and the Winter season would bear. Brasidas sent to Lacedamon for a new supply of men, but little heed was given to his meffage, partly because the great ones there envied his glory, and especially because the people being well wearied now with the War, defired to have their men that were taken in the Island, and to make viet by the country peace. Yet he having made provision for the building of ships upon the River Strymon, went on with the War, drew all the Towns upon the Mountain Athos, except two, to submit, and then by surprise taking Torone, a Town of Chalcis, and tributary to the Athenians, he stormed the Castle the third day after. The remainder of the Winter he spent in fortifying the places taken already, and providing for taking of others which he defigned. And thus the eighth year 31. In the beginning of Spring the Lacedamonians for the reasons above-mentioned were defirous to come to a composition, and they hoped that now the Athenians, fomething discouraged by what Brasidas had done in Thrace, might not be averse to it. And indeed they were inclining to a ceffation of Arms, that they might ftop his proceedings till fuch time as they could recruite themfelves, intending to be governed in reference to the length of the Truce as their affairs should comport, and so a Truce was concluded for a year, the A Truce for Articles of which imported these things especially. That what both sides possess ed at this time they should enjoy; that free access and regress should be given to Ambassadors and Heralds, and their Confederates, to treat about a peace : that Fugitives (bould not be received; that all controversies should be decided by Law, and not by force: and something was added concerning the use of the Sea; In this Truce the Consederates on both sides being comprised. During this Cesfation several Treaties were held about a League, but something hapned which disturbed forely the minds of the Athenians. For Scione a Town of the Peninsula of Pellene of its own accord revolted to Brasidas, and was followed by Menda. Brasidas ignorant of the Truce, after the revolt of the former, laboured fore with the latter, and Potidea, to reduce them also; but then news came to him of the Ceffation, and much contention there was about the places; for that the Athenians faid that Scione revolted two dayes after the Truce was fworn to, and concluded. Being not able to recover them by words, they fent an Army to effect it by deeds, and Menda they recovered, whilest Brasidas was absent, affisting Perdiccas the King of Macedonis in his War with Archibeus, where fuch diffatisfaction paffed betwixt the King and him, that thenceforth Perdiccas began to joyn himself to the Athenians. Scione was incompassed about with a Wall, which being finished in the later end of Summer, and a sufficient Guard being left, the rest of the Army was brought home. The Winter following all was quiet betwixt the two States by vertue of the Truce; but the Mantineans and Tegeatans fought a battel with equal fuccefs, both parties erecting their trophies. The Spring drawing on, Brasidas attempted by night to surprise Potidea, but missed of his purpole. And with this Winter the ninth year of the War ended, in which the Temple of Funo at Argos was burnt through the negligence of Chrysis the Woman-Prieft, who flying for it, another was placed in her room, after fhe had during this War continued eight years and an half there-

of June at Athens burnt.

32. The Truce being expired on the day of the Pythian Games, the feventh of the moneth Thargelion, Cleon having himself perswaded the Athenians to Thangel lines, undertake the Expedition was fent into Thrace with a Fleet of thirty ships, aboard of which were one thousand and two hundred Foot, and three hundred Horse, besides Consederates. Hearing that Torone was but manned with a mean circum fent into Garrison, he departed from the siege of Scione, and set upon it with such earquickly puffed nestness, both by Land and Sea, that in the same day he took it, and though he attempted Stagirus in vain, yet he effectually did it upon Galopsus, a Colony of the Thasians, after which he staid at Eione expecting some Auxiliaries out of Macedonia, and Thrace. Here he grew very fecure, being exceedingly puffed up with his late success and that at Pylus, which he arrogantly imputed to his own wifdom; but his men disdained to lye idle, and pretended to be wearie of his Government, as thinking him unfit to command. Herewith he moved from Eione in a fecure posture, thinking of nothing less than fighting, which was taken notice of by Brasidas, who having fewer men thanhe, and less experienced, thought it not

The Persian Empire. wisdom to try a battel with him, nor at once to let him fight with all his Sect. 2 Forces; but pouring them violently upon him by degrees, thereby to confound and overthrow his Army. He had a discovery of Brasidas his intents, and began to retreat, but then he fell upon him out of Amphipolis in the manner aforesaid, and without much ado put his men to the rout. Cleon himself flying was slain outright, and Brasidas before this was mortally wounded and carried to Amphipolis, where he died, after he had heard how his men had got the Victory, being honoured by the Townf-men, as an Heroe, by facrifice, anniversary Solemnities, and naming a Colony after him, which they did to ingratiate themselves with Sparta. because of the fear they stood in of the Athenians. Of the Athenians were slain fix hundred; but of the Conquerors but feven men; fuch difadvantage was there in

33. In the beginning of Winter Ramphias with others in commission with him, was fent from Lacedamon with new Forces, and came as far as Pieria an hill of Thessaly; but there the Thessalians opposed his passage, and news of Brasides his death arriving, other causes also moving him (whereof this was not the least, that the Spartans before his coming from home were inclined to a peace.) he returned to Lacedamon. And after that the action at Amphipolis, and his return, came to be known, both fides for weighty and urgent reasons were much more enclined to it, Cleon and Brasidas being both slain, whereof the one was a man of a turbulent spirit, and the other a great Soldier, who sought ministrand Later after glory in Military matters. The Athenians having received two great descriptions de blows, at Delium first (when the change of the Government was to be made in Baotia) and now at Amphipolis, had learnt not to trust too much to the fmiles of their forune: therefore they who before would hear of no conditions, as certain of Victory, now were much abated in their confidence, and repented they had not imbraced peace, when it was offered them upon fuch honourable terms, after the action at Pylus, fearing that their confederates would be incouraged by this change of their fortune to change their affections. On the other fide the Lacedemonians who thought they should have ended the War, and brought the Athenians to terms by an invasion of Attica, now found they were much miftaken; the defeat in the Island they had ever before their eyes, and felt the excursions from Pylus and Cythera; they feared their flaves, left they should rife against them; and another danger pressed them fore; for the State of Argos which had antient enmity with them, was now after a truce of thirty years well-nigh expired, would probably take the benefit of their present troubles, by joyning with those who alone found them work enough, being so powerful at Sea. Above all, the liberty of the Prisoners at cias the Athenian, the former being weary of those calumnies which were raised against him upon any miscarriage in the War, and the other much enamoured of Peace, by the obtaining of which he thought he should be famous to succeeding Ages. Several treaties all the Winter were on foot about it, and towards the Spring the Lacedemonians to make the Athenians the more readily to imbrace it. gave out, that they would with the whole force of all their confederates invade Attica, and fortifie a Castel therein. After much stickling about it, a peace was Which is con- concluded for fifty years, upon these terms especially: that a restitution of places and prifoners [bould be made on both sides, except Nisat, which the Athenians might still keep from the Megarians, and Plataa, which the Thebans refused to restore to it's Inhabitants. The two States fwore to the performance of it, and all their allies and confederates (except the Baotians, Corinthians, and Megarians, who liked it not) and it was concluded at Sparta, upon the the twenty fixth day of Artemissius, Pleistolas being Ephorus; at Athens, upon the twenty fourth of Elaphebolion, Alceus being Archon, in the beginning of the Spring, presently after the Bacchanalia, ten years and a few days being past fince the first invasion of Attica, and the beginning of the War.

Achens, whereof most of them were of the greatest quality, provoked them to a

35. The Lacedamonians were by lot to make restitution first; which they prefently did perform, but as to places, Amphipolis was the cause that they could not perform it; for neither the Inhabitants, nor the rest of the Associates would fuffer it, though the Spartans drew out their Garrison, and did all that in them lay to restore it, they being unwilling to come again under the dominion of their old Lords, and counting it unreasonable for the Spartans to defire it.

Several Ci-

The deputies of the diffenting Cities were at Lacedamon, and being defired to fign the League, flatly refused, except some things were changed in it. Which the Spartans hearing difmissed them, and very prudently applied themselves to the Athenians, making an offensive and defensive League with them, thereby to retain them from joyning with the Argives and Peloponnesians, which confederacy it behoved them above all things for to hinder. After this straight League, the prisoners taken in the Island were set at liberty, the eleventh year of the War now rifing, and the peace was observed according to agreement; but all the late confederates of Sparta took this exceedingly ill, and let out all their hatred, formerly conceived against the Athenians their professed Enemies. upon their unjust friends. The Corinthians especially took it in great disdain, who had been the greatest incentives to the War, out of envie to the State of Athens, and as their Deputies departed from Lacedamon they took Argos And the De- in their way, where to the principal Citizens they inveighed grievously apoties of the containing application to whose vindicators they the Argives mnst needs be, and that it was incumbent upon them to decree, that all free Cities which would, might enter into an alliance with them for their mutual fafety, which if they would fo do, they were fure that many, out of hatred to the Spartans, would give their names to it.

36. After their departure the thing was first referred to the Magistrates, and then to the People, who chose twelve men, to whom they gave power to make a League with any City or State, except the Spartans, and the Athenians, with whom nothing was to be concluded, without the advice and confent of the whole body of the People. This thy did, because they foresaw a War to be made with Sparta after the end of the Truce, and hoped by this means to become master of Peloponnesus; for as the Lacedamonians were now contemned for their bad success (and the rather more for that all had such vast conceits of their courage, that they thought they would have submitted to no conditions, but have cut out all by the Sword) fo they who had been of neither party in this War, but allied to both, had bettered their condition. and now flourished exceedingly. The Mantineans first, who living in Arcadia, flood in fear of the Spartans whole confederacy they had shaken off, entred into an felves to that alliance with them, and after them the rest of the Peloponnesians, who thought they might understand more of the matter than themselves did, and had high thoughts of this great and rich City, conceiving it able to do much, because that of folong it had done nothing. They were grievously incensed against the Spar-tans, and this offended them especially, that in the straight League betwixt them and Athens it was provided, that by mutual confent they might add new conditions, or alter the old at their own pleasures. This proviso they looked upon as made to en-flave Peloponnesus, by the affiltance of Athens, for that if any thing was to be changed, it were but just that it should be done by consent of all the Confederates who were concerned in it.

The Landr-

37. The Lacedamonians knowing well how much they were concerned in these courses, sent Ambassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, whence they well perceived the mischief to have proceeded. They expostulated with them for what had been done, and laid perjurie to their charge, in case they left their society and betook themselves to Argos, and blamed them for not admitting the League with monians vindi- Athens, because it was formerly agreed, that what the major part should conclude, it should oblige all; except some divine impediment interposed. The Corinthians replied in the Affembly of the Agents of those Ciries which refused the League, that in general the Lacedamonians themselves had not fully performed the conditions of the League, who had not taken order that the places forced from them flould be restored, and that for their part they could not desert their confederates in Thrace, whom they perswaded to rebel against Athens, and taken into protection, and to whom they were obliged by oath taken more than once, which to them appeared to be a fufficient divine impediment why they could not enter into a League with Athens. And as for their conjunction with Argos, after they had advised with their friends, they should do what was right and fitting. After their departure, in the next affembly they entred into a League with the Argives, and so did the Eleans with the Corinthian Colonies, and those of Chalcis in Thrace.

38. All the Summer of the eleventh year, the Athenians and Peloponnesians had commerce with one another, though great confultations were on foot, and the affociates bickered with one another, and both parties wanted not diffatisfaction. For, the Lacedemonians restored not Amphipolis, neither procured the affociates Sect. in Thrace, the Bactians, nor Corinthians, to sign the League, though they ingaged joyntly to cause them to do it, and that if within a certain time they did it nor. both were to hold them as Enemies. The Athenians feeing that they performed not these things, suspected they dealt deceitfully with them, and for this cause refused to surrender Pylus, repented they had dismissed the prisoners, and withheld other places till the Spartans had first performed the Covenants. They excufed themselves, for that they had done as much as in them lay, having set at liberty their prisoners, drawn out their Forces from Thrace, and omitted nothing in their power, in which the restitution of Amphipolis was not : and as for what concerned the Baotians and Corinthians, they would do what they required. They earnestly defired that Pylus might be restored, or, at least, that the Helotes and Mesfenians might be taken thence, which after much ado was granted, and these men were conveyed into the Island Cephalenia.

39. In Winter the Deputies of the Confederates came to Lacedemon, and laboured in vain to dissolve the League betwixt that State and Athens. But now other Ephori having entered into their Office, who had nothing to do in making the frraight alliance, and were also much averse unto it, they dealt secretly with the Baotians and Corinthians, to perswade the former to joyn themselves to Argos, and then all to enter into a League with Sparta, which they were fure would purchase this willingly, with a breach betwixt them and Athens, for that then the War would be more easie out of Pelaponness, daily they desired much that the Bactions would deliver up Panastas into their hands, that therewithal making exchange with the Athenians for Pylus, they might with less difficulty make War against them. As the Ambassadors were in their way, two of the principal men of Argos met them, and were very earnest with the Baotians to imbrace their fociety, which, when they came home, they laid open to the Baotarcha, and Ambassadors followed from Argos to perswade them to it, who were kindly entertained and dismissed with hope that some Ambassadors should follow them to conclude the business. In the mean time the Agents from Corinth, Megara, and Thrace, agreed with the Baotarche, that they should bind themfelves by Oath to affift him who should want it, and not to begin or finish

any War without the joynt confent of all, and upon this condition, that the Treaty should be figned. But ere this could be done, the Baotarcha were to refer the matter to the four Councils of Baotia wherein lay the supreme power, which not being made acquainted by them what advice the Ephori and others of Sparta had given, for fear they should give that State offence by joyning with Corinth which had revolted, they judged the contrary, and so by the means of the Bæ-

advice, the matter proceeded no farther now, and afterwards was neglected by 40. This Winter also many Treaties were held betwixt the Athenians and Lacedamonians: about the reftitution of places; and the Spartans hoped. that if Panactus was but restored to the other, they should recover Pylus. But fuch Towns as their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be reftored without their confent, and therefore Ambassadors were sent earnestly to request the Baotians to deliver up Panatius with the Athenian prisoners. They floutly refused to do it, except they would enter into as peculiar and straight a League with them, as they had done with the Athenians. Now this could not be legally done, because in the League with Athens it was provided, that neither should make either League, or War, without mutual consent. Yet being possessed with an imstamed desire of recovering Pylus, and the more, because they were moved by the Ephori, and others that defired a breach with Athens, they struck up a League with them. Then did the Baotians utterly demolish Panactus instead of giving it up, and so the eleventh year of the War ended.

They therefore fent prefently this ther, and ftruck up another League with them for fifty years. In the mean

The Athenians receiotherwise of ved their men, but were much moved that Panadus was demolished (though the Ambassadors put it off by telling them they needed not now to fear any thing from it) being fensible of a double injury received, both as to the Town, and the League made without their knowledge, and then they called to mind other breaches of the peace, and were jealous that they were circumvented by the Spartans. And occasion was hence taken by such amongst them as bare no good will to the peace, to feek all manner of ways to break it. Amongst thele was Alcibiades the son of Clinias by the fifter of Pericles, who though a young man, yet eminent for his Nobility, Riches, and Favour with the people. bare a fecret grudge against the Lacedamonians, for that despising his vouth. and having no regard to the antient friendship betwixt them and his family (which his Grand-father having diffolved, he fought to reftore by kindness shewed to the prisoners taken in the Island) they made use of Nicias and Laches in the conclusion of the League before him, which he thought was much to the prejudice of

They who were now not confulting how to become mafters of others, but how to fave themselves, were well pleafed with his meffage, and though they had Ambaffadors now refident at Lacedemon about the League with that State, yet did they fend away others to Athens, together with the Eleans and Mantineans, to make one offensive and defensive with them there. The Lacedamonians hereat were at a stand, seeing well, that fuch a Combination tended to their hurt. To keep in with the Athenians the Ephori thought that more was done already than food with their honour or profit; others held it the wifeft course, seeing they had done so much. not to flick at a little more, but rather by giving full fatisfaction, to retain the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued than the rest of Greece. This resolution prevailing, such were sent away to Athens as had most affection to peace, who faid in the Senate, that they came with full Commission to conclude all excused the League entred into with the Baotians, as having been done only to pleasure them in the regaining of Panastus, and affured them of the readiness of their State to give all fatisfaction, being much grieved that things went otherwife than according to their pleafure. Alcibiades taking notice that they faid in the Senate, that they came with full Commission to conclude, feared that thereby the people might be drawn to a peace, and he interposed by a notawho hindreth ble stratagem. He perswaded the Ambassadors of his friendship towards their City, and advised them to take heed that their absolute power to conclude might not be known to the Commonalty, left the multitude should thereupon grow peremptory, and yield to nothing, except they could draw them to unreasonable conditions.

43. The Ambassadors believed him, and ordered their speech to the people according to his directions. Hereupon he took the advantage which their double dealing afforded, and openly inveighed against them as men of no fincerity, come for no other purpose than to draw the people from strengthning themselves with friends, intending to withdraw the Argives, and their adherents, to their own alliance, as already they had done the Baotians, though contrary to their Oath. Then he commended the cause of the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans, to the people, which was much moved, having had before no good opinion of the Lacedamonians; but an Earth-quake intervening before they came Nicial labour to the question, nothing was done that day. At the next meeting Nicias perswaded them to let him first go to Lacedamon to know their minds concerning the League with the Baotians, whether or no they would renounce it. and their friendship with Amphipolis, and restore Panastus in such a condition as it ought. But Xenares the Ephorus, and his party, was so strong, that none of thefe things could be procured; only the peace with Athens was again fworn to, to gratifie Nicias, who was fensible how he should be blamed at his return being accounted also the Author of the League After his return the Athenians made a League with the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans for one hundred years, at Hereby nothing in terms was done derogatory to the League with Sparta, and the Corinthians, though the Allies of Argos, yet refused to be comprised in it (as in the former betwixt the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans) alleging that the former Convention was fufficient, which did not oblige them joyntly to make War upon any one, though to defend one another. This they faid, for that they feemed to find reason to forsake these Confederates, and to apply their Minds afresh to the Lacedamonians.

44. This Summer the nintieth Olympiad was celebrated, from the folemnity of which the Laredamonians were kept by the Eleans, being forbidden the Temple, and offering Sacrifice, for which a Guard was fet, because they had not paid a Fine of two thousand Minæ imposed upon them by them, according to the Olympian Law, for putting some men into the Castle Phoryeus, and the Town of Leprea, during the Olympian Truce. They fent their Ambassadors to excuse the matter, but nothing was done, fo that they facrifized at home, which bred very ill Blood betwixt them. After this folemnity the Argives and their Confederates fent to Corinth, to perswade them there to imbrace their Party; but the Ambassadors of Sparta being there, and it being much debated, an Earthquake hapned, and so they returned without any success. In Winter hapned a Fight betwixt the Heracleots of Trachine (placed there by the Spartans to their loss) and part of the Theffalians, with others, wherein they were worsted, and many of them Ilain: amongst whom Xenares the Lacedamonian General. With these things the twelvth Year of the War ended.

45. The next Summer Alcibiades with some Forces out of Attica, and the affiftance of Argos, marched into Peloponnesus, which passing over he came to Patra, where he dealt with the Inhabitants about building a Wall thence unto the Sea, intending also of himself to build another as far as Rhium in Achaia; but the matter was hindred by the Corinthians, Sicyones, and others, who would have been endamaged thereby. The Argives made War against Epidaurus upon light occasion, thinking, that if that Town was but subdued, they should be more fafe from the Corinthians on that fide, and the Athenians would have a readier way to fend them aid from Agina. Whilest they were busie about a Peace, Ephamidas the Corinthian threw this in their Difh, that what they made words of, that they contradicted by their Deeds, and upon that account they drew back their Army. But no conclusion coming of their Treaty, they invaded the Territories of Epidaurus again, and wasted the third part thereof. The Lacedemonians were twice abroad with their Armies this Summer, but were recalled by their superstitious Ceremonies. The Athenians also sent the Argives one thousand men under Conduct of Alcibiades; but they having drawn away their Forces, and having no imployment for them, they returned home. In Winter the Lacedemonians conveyed three hundred Garrison Souldiers into Epidaurus, which passing through the Borders of the Athenians, the Argives expostulated with them for suffering it, contrary to the League, and complained that they restored not the Helotes and Messenians unto Pylus, whence they had taken them upon the defire of the Spartans. This accordingly was done at the instance of Alcibiades. All others were quiet this Winter, except the Argives and Epidaurians, who skirmished sometimes, and towards Spring the former hearing Epidaurus to be naked, came fuddenly with their fealing Ladders, and endeavoured the taking of it, but in vain. Together with this Winter the thirteenth Year of the Wer ended.

46. The Summer following, the Spartans seeing in how bad a case their Friends the Epidaurians were, and that the rest of Peloponnesus had either already revolted, or was ill affected to them, fearing that if they delayed, all things would go worfe, they armed themselves, and Slaves, with their Confederates, under the conduct of Agis their King. It hapned that the Argives were compact fed round about by their Enemies; but when they were about to fall on, two of their Captains steped out, and perswaded Agis to abstain from Fight, saying, that the Argives were willing to do all just things, and make Peace with the Lacedamonians. This they spake of their own Heads, without the consent or knowledg of the Multitude, and Agis, without acquainting any more of the Captains or Confederates, consented to a Truce for four Moneths, and therewith drew off his Army. The Lacedamonians and Confederates obeyed him for the rigour of the Law, but grievously blamed him for letting slip, or raon, and deter-

The Argives also not confidering what danger they had escaped, were fore inraged against their Officers, who had as they thought let the other escape out of their Hands, infomuch that they had floned one of them, had he not taken Sanctuary, and yer they fold his Goods. Not long after a party of one thoufand Foot, and three hundred Horfe coming from Athens to their aid, the People, by the perswasion of Aleibiques, renounced the Truce made with Agis, and the Confederates gathering together, went and besieged Orchomenus, wherein the Spartans had put the Hostages received from the Arcadians, and which was, without much to do, delivered up to them.

47: The Laced infontains being grievoully intaged against Agis, especially after the news came about Orchomenus, beyond all precedent decreed his House should be demolished, and fined him one hundred thousand Drachmes, which he deprecating; and promiting to redeem his credit by fome notable exploit, they yet made a new Law, that there should be ten men affifting to him, without whole confent he should not as much as lead the Army from the City. News prefently was brought that Teges was belieged, whereupon he took the Field, and came to a fet Battel with the Argives and their Confederates, wherein though his right Wing was over-borne through the negligence of the Polematchi (who did According to not foon enough communicate the orders received from him) yet he put to his promite he flight the Enemy in the other, and then coming to the help of it, obtained the redeemeth his Victory. This was that noble Fight, as Thucyaides extolleth it, betwist the most eminent and powerful States of Greece, than which there was none more remarked ble that hapned amongst the Gracians themselves. Yet the number of the slain was not great. Of the Argives and their Allies about eleven hundred, of the Confederates of Sparta not many, and of the Lacedamonians themselves three hundred were reported to have fallen. The Day after, the Epidamnians, while Argos was naked, fell in upon their Grounds, and killed many of those that came out of the City against them. While the Lacedemonians were busie in their Carnean Solemnities, the Eleans and Athenians affifting the Mantineans, went and threw a line about Epidanras, upon which they left a fufficient Guard.

48. In the beginning of Winter the Lacedamontans after their Solemnity was over, again took the Field, but thinking now the Argives might be humbled, fent to feel their Minds about a Peace. At this time fuch as defired a change of about a peace. the Government at Argos became powerful, and hoped if they could conclude which is pre- with the Spartans, to take it out of the Hands of the Multitude, and bring it to cured by a temper agreeable to the confirmations of that State. By the artifices of those those who af- men, the Argives were brought to forsake the Mantineans, Eleans, and Athereted an Olinians, and joyn themselves in a League with the Lacedemonians to continue for fifty Years: It was agreed, that no entercourse should be held with the Athenians, except they would draw our all their Forces from Peloponnefus (The freedom of Epidaurus being especially looked at herein by the Spartans as much concerning them) and that no Treaty or War was to be entred upon without mutual consent. They then took care for several other things, and sent to Perdiccas King of Macedonia, to enter into a League with him, but he did not throughly affent to it, though he bore respect to Argos, whence he accounted himself descended: but they renewed the League with them of Chalcis, and obliged others unto them. The Argives fent allo to the Athenians, to require them to draw off their Guards from Epidawus: but they hereupon fent Demosthenes thither to get all the Fortification into their own Hands, after which they furrendred it to the Towns-men, and renewed their antient League with them, The Mantineans at first refused to joyn with the Argives in the League with A. thens; but after confidering that they could not subsist without them, subscribed, and gave up those places they had in their Hands. After this, one thousand men from Lacedamon, and as many from Argos, were fent to Sicyon, where by the endeavours of the Lacedamonians, the Supreme Power was transferred out of the Hands of the People to few Men, which was after affected at Argos also, an Oligarchy being introduced, agreeable to the Government of Sparta. With this Winter the fourteenth year of the War ended.

49. The Summer following, the People of Argos bearing heavily the change Sect. of the Government, took their opportunity when the Lacedemonians were buffe in the naked exercises of their Youth, and killing some of their adversaries, and expelling others, restored the popular Government, renounced the League with Sparta, and renewed that with Athens. Then they fell on building of their long Walls from the City to the Sea, thinking, that if they should be blocked up by Land, to have entercourse with the Athenians by Sea. In Winter the Lacedamonians knowing that they were busied (men, women, slaves and all) in this work, with their Affociates (all but the Corinthians, who stirred The Laccaemistration not) came against Argos, hoping to take the City by means of those within attempt to take that were of their party; but being frustrated of their expectations, they demolished the Wall, and taking Hylias a Castle of Argolis, put to the Sword all the Males of free condition, and fo returned. After this, the Argives wasted the Territories of the Philafans, for harbouring their Existes. This fame Winter the Athenians renounced the League with Perdicas, accusing him of Conspiracy with the Argives and Laconians, of non-performance of the League betwixt them, and laying the blame upon him that the Expedition milcarried

50. The Year following, Alcibiades with twenty Ships failing to Argos, took thence three hundred men suspected of Laconism, who were carried into the Islands subject to the Athenians, and there committed to custody. After this the Athenians with strong force invaded the Island Melus, the Inhabitants of which being a Colony of the Lacedamonians, denied them obedience. They first sent Commissioners to the Town to treat with the Melians, where there was much canvaffing the case; but in conclusion they continuing in their resolution not to yield, Fortifications were made against the City, and strong Guards left upon them. Almost at the same time, the Argives making excursions into the Phliasian Territories, by the lying in wait of the Phlialians, and their own Exiles, loft eighty of their men. The Athenians that lay in Pylus now also wasted Laconia, notwithstanding which, the Lacedemonians would not take fo much notice as to account the League broken, and thereupon to take Arms; but only caused it to be proclaimed by a Cryer, that wholoever of their Subjects would, might prey upon the Albenians: the Corinthians only about some controversies made War upon them. all Peloponnessus besides being quiet. The Melians made two Sallies against the Besiegers, with good success; but a fresh Army being sent from Athens by the help of some Treachery took it this Winter, upon terms of yielding to Mercy. All the Males of ripe age that could be taken were put to the Sword, the women and children made Slaves, and the Town was repeopled by a Colony of

Their pretence was to give affiltance to their Friends and Allies there, but the true and only cause was the desire of propagating their Empire, by the bringing under of all that whole Island. A good occasion was now given them by the Egestans, who upon account of former Alliance, came and fued to them for Aid against the Selinuntians their Enemies, upheld by them of Syracufe, offering them Money for carrying on the War; whereupon they thought fit first to send Ambassadors to be informed concerning the Money boafted of, and the state of the War. The Lacedemonians this Winter made excursions into Argolis, and carried away much Booty. The Argives caused Ornes to be demolished, where their Exiles harboured, by the help of the Athenians, who sent some Forces to Methone a Town bordering upon Macedonia, thence to infest the Territories of Perdiccas. The Chalcidians hereupon follicited the Lacedamonians to fend Aid to the King, but they thinking it not Policy to break quite with Athens, refufed. that, if it might be, they should restore the Leontines, and do those things which they faw to be most advantagious to the Commonwealth, according to the comportment of affairs. Nicias laboured with all his might to divert the People from such a suddain resolution, proposing all the difficulties and dangers of the War, and thought to have excused himself by magnifying the power that was required to such an undertaking; but his mouth was stopped by a Decree; which gave him as much as he could exact. For one hundred Gallies were ordered for the Expedition, besides others of their Confederates, which amounted to above thirty, over and above Vessels of burthen, and others necessary for the transportation of fix thousand and one hundred men, whereof five thousand and one hundred bore heavy Armour. All things were prepared, with the greatest care and induft'ry imaginable; the Soldiers were completely furnished with Arms, cloths, and all things necessary; and a drachm a day affigned for their wages.

The Home broken at Athens.

53. Before the departure of the Fleet, all the Herma throughout the City (these were the images of Mercary set up at every man's gate) in one night were mangled and abused, which was taken as an ill omen, and the People was jealous that it was done by some that were Enemies to the Popular Government. Great inquifition was made in vain to find out the Authors, but the suspicion light upon Alcibiades one of the Generals, through the practice of his emulators, who made use of his lofty deportment, which ill suited with their Attitudes fur kind of policy. He offered himfelf to the tryal, being fearful to be condemnpected, and definous to be ed absent; but his Enemies put it off for the present, and got him to be sent atried, is yet by way, intending to make use of that which he seared, that being condemned unheard, he might be the sooner oppressed, because now by his own authority and interest, he had drawn many to give their names to the Expedition, and thereforethey could not easily carry any thing against him, because of his popularity. As the Fleet failed towards Sicily, the Generals fent some before to discover further in what conditions the Egeftans were, who bringing tidings clean contrary to what both they, the Egestans themselves, and the Ambassadors sent to them had afferted, the Generals were all divided in their opinions what to do, but Attibiades hot and youthful, was for their proceeding, to which Lamachus at length affenting, his defire was obtained. They then landed and feized upon Catana, attempted Camarina in vain, when Alcibiades received orders to come and plead his cause at Athens about the Herme, his Enemies having obtained it should be fo. In truth he was condemned beforehand, but to colour the matter, he was fent for to plead, and that must be with bonds laid upon him. He was aware of the danger, and departed straight to Lacedamon, with intention to teach the Athenians what person they had compelled by unjust Judgment to forfake his Countrey, and betake himfelf to their Enemies. The two Generals. after the departure of Aleibiades, by a stratagem drew them out of the City, and in the mean time brought their Forces near unto it, and worsted them when they fallied out, but without any great lofs fustained on either part, and then drew off to their Winter quarters at Catana and Naxus. The Syracufians incouraged by Hermocrates one of their new Generals (a wife man, who had forwarned them of the defign of the Athenians) fent to Sparta and Corinth for aid; strengthned their Fortifications, made excursions to Catana, where they wasted the grounds, plundred, and burnt part of the Athenian Camp which was empty. Both fides laboured to draw the Camarinaans to their fide, but in vain; yet many Cities especially in the In-land, imbraced the society of the Athenians, who fent also this Winter to the Carthaginians to procure their amity; the Cities upon the Tyrrhenian shore they also drew in, and all Sicily was now divided into these two factions. 55. The next year the Argives and Lacedemonians preyed mutually upon one another in Pelopointelus. In Stolly the Athenians with their whole force, and new Sapply of horse, sayled to Syrainse, about which they seized upon many places, and leveral skirmilles enfued about the Bortifications , wherein the Atbenians had the better. Then was the Athenian Fleet conveyed into the Haven of Syracuse, whence great contention ensued, and Lamachus one of the Generals affifting his friends was flain. The Syracufians endeavouring the recovery of Epipole were repelled by Nicias, who thence drew a double work against the Town, and firengthned himself by the access of Confederates, and store of provision. The befieged receiving no affiftance from Peloponnesus parlied with Nicias; but the matter succeeding not , they made choice of new Captains, whilst Gylippus was not now far off, but despised by Nicias for the small number of his men. In Greece the Spartans diffressed the Argives, who were assisted by the Athenians with thirty ships. These made excursions into the Territories of Epidaurus, so that the League which had so long continued betwixt them and Sparta, though in a doubtful condition, was now openly broken, and the War refumed; and that more by their fault than any blame of the Lacedemonians, if Thu-

These things being known, the Spartans and Corinthians calling upon their Confederates provided for the invalion of Attica, accordingly as Alcibiades had advised. With these things the eighteenth year of the War ended.

57. In the beginning of the Spring the Peloponnesians under the Command of Agis the Spartan King, invaded Attica, where they fortified Oecalea, a place some twelve miles distant from Athens, and as much from the Borders of Baotia. The Athenians sent thirty ships to waste Peloponnesus, and fixty (with five of Chius) into Sicily under Demosthenes his Command. Out of Peloponnesus were fent to the aid of the Syracusans, from Sparta six hundred men, from Corinth five hundred, Sycion two hundred, and out of Baotia three hundred, to which the Corinthian Gallies lying at Naupattus were ordered to be a Convoy. At Syracuse the affairs of the Athenians, through the skill and valour of Gylippus and Hermocrates, went down the wind, who being also much distressed at home by the excursions out of Decelea, yet kept up their spirits to the admiration of all men. After Demosthenes had arrived in Sicily, and heard of the miscarriages of their Fleet at Sea, he blamed Nicias, that he had not as foon as he came, applied all his endeavour to Syracufe the head of the War, and caused him to agree to set upon Epipole, a difficult and craggy place, where falling on in the dark night, they could not discern betwixt friend and foe, all speaking in the same dialect, and thereby great slaughter being made of them, partly by themselves and the Enemy, the Athenians received a great defeat. The Generals hereupon confulting together, were not of the same opinion; Demosthenes now was for departing away speedily out of the Island, seeing all things hapned cross therein, though he had been the cause of the fight: on the other side Nicias, who had laboured with all his might againft the War, now preffed earneftly that it was for the honour and interest of their Country to stay and carry on the fiege, and though Eurymedon was of the fame opinion with Demosthenet, yet could not Nicias be removed from his, so that their departure was deferred till they understood that Gylippus was come with new supplies out of Peloponnefus and Sicily. This resolution he stuck to so much, for that he knew the multitude rather to lookat fuccess than the reason of things, and was unwilling to hazard

58. But upon the report of Gylippus his coming, Nicias was content, and order was given for the Army to dislodge with the greatest secrecy; when in the mean time fell out an Eclypse of the Moon. By this, which was accounted an ill Omen, was Nicias again so terrified, that out of a superstitious conceit he would not have the Camp break up till twenty seven days were past. The Syracustians much rejoyced hereat, and resolved to hinder their slight, or force them to transfer themselves to some other place. They first beat up thir Camp, and the next day provoked them to fight, both at Land and Sea, and in the mouth of the Haven ingaged in a great and bloody battel, wherein Eurymedon one of the Athenian Generals was flain, and though the Squadron of Gylippus was worsted, which made the Athenians Erect a Trophy, yet had they the worst Again at Sea, of it, all confidered. This made them too late repent that they had so ambitiously and unjustly undertaken a War with a City as great as Athens it felf, and one of the same kind of Government, Enemy to Oligarchy. But the Syracustans were more and more animated, conceiving now great hopes of obtaining much glory and favour amongst the Gracians, of whom some they might free from flavery, and others from the fear of it for the time to come, by chaftifing their Tyrants, as they were accounted. As a way hereto they resolved to block up the mouth of the Haven, that the Athenian Fleet should not pass out thence

59. The Athenians seeing themselves in this straight, concluded it the best for them to make a new, and a more narrow Camp near to their ships, and attempt another battel at Sea, in which, if they had the better, then to remove to Catana, but if not, to burn their Vessels and depart by Land to some convenient place. This was attempted with all care and expedition; but the Syracustans opposed them, and in the straight of the Haven was such a dispute, as scarcely ever before had hapned, which was beheld by the land Armies with pailion fuitable to the condition of their friends : Notwithstanding the Syracusians lost almost as many Vessels, yet the other were so weakned, and the Sea-men so discouraged, that though the Generals would have attempted to breake out another time, yet they refuled any more to go aboard; fo that they concluded of getting away by Land the next night. If this had been done it might have falln out well for the Army, but by the cunning device of Hermocrates they were circumvented, and perfwaded to fray till the third day after.

60. Their departure was most full of out-cries, forrow, and misery, set out to the life by Thucidides, so that none can read it without compassion. Gylippus seized upon their hundred and thirty ships left in the Haven, then pursued them, and fer upon them behind, before, and on all fides, so that diffressed for all necessaries, they took another way than that which lead to Catana, otherwise than they had intended, and they were divided into two bodies, whereof that with Demo-Are forced to thenes from yielded upon promise of their lives. Nicias required better terms. and refused to submit; but at length was forced to it, craving favour for himfelf and men, at the hands of Gylippus and the Spartans; eighteen thousand in one day were flain, seven hundred taken and condemned to Mines, were after fold. The two Generals were (contrary to the utmost indeavour of Gylsppus, who would fain have had the honour of carrying them to Sparta) put to death, or as Diodorus faith, killed themselves in prison. This was the end of the Sicilian War, fo indifferently undertaken by the Athenians, who when they had those already that gave them enough to do, would needs make to themselves more Enemies, and so by labouring to grasp, lost, all. Meton (a) the Astronomer (mentioned before) was fo certainly perswaded of the danger of this expedition, that when he was enrolled amongst those that were to undertake it, to Hift lib. 13. prevent his going, he counterfeited himself mad, to confirm the belief of cap. 12. which he fer fire on his own house. But (b) Hippocrates the Coan (Prince (b)1744 5787) of Physicians) is said to have set out his own fon at his own charge, as Physician by the charge as to the Athenian Army.

61. The Athenians were loath to give credit to the first report of the loss of Thursd, lib. 8. their Army and Fleet, because of the greatness of it, but then knowing it to be so indeed, were much incensed against those that perswaded them toundertake the War, and for that they feared the Sicilians would now come upon them whilst they were defirite of all things, the City was filled with great confernation. Sect. Yet within a while, they took courage, and making all provision for defence, gave Commission to some few of the most antient and experienced amongst them Great joy in to confult and provide fit matter for the multitude to degree. In Winter follows ing all Greece was elevated upon this their bad fuccefs. They who were neuters before, now offered themselves to joyn in suppressing those of whom formerly they flood in fear : the Confederates of Likedemon more vigorously provided against them, and all those that had been subject to them were carnest to shake off the voak. The Lacedemonians having such encourage ment; flet themselves very feriously to the War. Agis their King went into Theffuty to raise money, and a Fleet of one hundred Gallies was prepared amongst the Confederates, "Pharmahazus one of the Sarrapaps of Perfin, and Lieutenant of those parts of Mia about the Hellespoint, and Toffaphernes another of the Sutrapaes, fent to Sparts. and offered them affiltance. There deligns were carried on as fecretly as could be, that the Athenians might get no knowledge of them, who laboured alloat the lame time about the Rigging of a new Fleet. With these preparations the nineteenth year of the War ended. This represents the transport of the war ended.

ged by some success at Sea and thereby the Lucedemonians so far discouraged again, that they thought feriously of concluding the War, till otherwise perswaded by Alcibiades, who undertook an expedition into Ionia to withdraw it from the obedience of Athens, and did very much effect it. The Athenians actings against hereat abashed, and fearing all their Affociates would revole, took out one thoufand Talents, which as yet had been untouched, as forbidden by the Law, and laid them out in this case of extremity in provisions, and especially in preparing a new Fleet. Then by Alcibiades his means was a League of alliance made betwixt Darius Nothus King of Persia, and the State of Sparta, by virtue of which the King allowed money for the paiment of their Soldiers. The Athenians recovered Lesbus, and Clazomena, the Milesians and Chians (principal in the revolt) were destroyed by them, but again they had the worst of it in a Seafight near to Rhodes, which the Peloponnesians then by fair means drew to their fociety, exacting of the Inhabitans twenty three talents in the name of tribute, which fuccels, because of the strength of that City, made them considertly despise the money, and alliance of Persia.

63. For, Tissaphernes and they were at some difference about the form of the League, which they complained was not rightly drawn, for therein they were

162. The next year the Athenians were at the beginning formewhat encoura-

tied to give up to the Persian the Islands, Theffaly, Locri, and Baotia, which heretofore had been under the power of that Empire: which feemed unworthy for the Lacedemonians to do, who pretended themselves the vindicators of the liberty of Greece, against the incroachments of the Athenians; Herewith Tellaphernes was grievously netled, and departed in discontent from Cnidus, where eleven He flieth from Spartans had mer him to require that the instruments should be corrected. At this time it also hapned that Alcibiades was envied for his glory, and suspectout of fear. ed by the Peloponnesians, and hated by Agis the Spartan King, for that he had corrupted his Wife, informuch that order was reported to have been fent to Aftyochus the General, to kill him; but he withdrew himself to Tiffaphernes. He laid open to him the full State of the Peloponnesians, perswaded him to diminish the pay that his Master allowed them, by changing a Drachm into three Oboli a day, part of which also he should ever keep unpaid, to have the Seamen at his devotion. He further fuggested crasty counsel to him: especially that they should not suffer the Athenians to be suppressed by the Lacedamo-Hesuggesteth nians, but to keep those two States ever in an even ballance, and let them weacrafty counted ken one another by their mutual enmitties; yet to favour a little more the Ato Tiffaphernes.

thenians, because they would be content with part of the soveraignty of the Seas. and would go no further, whereas the Spartans would not rest here, but contend for the fole Dominion, and to bring all the Gracians from under the Persian yoak. These things he pressed upon him as great mysteries of State for his Mafter's fervice, and as fuch he embraced them; wherefore the promife he had made of joyning the Phanician Fleet with that gallant one of the Peloponnesians was not performed, and the power of this was weakened by the with holding of the Sol-lying at Samus concerning his defire, and rold them wherein he was dealing with him; and yet he fignified that he had no mind to return, as long as the Popular Government (under which he was banished) should continue. The Athenians that lay at Samus liked the matter well, and generally inclined to change the Government, for that they were made to believe that Tissaphernes by the procurement of Acibiades would be their friend, and they should have money from him for the payment of their Army. But Phrynicus the General standing in fear of Alcibiades, by reason he had spoken too freely against him, opposed it with all his and laboureth might, and when he could do nothing by words, very boldly acquainted Aftyochus the Lacedamonian General with the matter. He who now had not Alcibiades in his power, was no whit eager for his destruction, and being withal corrupted by Tissaphernes to betray his trust, went and acquainted him and Alcibiades with what he had received. Hereupon Alcibiades wrote to the Athenians in Samus, and acquainted them with the treachery of Phrynicus, required them to put him to death as a Traitor to his Country, who hereupon was exceedingly troubled, and boyled with anger against Aftyochus; yet in so desperate a case adding one rash act unto another, he wrote again to him, upraided him with unthankfulness. and fignified that he would betray Samus with all the Athenian Army there unto the Lacedamonians, which he could do, because the Town was unwalled, and would do, forasmuch as it was lawful in so eminent a danger, as he was in, to provide for his own fecurity.

65. Alyochus without taking this opportunity to serve his Country, made this known also to Alcibiades, which Phynicus understanding, and knowing that Alcibiades would write hereof to the Army, that he might prevent him, he told the Soldiers that the Enemy intended to fet upon Samus by Sea and Land, now that the City wanted walls, whereupon he commanded them, having absolute authority, to raise a work about it, and keep diligent watch. This was done accordingly and then though Meibiades his letters presently after arrived, yet no credit was given to the acculation, as proceeding from his bitter Enemy, but more confidence reposed in him. Acibiades then applied himself to Tissapernes to reconcile him to the Athenians, but he being unwilling to lose all his credit, was cool in the business. But whilst he dealt with him, the Soldiers in Samus having fent to Athens to deal with the People about the change of Government, Pisander chief of the messengers laboured to convince them of the absolute necessity thereof, for that otherwise they could not be freed from imminent destruction. The People being circumvented yielded to it, and gave him with ten other Commissioners power to treat, and conclude whatfoever they found necessary for the State, with Tissaphernes and Alcibiades: but the former of these standing in fear of utterly losing the Peloponnesians, and having this always in his mind to keep the two States in an equal ballance, would not give any encouragement, or open his mind fully to Alcibiades, treat with 41- who fearing to lofe his power and credit with him, which he had so boasted of to the Athenians; that he might put them by, demanded such hard Conditions as cibiades and he knew they could not grant, and so the Commissioners returned with great stomach and difdain, to have been fo ill used by him.

66. And Tiffaphernes to profecute that defign of fetting the Grecians upon each other, and keeping them in equal power; fearing that if he detained any longer the pay from the Peloponnesians, that they would be too much weakned by the Athenians, who now of late had the better of it in some engagements, and thereby the King's Provinces should be exposed to danger, went this Winter into Caria, where he renewed the League on better terms for the Peloponnesians, paid the arrears due to the Army, and promiremets the War with the fed to dispatch away the Phanician Fleet. This new alliance was made in Peloponnessants the thirteenth year of Darius, (Alexipidas being Ephorus at Sparta) upon the River Maander, attested by the names of Tissaphernes, Hieramenes, and the Children of Pharnaces. Towards the end of Winter Oropus a Town situate upon the confines of Attica and Baotia, revolted to the Baotians, being formerly in the jurisdiction of Athens. Hereupon the Bavtians conceived hopes to alienate all Eubers from the Athenians, especially for that the Eratrians who were principal in that Island, inclined to a revolt, and fent away to the Peloponnesians to desire they would come into Eubers. But their care for Chius which was diffressed by the Atbenians suffered them not to comply with their defire; for they fet out a Fleet to relieve that Island, but the Athenians being masters of the Sea, it durst not venture further than Miletus; and therefore the Athemian ships returned unto Samus. Thus ended the twentieth year of the War.

CHAP. II. 67. In the beginning of Spring Dercylidas was fent from Sparea by Land to Sect. the Hellespont, with no great force, where with ease he brought off Abydus (a Colony of the Milesians) from their obedience to Athens, and after that Lampfacus, but attempted the same upon Seftus to no purpose. The Athenians and Chians had a battel at Sea upon equal Terms: but Strombichides the Athenian hearing what was done in the Hellespont hasted thither, recovered Lampsacus, was repelled by the Inhabitants of Abydus, and then went to Selfus in Europe, where he placed a strong Garrison for the security of those parts. In the mean time Pifander and his Colleagues being returned from Alcibiades to Samus, in conjunction with those therein, resolved without him to change the Government. They first did it in most of the Cities which were subject to Athens, and found it almost effected there, after that Androcles, a man who was most earnest in the desence of Democracy, with some others, were secretly murdered by some Conspirators, who laboured thereby to gain the good will of Alcibiades and Tiffaphernes. These the Cities sub- designed to have the State governed by five thousand men of the most able with Bodies and Estates to serve it, and the People durst not contradict them, such factions and jealousies had rifen, that no man was secure of his Neighbour. Pisander and his Colleagues arriving, obtained of the Multitude, that ten men for any one to speak his Opinion without danger of incurring any penalty by the Laws. Then they proposed, that no Magistracy should be undertaken and exerci-

five Prefidents should be chosen, who should pick out one hundred men, and each of these chuse three more, that all might make up the number of four hundred. That these four hundred men should be invested with the supreme Power and Au-Eour handred thority; should decreeand ordain what seemed good unto them; and might call men have the together the five thousand when they thought it convenient. These Propositions, though of fo great confequence for the change they were likely to produce, were yet admitted of, not as much as one man gainfaying them, such a change there was made in the minds of the People, which now fince the banishing of the Tyrants, had only been governed by its Laws and Constitutions, and not only not subject to the Authority of others, but reigning over many, devested it felf of fo great Soveraignty and Power. But these four hundred men thus authorifed, were conducted in a folemn manner to the Senate-house, with Daggers under their Coats, and compaffed about with armed Men, where the old Senate having their Salaries paid were dismissed. They chose the Prytanes or Presidents out of their own Body, and then began to exercise their Authority; but not without Blood, Bonds, and Banishment. They sent to Agis the Lacede-Agis about a monian King, then lying at Decelea, to treat of Peace, but he not having any Opinion of their Power as long to continue, but thinking the People would shortly refume it, rejected their Ambaffie, and fending for more Forces out of Pelaponnesus, came to Athens, hoping that in these Commotions he might affright the City into a Surrender. But he found the contrary; for all agreeing in this

They knew the common Soldier's at Samus (though Pilander and his Companions had stickled so for it) to be Enemies to Oligarchy, and therefore to take them off, they fent to acquaint them that the Power was not in them only, but in the five thouland also, and laboured to fatisfie them in this point, that this was equivalent to Democracie, feeing that during that Government, when all things were done by the Body of The Army at the People, a greater number did not use to meet. But they at Samus being im-Samus inraged patient of any but Popular Government, after the departure of Pifander and his Colleagues, had restored it there, and sent to Athens to signific so much, not knowing what had hapned there, which was very unwelcome news to the four hundred, who cast some of the Messengers into Prison. But Chareas, hiding to refiff him as the common Enemy, they stood notably to their defence, and

Sect. 3. Soldiers were grievously enraged, and threatned death, not only to the Authors of the Oligarchy, but to all that had been partakers of it; and at fuch a Seafon when the Enemy expected fuch advantages, they had committed fomething, tending to the ruine of their Countrey, had they not been restrained by the interposition of more stayed and prudent men. Thrasphulus and Thraspllus, who had been most earnest for restoring the Popular Government, that they might do it in a fafe and honourable way, caufed all the Soldiers, especially such as they knew to favor Oligarchy, to take an Oath unanimously to act for the restitution of the power of the People; to fight resolutely against the Peloponnesians; to take for Enemies the four hundred men at Athens, and to admit of no entercourse with of Combinati- them by any Officer at Arms; which Oath also they caused to be taken by all the Samians that were at Age, whose conjunction they thought necessary for carrying on the Defign.

70. Then did the Soldiers chuse them new Officers, of whom were Thrasybulus and Thrasyllus, and encouraged one another to the Enterprize, both from the justness of their undertaking (for that the Army had not revolted from the Citie, but the Citie from it) as also from their Strength, far superiour (especially in respect of the Fleet) to that of the four hundred, adding also, that Alcibiades upon promise of security, and restitution, would be affishing to them, and that they might hope well concerning Tissaphernes, and the King of Persia. In the mean while the Peloponnesians fore mutined against Tissaphernes, and Altyochus, that they had not their pay, and were not lead out to fight with the Athenians, whilft they were fo at odds amongst themselves, which forced the later to draw both Sea and Land-forces to Mycale for anlingagement, but the Athenians refufing to fight, for that they were inferiour to them in number of Ships, when more came from the Hellespont presented themselves; but then the Peloponnesians conceiving themselves too weak for the encounter, refused to ingage. Thraspbulus in the mean while perswaded the Army to recall Alcibiades. Audience being given him, after he had complained of the injustice of his Enemies, he discourfed much of the State of Affairs as they then stood; Magnified above measure his Power with Tiffaphernes (which he did, both to discourage them at Athens, and to render the Satrapa the more odious to the Peloponnesians) who he said would affift them to the felling of the bed he lay on. Hereupon the Soldiers mightily elevated with Hopes, presently created him one of their Generals, with full power, thinking of nothing but the punishment of the four hundred, and refolving without any regard of the Enemie at hand to fail directly for the

71. Alcibiades withstood their Resolution, saying, that nothing was rashly to be committed, and feeing that they had put the Power into his Handshe must go to Tiffaphernes. This he did, not only to transact what he pretended, but also to boast of his new Power, to let the Persian know he could either pleasure him, or incommodate his Affairs, and so this crafty man procured, that he both made him fear the Athenians, and the Athenians stand in Awe of him, whilst hereby he made up his own Interest. That also which he intended concerning Tiffaphernes, and the Peloponnesians, came to pass; for distrusting him before, they were now very bitter against him, fince he hindred the Fight at Miletus, and defrauded them of their pay, and Altyochus their own General they had killed in a Mutiny, had he not taken Sanctuary. Prefently upon this came Mindarus, fent from Sparta to succeed him, who then departed home with an Agent from Tiffaphernes, whom he fent to excuse himself to that State, and answer such Objecti-The Ambaña ons as were made against him. Alcibiades returned from Tissaphernes to Samus, where met him the Ambassadors of the four hundred men (who upon hearing how things went here, had all this while out of fear staid at Delus.) The Soldiers would not hear them, and voted they should be put to death; but he caused them to have leave to deliver their Message, which they did with all the advantage they could, in excuse of those that sent them, accusing of falshood what had been reported by Chareas; but still the Army was diffatisfied and cried out to fayl to the Pireus. Alcibiades now timely interposed himself; for, had the Army then departed for Athens, all Ionia, and the Hellespont had been presently lost; but he put a stop to their heat, and checked those that were so fierce against the Ambassadors. He himself bad them return this Answer, that the five thousand might retain

of five hundred whom they outed: that they should do well at Athens to take care of the Commonwealth, and not to give place to the Enemy: for whilft the City was

fafe, he hoped to make up the breaches; but if either it should be lost, or the Army at Samus miscarry, there would want those who should be reconciled to each other.

72. With this answer he dismissed the Messengers in safety, as he did also with much kindness Ambassadors sent from Argos to offer assistance against the four hundred. Tissaphernes now upon what design is uncertain, went to Aspendus where the Phanician Fleet lay, pretending he would purge himself to the Lacedamonians, and give order to Tamus his Officer to pay the Arrears due to the Army. But neither did he remove the Fleet from Affendus, according to agreement, pretending frivolous things, nor did Tamus accordingly pay the monies; which raifed many conjectures and much discourse. Thurrdides thinketh his design to have been to hold the Gracians in suspence, and suffer them to weaken one another, for that if he had joyned himself to either party, by the help of his Fleet he might in a short time, and without difficulty have finished the War, and given the victory to which side he pleased. Alcibiades went to him with thirteen ships, promising either to induce him to joyn his Fleet with the Athenians, or to procure that he should not affift them of Peloponnefue; it being likely enough that he knew his intention of not moving to the one part or the other; but this he did, especially by his entercourse, and familiarity with him, to increase the indignation and choler of the Peloponnesians, and thereby to constrain him to joyn himself with the Athenians. But the return and report of the Ambailadors lent from the four hundred men raifed great perrurbations in the minds of men at Athens, whilft those, who either out of some ambitious design (all men being greedy of power over others) or for the publick good, defired that the Supreme Authority might be in the five thousand, had the advantage of the other factions. The other were as busie as concerned espicially Phrynicus, because so obnoxious to Alcibiades, Pisander, and others. They sent to Lacedemon to make peace with that State upon any terms, and Fortified that part of the Pirans, which commandeth the mouth of the Haven, which made the other party, which affected Democracy, very jealous : Theramenes crying out that they intended to betray the City to the Enemy, who now with fourty two Gallies hovered about the Coasts. 73. Neither were these mere Calumnies; for these four hundred men for the

How men in

The Traite most particles retain the Dominion over both Citizens and Allies, but if not row designs of that; yet to continue Markers of the Fleet and Fortifications, and if this could not be obtained, then to call in the Enemy, to redeem their lives, and part of the City, with the ships and works; being resolved never to give way to the Popular Government, from which they could expect nothing but fudden destruction. To this purpose they made the Wall upon the Piraus with several Gates to let in the Enemy if need were. But Phrynicia returning from Sparta whither he was fent Ambassador (though to no purpose) was stabled in the Forum by a conspiracy, after which Theramenes and his party grew more bold, and by the help of the Soldiers feized upon some of the Chief of the four hundred, whence enfued a very great turnult, all being ready to fall one upon another, and certain milchief had followed; but that the antient men fomewhat represed the younger. and Thutidides the Philifalian, then fojourning in the City, laboured earneftly to perswade them, crying out, that they should not themselves destroy their Country, now that the Enemy was ready to affail it, and with much ado he kept them from offering violence to one another. Theramenes also checked the Soldiers in the Haven; but he giving way to it," the new Fortifications there were demolified. The next day the four hundred met, though in great fear, and fent fome of their number to appeale the Soldiers, faying that they would chuse five thousand men. who from amongst themselves should chuse the number of four hundred by turns to rule the State, defiring they would not undo the City by compelling it to yield to the Enemy. Herewith the mitids of the Soldiers were fomewhat quieted. and with much ado they agreed that a general Affembly should be had at a certain day for an agreement: but when the day came, and the Affembly was scarce gathered together, news came that the fourty two ships, under Command of Hegelandrides the Spartan, held their course directly from the Coast of Megara, to the Island Salamine.

74. The Soldiers now concluded of the certainty of what Theramenes had told them, and that these ships intending for the Pirans, it was good that the Fortisications were demolished; and likely enough it was that Hegelandrides hovering so long about Episaurus, expected some good opportunity to fall on Athens. Here:

The Athenians

Sect. 2. upon all the Affembly hasted to the Pireus, but the Fleet making towards Eubera at length came to Oropus, which making them very follicitous for Eubers wherein their hope only remained, they sent Thymochares with some ships to Eretria, which he joyning to those that were in the Island, made up thirty fix fail. He was forced to fight fooner than he intended, by the fraud of the Eretrians, who delayed to bring victuals to fell as they were wont, and thereby drew the Soldiers further off from the Fleet, and made great disorder; so that the Peloponnesians setting upon them, whilst out of good order, quickly put them to flight. They took twenty two ships, killing some, and taking the rest of the men: such as fled to Land, and betook themselves to Eretria as to friends, were killed by the Inhabitants; then presently all Eubara, except Oreus, revolted to the Peloponnesians. When tidings hereof came to Athens, never did so great consternation feize upon them there, no not after the overthrow of Sieily. For the Army at Samus diffented from the City; they had neither ships left, nor men to serve in them, and were broken into factions, of which they could not foresee the event; and the loss of Eubera was exceeding great, because that Island furnished the City with more Commodities than Attica it felf. And their fear was increased by the nearness of it, from which the Enemy might presently come and seize upon the Pireus now deftitute of ships, which they did not only think would be, but imagined to be already done. 75. And had the Enemy been a little bolder, he might eafily have done this, and more. Had he belieged the City, it would have been more grievously broken by feditions, and constrained to call home the Army at Samus; and thereby he might have reduced with ease Ionia, the Hellespont, all the Islands, and all as far as Eubaea; and so consequently all the Athenian Dominion into his pow-The contrary er. But well was it for the Athenians that they had fuch an Enemy to deal with dipositions of as the Spartans, who were of so contrary dispositions: they being speedy and the Athenians bold in executing all their defigns; but these flow, and something fearful, especiated burdens ally in Sea-matters, whereby they afforded many opportunities to the Athenians. These things are confirmed from instance in the Syracusians, who being of the fame nature as the Athenians, were good enough for them at all affays. The Athenians in the midst of all their fears took yet all care poslible for their Affairs, furnishing out twenty ships, and meeting together in Pnice, the usual place for popular Assemblies, they abrogated the power of the four hundred, and gave it to five thousand, amongst whom some were to furnish the Commonwealth with Arms, ordering that none should receive any wages for his imployment. Many other meetings then succeeded, in which certain Law-makers were cholen, and other things decreed for the good of the State, at which time Thucydides thinketh the Athenian Commonwealth to have been better than ever tempered and qualified, a moderate, and equal way being brought in betwixt the power of a few, and that of the whole people. A decree also passed for the restitution of Alcibiades, and those with him. Upon this change Pifander and the rest that adhered to Oligarchy fled to the Enemy.

76. In the mean while the Peloponnesian Fleet lying at Miletus, in vain expected money from Tillaphernes, and the coming of the Rhanician Fleet: on the other fide Pharnabazus, Lieutenant to the King upon the Hellespont, promised them all kindness, and in particular used his endeavour to draw all the Greak Cities within his Government from the society of the Athenians, which Tiffaphernes alfo had promifed, but performed like other things. Mindays, the General of the Fleet moved herewith, went from Miletus towards the Edelfone, with a Fleet of feventy three ships, which Thrasyllus the Athenian understanding, made after him with fifty five fayl, labouring to get before him. Some ftop was made by the way, but nothing very considerable done till they came towards an ingagement at Gnosema. Sixteen Gallies of Athens were first met with by the Peloponnesians, who took three of them, and burnt another; and at length both the Fleets joyned battel, being inlarged fince they came into the Hellehout by the accelsof other hips. At first the Peloponnesians put to slight the middle battel of the Abenians, and driving the ships to Land had the better of it there; but being too eager in the pursuite, they brake their ranks, which Thraspulus and those with him observing in his wing, wound about and fell upon them with fuch violence, as forced them to flie. They took twenty one ships, the rest by reason of the straightness of the Sea getting into some Harbour or other, and though they lost fifteen of their own, yet obtained they a feafonable Victory, which made them lift up their heads raged the people alfo, fo that notwithstanding the revolt of Eubera, and intestine Seditions, they had hopes still, if they prolecuted the War with diligence, to have the better. Four days after the Fleet removed from Selfus towards Crait, cus, where in their way they took eight Gallies that came from Byzantium, and taking the Town, which then for want of walls could make no refiftance, fined the Inhabitants; the Peloponness at the same time endeavouring to recruit their Navy. In the mean while Alcibiades having been with Issaphernes ren turned to Samus with thirteen Gallies, bringing word, that he had stopped the Phenician Fleet from joyning with the Peloponnesans, and had rendred the Satrapa more friendly towards the Athenians. Then presently adding nine ships to the former, he constrained the Halicarnasseans to pay a great summ of money, and fortified Cos. Tiffaphernes, when he heard that the Pelopometian Fleet was gone towards the Hellefton, halted from Apendus into Ionia, where understanding that the Inhabitants of Antandrus had received a Garrison from the Peloponnesians of Abydus, because they had been ill dealt withal by Afachus, whom he had made his Lieutenant in those parts, as also that the Peloponnessans had cast his Garrison out of Miletus, and Cnidus Lwhich they did to affront him, laying grievous matters to his charge) left they should proceed any further, and grieving that Pharnabazus in a less time, and with less expence, should make more use of them against the Athenians, he determined to follow them into the Hellespont, to expostulate with them about Antanarus, and purge himself as well as he could of those things laid to his charge about the Phanician Fleet, and other matters. And when he came to Ephelis he facrifized to Diana. If Inherers, after this saming to she Hellespont, Alcibiade, when to visit him, whom he secured, and committed in close custody, preceding he had orders from his Master to make Waragainst the Athenians; but rather for that he feared he should be accused by the Reloponnefians to the King, and therefore thought by this enterprize to redeem his credit But after he had been fecured thirty days, he made his escape to Clasomene, where pretending to have been fent by Tilfaphernes, he sayled thence to the Athenian Army lying at Cardia. Sailing thence to the Hellespont or Cyzicus, he overthrew Mindarus both at Sea and Land, who died also in the fight, taking all the Peloponnessan ships, after which he forced from the Town a great sum of money, and profecuted the Victory by fining and fecuring other places. In the mean while letters were intercepted, and lent to Athens, which were to Sparta, written from Hippocrates Lieutenant to Mindarus, and found to contain the diffress of the Fleet in these few words, according to the Lacedamonian custom: All is A. M. 3594. loft; Mindarus is slain, the Soldiers are familbed: we know not what to do. 01. 92. 43. 2.

But Pharnabazus laboured with all his might to encourage the Lacedemonian Ar-nail Nath my, telling them they had loft nothing but wooden ships, their men being fa-13.84lli Pelop. ved, and that new ones should be built at his Masters cost (who had wood enough 21. at the Mount Ida) in which work he was very diligent, and relieved the Chalcedonians then diffreffed.

19. The news of the success with the letter of Hippocrates coming to Athens, Diodorns ad filled the people with excessive joy, who offered facrifice to their gods, and kept olymp-92.20.30 holy day. They chose then one thousand of the most valiant Foot, and one hundred Horse for profecuting the War, and fent thirty Gallies more to Alcibiades, that he might with greater fuccess set upon the allies of Sparta now the Sea was in his power.

Alcibiades 0verthroweth

The Lacedamonians when they understood how things went, dispatched away Ambassadors (the chief of which was Endius, unto Athens) about a Peace. They offered that both States might retain such places as they had already in their Power, that the Garrisons might be dismissed on both sides, and the Prisoners redeemed man for man; and much in a little was faid by Endius, The Landsmo- to shew that the Athenians were more concerned to be for Peace, though he denied nians tend to not but that the War was hurtful to Sparta. The most moderate men amongst the Athenians were willing to hear of an accommodation; but fuch as made their own Markets out of the publick lofs, and gained by the War, withflood the propolition. Amongst these as principal was Cleophon, the most eminent of the Damagori (or leaders of the People) at this time, though formerly a maker of Harps, whom many remembred to have been bound with Fetters, but he was furreptitiously registred amongst the Citizens. He speaking many things fit for his purpose, especially made use of the late success; which he so improved, as if Fortune now had forgot to be inconstant. The People herewith puffed up, and conceiving great hopes that by the conduct of Alcibiades they should re-obtain their antient Power, refused to entertain the Proposals made by Endius; of which ill advice they were afterwards fenfible, when it was too late, falling fo low from this height of Presumption, that they could never after recover them-

After this, Agis the Spartan King made excursions from Decelea, as far Xinoph. as the Walls of Athens, at which time it hapned that Thraffbulus was in the City Hillen. lib. 1. about bufiness; who leading out his Atherian Soldiers and others that were prefent, offered him Battel; at which he was troubled, and hafted away, loling a Act reputed few of his monin tome light Skirmthes. The acts of Thrafybulus the Athenian.

81. The next Year in which the ninty third Olympiad was folemnized, wherein Euboras the Gyrengan gov the Prize in the Course, Endrehoppus being Ephorus at Sparta, and Eastemon Archon at Athens, Thrafybulus having obtained the Ships decreed to him, with five thousand Sea-men, failed to Samus, whence after three days he departed, and took Colophon, made excursions into Lydia, where obtaining much booty, he also went against Ephefus. Tiffaphernes coming in in good time, he was beaten back from the City with double lofs, whence he failed to the Hellespont, and in his way at Lesbus pur to flight a Fleet of twenty five Syracustan Ships, four whereof he took with the men in them. Then departed he to Seffus to the other Athenian Porces, and thence removed to Lampfacus with the whole Army in the beginning of Winter, which Town they fortified, and belieging Abydus overthrew Pharnabazus, who came with a confiderable Body of Horle to relieve the Town; which Victory reconciled the Soldiers, who before this were at odds, because those under Alcibiades being hitherto Victorious, would not be joyned with the followers of Thrasphulus who had been beaten. In the same Winter the Athenians made frequent depredations in the Territories of the Persian King "Then also the Helots which had fled from Malea to Coriphasium, were upon agreement dismissed by the Lacedamonians; and the Plantation of Heraclea, and Trachinia, were by the Acheans the ancient Inhabitants, betrayed into the hands of the Oeteans the common Enemy, and seven hundred of them slain, together with Labotas the Lacedamonian Governour. Thus the twenty fourth Year of the War ended, wherein the Medes having rebelled, were reduced to Obedience by Darius Nothus, and the Temple of Pallas at Phocaa was burnt with Thunder and Lightning.

82. In the beginning of the next Spring Pantacles being Ephorus at Sparta, and Activisates be-fregeth Chalce. Antigones Archon at Athens, the Athenians with their whole Army and Fleet went into Proconnesus; thence to Chalcedon and Byzantium, and sate down before Chalcedon. The Chalcedonians aware of their coming, fent all their Booty to the Bythingans their Neighbours, which being known to Alcibiades, he went with a fufficient Force, and by Threats got it delivered up to him, after which returning he compassed Chalcedon from Sea to Sea with a Rampire, and to the Ri-

Pharnabazus during the Fight came to relieve him, but could not get to them by reason of the Athenian Fortifications. He, whilst Alcibiades was absent, gathering Money from the Cities, made an agreement with the other Athenian Captains, that he should pay them twenty Talents, that the Chalcedonians should pay all their Arrears, and afterwards as much as they were wont: in the mean time the Athenians should offer them no Violence, till the Athenian Ambassadors, which he took upon him to convey, should return from the King, Alcibiades at this time was at Selymbria, which having taken, he returned to Byzantium with a body of Horse and Foot newly raised in Cherronefus and Thrace, where Pharnabazus expecting him to have his Oath to the agreement. He refused to take his Oath except Pharnabazus did the like, who condescended to him, and so they both swore not to hurt each other. Together with the Athenians, others went as Ambassadors to the King from the Lacedemonians; as also Hermocrates and his Brother Proxemus now banished from Sy-

83. The Athenians then prefently befieged Byzantium, which having no hopes to obtain by strong hand, they attempted by Treachery, and had it delivered up to them, whilst Clearchus the Governour, a Lacedamonian, was gone to Pharnabazus to follicite him about Money to pay the Soldiers, and to gather a Fleet together wherewith if possible he might raise the Siege. News hereof was carried to Pharnabazus then wintring at Gordium in Phrygia with the Ambassadors whom he was carrying to the King. In the beginning of Spring when they were on their Journey, they met with some Spartans, who already had been with him, and faid they had obtained from him for the Lacedemonians what they defired, and how he had appointed his younger Son Cyrus his Lieutenant for the Sea coasts, whom he had commanded also to affist the Spartans in the War, bringing a Commission with him whereby he was constituted Governour over all that used to meet upon the Plains of Castolus. The Athenian Ambassadors hearing this, defired first to see Cyrus, and then to go to the King; but if not, to return home. But Cyrus required Pharnabazus, either to deliver them up into his Hands, or to fend them back, because he would not have the Athenians privy to what was done. But he neither fent them to the King, nor difinified them, but kept them off and on for three Years, after which he obtained leave of Cyrus to difmiss them, seeing he would not permit them to go to his Father, and fo procured them by Ariobarzanes to be conveyed through Mylia to Sea: and fo

they sayled to the Athenian Army.

84. Alcibiades having a great defire to return to Athens with the Army, first Xeaoph, ibid. betook himself to Samus, whence he went and gathered up one hundred Talents Platarels in amongst the Carians, and returned thirher. Thrafybulus with thirty Ships going Alcibiade. into Thrace, reduced several places into his Power, and Thasus amongst the rest, forely at this time distressed with Seditions, Famine, and Pestilence. Thrasphulus with the rest of the Army failed to Athens, before whose coming the People had created anew three Generals, Alcibiades, and Thrasybulus, who were absent, and Midblades re- Conon present in the City. Alcibiades encouraged hereby sailed to the City, where at his landing multitudes of People came to meet him, admiring his perfon, and the prefent posture of Affairs, which they ascribed to his good conduct, whom they now acquitted from what was laid formerly to his Charge, and excufed him for fiding with the Enemy, feeing he was thereunto led by necessity. He spoke to the Senate and People in his own defence, and gave such satisfaction, no body opposing, that he was created General with full Power, as able to refore the Commonwealth by his own Industry to its antient Power. He first on Land (which of late had not used to be done for fear of the Enemy) celebrated the Eleufinia, and then ist the third Moneth after his Arrival, with a Fleet of one hundred Gallies, aboard of which were one thouland and one hundred Foot of heavy Armour, and one hundred and fifty Horse, he failed to Andrus, the Inhabitants of which he worsted in Fight, and thence departed to Samus, intending to make use of Lyfander made that Island as the Seat of War. At this time Lifander was sent from Sparta to Lectdemonians, succeed Cratisippidas in the Fleet, who went to Cyrus to desire him in earnest to obtaineth pay undertake the War, blaming the backwardness of Tissaphernes. Cyrus promised him his utmost assistance; but he defired that the Saylers might have a Drachm

He answered, he could do nothing against his Fathers Order, who had appointed for every Ship thirty Mine a Moneth, it being in the power of the Lacedamonians to furnish out as few, or as many Ships as they pleased; but afterwards he condescended to increase their pay to four Oboli a day : Moreover, he paid them all their Arrears, and gave them a Moneths Pay before-hand, which made them very chearful, and ready for all Duty.

85. The Athenians were much troubled hereat, and fent also to Cyrus to obto meddle with tain his Favour, but could not be admitted, though Tissaphernes used all his inthe Athenian terest in their behalf, relating, that his design had been according to the wise Altibirds go. For, the Athenians came on without order, and so within a short time were discomfited, Antiochus flain, and fifteen Ships loft; the other returning back to Samus. Alcibiades returning within a while, in great chafe for what had hap-ned, went, and offered Battel again to Lyfander, but he contenting himself with his former Victory would not stir, and not long after the Lacedamonians took For which Al- Delphinium and Eion, two Towns in Thrace. This loss was at Athens by Thrafybulus imputed to the neglect, and luxury of Alcibiades, who thereupon by the people was outed of his Command, and ten other Captains chosen for the management of the War, amongst whom was Thrasphulus himself, Conon, and Pericles the Son of Pericles the great. He then went and made War upon the Thracians that were not under the Command of that King, and thereby enriched himself with great Treasure, having built a Castle for his security, called Bisanthe, in those parts. Conon who at this time was governour of Antandrns, Phanishanes being affigned his Successor, according to the decree of the People, went to Samus, took Thuria, and made excursions into the Territories of the Enemy. So this Year ended, in which the Carthaginians with a Fleet of one hundred and twenty Gallies, and one hundred and twenty thoufand men invading Sicily, overthrew the Agrigentines, whom after a feven Moneth's Siege they also forced to a surrender. 86. The Year following wherein the Moon was Eclypsed in an Evening (A. pril the twenty fifth, some three hours after Sun-set, as the Astronomical Table demonstrates) and the old Temple of Pallas was burnt at Athens, Pitaus being Ephorus at Sparta, and Callias Archon at Athens, the twenty fixth Year of the War commencing, Callieratidas was fent from Lacedamon as Successor to Lylander, whose time was now expired. He having furnished himself with Money subdued Methymna, and charged Conon the Athenian General to depart out of those Coasts, and when he perceived him putting out to Sea, made after him, callinguistation intending to stop his Passage to Samus. He pursued him to the Haven of Mitylene, where he worsted him, took thirty of his Ships, and then besieged him in the Town, from which he cut off all Provisions. Conon fent out two Gallies to carry word hereof at Athens; one of which escaping clear from the Enemy, came thither with the News, whereupon relief was presently decreed to be fent. Callicratidas in the mean time overthrew Diomedon, who came to relieve Conon with twelve Ships, ten whereof he took, but when he heard that the Athenian Fleet was now come to Samus, confifting in all of one hundred and fifty Sayl, he left Eteonicus with fifty Ships to continue the Siege, and with the other one hundred and twenty betook himself to Males, a Promontory of Lesbus over The Athenian against Mitylene, where he supped, and it hapned that the Athenian Fleet coming to Arginula (a place also over against Lesbus) supped there the same Night. Here they fought the next Morning a long, and earnest Battel, wherein at length Callieratidas his Ship being Sunk, and he in it, his men began to flie towards Chius and Phocea. The Peloponnesians lost seventy nine Ships, and the Athenians ninteen, with most of the men in them.

87. The Athenian Generals resolved that Theramenes, Thrasybulus, and others, with fourty two Ships, should haften to such Vessels as were as good as lost, to Sect. preserve them and the men, and the rest should sayl to Mitylene against Eteonicus; but a vehement Tempest arising they were all hindred, and forced to continue in the same place, during which stay, Eteonicus having notice by a Pinnace how things went, told his men the clear contrary, with which artifice incouraging them to take the Sea, he escaped. It might have been expected that the ten Captains, who joyntly had the Command in chief over the Athenian Fleet, might have received great Honour for fuch a Victory: But they were instead hereof. by the especial endeavour of Theramenes, brought to Judgment, for suffering many Citizens to perish in the broken, and sunken Ships; whereas, as it was pretended, they might have faved them. They alleged juftly for their excuse the Tempest which followed the Fight; but after much canvasing, both in the Senate and Affembly of the People, the Malice of Theramenes (who fet persons on to make great Lamentations for those that were dead) so far prevailed, together with the forgery of acertain fellow (who laying that he himself escaping in a Meal-Tub, had been intreated by those that were in peril of drowning, to desire And for that the people to revenge their death against the Captains) that against the form of And for mark Law (contrary to which Socrates the Philosopher only refuded to act as one of edwiths fenture of death the Prytanes) eight of them were condemned, and fix being prefent were put executed upon to death; amongst whom was Perioles the Son of Perioles. Those that were abfent escaped, the heady multitude quickly repenting of their rashness, and the acis a summer tent etcaped, the nearly mututure queenly repetiting to their attacks. It is made a more than the pad done. Afterwards a minute to so Sedition being railed, wherein Cleophon was flain, they took the opportunity and fled; but Callixenus one of the most faulty returning to the City, and hated of all men, was famished to death.

88. The Soldiers of Eteonicus wintring in the Island Chius, where they wanted xinoph line. both Victuals and Clothes, most of them conspired together to seize upon the City Chius, to which wholoever agreed was to wear a Reed as a diffinction. He having notice of it, was fensible what ill will, difgrace, and damage it would bring upon him if it proceeded, and fearing his own Life, he boldly killed one of the Soldiers, whom he met with the Reed upon him, and being asked the reason of it, said as boldly, it was for wearing that mark of Sedition, whereat the rest were so daunted that they for fear cast away their Reeds, and so the Plot was broken in pieces: Then received he Money of the Chians, and gave them a Moneths Pay, and taking no further notice of the Plot, encouraged them with fair Words, and promises, and so sayled away. After this the Al-Distain is feet them Meter rain voices, and property of confulle about their Affairs, where it was agreed for by the All is mer together air Ephelius to confulle about their Affairs, where it was agreed it is or refune that ten men thould be fent to Zacedemon to desire that Zalander might be seit the words.

Leave the Affairs and the confusion of the confusion Laws of Sparts he could not be twice General, and therefore they found out a middle way, to appoint Aracus to that place, and fend him as his Lieutenant. Five and twenty Ships were then delivered to Lylander, at the end of the twenty fixth Year of the War, wherein Cyrus killed his two Coulins Autobeld ces and Micreus, because they had not given him the Honour due to Kings of Persia, by holding their Hands within their Clothes when they came to him. For this he was accused to his Father, who upon pretence of Sickness sent for him to come to him.

89. The Year following wherein Archytas was Ephorus at Sparta, and Alexias Identibid. Archon at Athens, Lifander gathering his Navy together, went to Cyrus for corn. Moos & Money, which being obtained with fome difficulty, he paid his Soldiers and Sea in Pluta men their Arrears. At Samus also the Athenians provided for fighting ; where alcibial in the mean time came a Mellage to Cyrus from his Father, who now being fick defired to fee him, although at this time the King lay incamped against the Thamneri of Media, Neighbours to the Cadulians, who had revolted. Cyrus hereupon fent for Lyfinder, and confulting with him about the War, defired him not to Fight the Athenians, except he overmatcht them in number of men, told him his Father and he were able enough to encrease the Fleet upon condition and to bind him and the State of Sparts to him, he gave him all the Revenues he had in those parts, with all the ready Money, and fo took his Journey. Lyfander neither daring to Fight the Enemy with fo few Ships, nor to be idle with so many, subdued some places, and having given Agis a Visit in Attica, fayled unto the Hellespont, which finding clear, he belieged Lamplacus, and took it. The Athenian Fleet, which confifted of one hundred and eighty Gallies, hearing of this, came from the Cherronesus to Sestus, and thence sayled to Egospotamos;

Sect. 2. a River over against Lampfacus, the Hellesport at this place being not two miles broad. Lyfander contained his men in great order, and refused to fight without an advantage, which was at length given him by the Athenians, who braved him, but were in continual disorder, carelesly running up and down, insomuch that Alcibiades having notice of it, came and advised the Captains to look better to themselves, but returned with no other recompence than bad words. But Lylander keeping diligent watch upon them, observed his time when they were most of them landed, some eating and drinking, others looking for victuals, and others wandring up and down, and fetting upon the Fleet eafly became Mafter of it all without any opposition, except eight, wherewith Conon fled into Cyprus unto Evagoras the King, knowing how bad entertainment he should have at home.

90. Such Athenians as had confusedly got into their ships were slain or taken, and those that were yet on Land by the Land Forces, which Lysander had in a readiness for that purpose. He took three thousand men, with the Captains and all the ships, except those eight of Conon, and a Packet-Boat, which tacking to his own ships, with the found of Pipes and the Paan sung, he returned in triumph unto Lampfacus. Then called he the allies together to confider what was to be done with the prisoners. Many crimes were objected against them, as that they had A confultation done many unjust things, and now had determined, it they had got the Victory, to cut off the right hands of the Peloponnesians (or the thumbs rather, as Plusarch hath it, of their right hands, that they might never be able more to handle spears, but

upon it was resolved, that they should all be put to death, except Adimantus who had withstood the Decree of cutting off the hands, which sentence was accordingly executed. Lyfander then failing about to the Cities under the Athenian power, dismissed the Garrison Soldiers and all others he found, with charge to get them to Athens under pain of death, which crafty policy he used to fill the City with men, that it might not be able long to endure a Siege for want of Vittuals. When they of the City heard the news, they were affected accordingly, bewailing not only the fortune of the flain, but their own alfo, expecting now that should be done to themselves, which heretofore they had done to the Melians, a Colony of Sparta, and to the Histiaans, Scionaans, Toronaans, Eginetans, and many other Greek Cities, not in way of revenge for any injury, but out of indulgence to their own lust; for that they rejoyced in other mens miseries. Yet as grief would give way to prudence, they took care for fortifying the City against a Siege, in which they could not look for any affiftance from ellewhere, all their Confederates, except the Samians, having for faken them, and fuch as they had banished from their dwellings being again restored to those places which they had filled with Colonies of their own.

91. Lyfander having taken away Democracy, brought in the power of a few into all the Cities. Herein he dealt with much cruelty and ambition, (putting in such men only as were his creatures, that he might obtain an unlimited power or Tyranny over all Greece) and fending for Land Forces from Sparta; he befieged Athens both by Sea and Land. The Athenians continued to resolute for a long time, that till many were already dead of famine, not a word was heard of asking Peace. Then Ambassadors were sent to Agis the Spartan King about it, who referred them to Sparta, having as he faid no commission to entertain their overtures. Thither then they went, offering, that they might gain the friendship of Lacedamon, to part with all places besides the City and Piraus, where they would retain the Fortifications; but they had for answer, that if they feriously defired peace, they must return home, and not return till they had better advised of the matter. Hereat the Athenians were much abashed, thinking now of nothing but service; none daring to propose the demolishing of the walls; for the Lacedamonians having offered them Peace upon these terms, Archestratus for advising them to imbrace it, was imprisoned, and it was decreed that it should be unlawful to mention it for the time to come. Theramenes then procured to be fent to Lylander to get out what his intention was, whether to enflave them, or to have the walls demolished, and thence he returned not till the fourth moneth, that in this time they might be costrained to resolve of something. At his return, he said he could get no other answer, but that they must fend again to Sparta, and thereby he procured himself and others to be fent with full authority for concluding a Peace.

92. The Ambassadors of the Confederates being assembled at Spares, many of them, especially the Corinthians and Thebans, urged that no composition was to be made with them, but that Athens should be destroyed; but the Spartans would the greatest dangers of Greece had done the greatest things for it's deliverance; They then without much delay made peace with them upon these terms : That the long walls and the fortifications of the Piraus should be demolished; that they should deliver up all their ships except twelve, receive their exiles, follow the Lacedamonians both by Sea and Land in the Wars, and have the same Friends and Enemies with them.

Some at the return of the Ambassadors would have refused these terms; but the far major part fiding with Theramenes accepted of them. Lylander then feized upon the ships, and the walls, upon the fixteenth day of the moneth Munichion (on which they had formerly overthrown the Persians at Salamine) and went about to alter the Government, which the People strongly relisted, infomuch that he fent back to Sparta to complain of them, faying, they had broken the League, in that their walls were not demolished; and though no worse thing was yet decreed against them though pressed by some, yet this made them willing to receive any thing. SECT. IIII.

From the end of the Peloponnesian War to the beginning of the Reign of Philip King of Macedonia.

Containing the space of fourty four Years.

He year following being that wherein the ninty fourth Olympiad was celebrated, in the course of which Crocinas the Thessalian got the zeroph, ne prime prize, Endicus was Ephorus at Sparta, and Pythadorus Archon at Athens, whom yet the Athenians did not so account, because that the Oligarchy being brought in this year, they effected it as Anarchical. As foon as the long walls and the Piraus were demolished by the command of Lylander, thirty men were chosen to make Laws, by which the Commonwealth might be governed. After their creation and investiture in the power, they deferred both to publish or write the Laws; but constituted the Senate and other Magistrates The thirty Ty- at their pleasure. So that those being condemned by the Senate, they were pur to death. But afterwards they began feriously to lay their heads together, how they might make themselves Masters of all. They sent Achines and Aristotle two of their company to Sparta to defire a Garrison for the better government of the City, till they had taken out of the way all naughty persons, and had settled the Commonwealth, promising themselves to pay the Soldiers. Lyfander being made use of procured what they defired, and Callibius was sent as Harmostes

Now then they fell upon, not only naughty and dissolute persons, but on the best, whosoever they thought ill affected, and would indeayour to stop their proceedings. Theramenes one of them protested against this cruelty, and added, that it was impossible their power should continue in that State without a fufficient company to affift them. Hereupon they fearing him, left he should make himself Captain of the discontented, which was almost the whole City, chose out of the Citizens three thousand which they thought meeteft for their purpose, and gave them some part of the power, with this priviledge, that none of them should be put to death without the consent of the Senate; all the rest of the People being left to the discretion of the thirty, whom they also disarmed at a general muster. 2. Now thinking themselves secure enough, they filled all places with mur-

Fillall places ders, not only of their private Enemies, but such whose wealth might enrich withmurders them, of which they were excessive greedy; and to this purpose they agreed, that every one should name one man whom he would put to death for to seize upon his goods. Theramenes having disliked the election of the three thousand, tittered now also his detestation of this wickedness, refusing himself to commit ir. For this they were more jealous of him, fearing he might crofs their abhominable practices, and refolved upon his destruction; so that having provided a company of young men with daggers to affult them, they called the Senate together, and therein Critics (his once familiar friend, but now his deadly Enemy, because the most cruel Tyrant of the thirty) bitterly accused him as a turbulent and unfetled man; being now for the People, and another while against them; he objected against him the death of the fix Captains procured by him, and concluded he was not a fit man to live in a Commonwealth, especially so constituted. Theramenes replyed with undaunted courage, and gave fatisfaction to the Senate, as Critical perceived by their muttering, who thereupon concluding, that if he escaped it would endanger his own life, he consulted with his Companions, and then returning to the Senate, told them, that having first expunged his name out of the Catalogue of the three thousand, and hereby he being subjected to their Theramenes one censure, they condemned him to death. Theramenes replied again, that his of them, for name was no more easie to be blotted out than any other mans, in consideration wickedness, is whereof, he advised them all to make his case their own: but none daring to opput to death. pole, for that they knew the men that were present to be privily armed, he was led away, and compelled to drink poyfon, which he did with a refolute and gallant spirit. After this the Tyrants, as being at liberty to do what they plealed, forbad all that were not contained in the Catalogue, to come into the City, from which they expelled them and the borders, that they and their Affociates might enjoy their Lands. The Citizens betook themselves to the Piraus, but being thence also expelled, they filled Megara and Thebes with their

Herewith the Tyrants were lomething discouraged, but thinking it best to get Elessine into their power, they went thither, and perceiving the Inhabitatants that were able to bear Arms to go out at the gates, that they might only as they pretended take the number of their heads, most wickedly murdered them. After this Thrappulus with one thouland men feized upon the Piraus, against whom, though the Tyrants came out with their whole power, yet he obtained the Victory against them, killing seventy, and what more, Critias the Arch Tyrant, with Hippomachies one of the Collegues, and Charmider one of the ten Captains which had been placed over the Pirent: When the flain were delivered up to be buried, and thereupon both parties met, Cleocritus

His speech produced such effect, that the three thousand fell at difference amongst themselves; such as had been busied in the destruction of other men, together with the Tyrants, vehemently contended that nothing was to be granted to them in the Piraus; but those that were confident in their own innocence, crying out there was no reason that they should obey the will and pleasure of the thirty, and suffer the City to perish, prevailed against them. 4. Notwithstanding the change of the Government, yet there was no accord They fend for betwixt them in the Pireus and those in the Town, but several acts of Hostility they committed against one another. At length the three thousand in the Town, and the Tyrants of Eleufine, fent to Sparta to defire aid against the other, saying, that the people revolted from the Lacedamonians; and Lylander procured them one hundred Talents to be fent out of hand, himself ordered to go General to affift them, and his brother Libys General of the Fleet. Then befreged he the Piraus, both by Land and Sea, and forely streightned them; but Pausanias the fiegeth Thra-fibulus, and Spartan King thinking much that he should get the glory of Conquering Athens the fecond time, which he would make as his own, he perswaded the Ephori to give way, that he should follow him with another Army, under pretence of affifting him; upon which account the Corinthians and Baotians amongst the Confederates refused to follow him, alleging they should break their Oaths by fighting against them, who had done nothing prejudicial to the peace. This they did, concluding that the Lacedemonians would lay the Territories of Athens to their own demains. Paulanias, after his arrival, fent to them in the Piraus to bid them depart, and they refusing it, for a colour to his designs, he led his Forces against them. But returning without any thing performed, he went to view the Walls the next day, at which time they fallied out upon him, and still fresh supplies coming in on both fides, wrought, and received confiderable damage.

those in the City to end the controversie, that both might become friends to the But Paulinin Lacedemonians. The two Ephori present with him (for two used always to accompany the Spartan Kings in their expeditions) inclined to his opinion, rather than to the severity of Lyfander, and so accordingly they sent Ambassadors from taketh up the both parties to Lacedemon about an agreement. The Lacedemonians after audience presently dispatched ten Commissioners with them back to Athens, who, together with Paufanias, might make an agreement. They presently composed all on these terms: That all should return home to their own habitations, except the thirty, and the ten, and eleven men which had commanded in the Pirxus; and if any feared the people they might remove to Eleusine, These things being done, Paufanias drew off the Spartan Army, and those that were in the Piraus went up with their Arms into the City, and there facrifized to Minerva. Then by the perswasion of Thraspulus the popular Government was restored, and all things ordered as in former times. A little after it being heard that they in Eleuline hired Soldiers abroad, attempting new matters, the whole City role against them, took their Captains as they came to parley, and flew them the rest by their friends fent to them were perswaded to agree. Then passed a general Act of Oblivion for all that was past, confirmed by an Oath, to keep which they being very careful, even yet faith Xenophon, joyntly mannage the affairs of the Commonwealth. By which wife order the City returned to its former quietness, upon this Sedition raifed by the thirty Tyrants, who being created by a Decree of the Senate, as * another faith, put to death one thousand and four hundred Citizens *100 critics in unheard, and forced more than five thousand to fly into the Piraus.

When the Athenians were deprived of their liberty by the means of Lylander, and the Tyranny of the thirty, they then began again to repent of what they had done to him, judging that if he had been yet at the Helm, they should never have made this wrack of their liberty, and still their confidence was in him, and thought their cause was not utterly desperate as long as he was safe. The Tyrants also were jealous of him, procuring all the intelligence they could concerning all his actions, and at length Critias remonstrated to Lyfander, that things could not stand as they did long, if he lived, who yet was nothing perswaded to procure his death, till he received a Scytala from the Magistrates at Sparta, who either feared his great abilities, or did it to gratifie Agis, to remove him by fome means out of the way. He fent to Pharnabazus, requiring him to dispatch him, who enjoyned his brother Magaus, and his Uncle Susamithres to be his Executioners: They coming to the Village in Phrygia where he lived, durst not enter his house, but compassing it about set it on fire. He perceiving what was done, took fome Clothes, and casting them into the fire, which keeping down the flame for some space, he brake out, whereupon the Barbarians fled, not daring to stand to him, but at a distance killed him with Darts, after which his body was burnt (with that matter that was prepared to consume him alive) by the care of his Paramour Timandra, the Mother of Lais the famous Corinthian Courtifan. Thus he died in the flow'r of his age, scarce exceeding fourty years, a man very beautiful, of most excellent parts, fit for any imployment, able to accommodate himself to all, both times, and customs, though never so repugnant, and therein yet esteemed to excell. Socrates upon him excercised the true Platonick love, labouring to infuse such virtue into him as might make him truly lovely; but fuch were his temptations, and inclination, that counterpoifing the inftructions, nature in this man feemed to try what she could do; it being agreed by all, faith * one who wrote of him, that none was ever more eminent, both for vice and * com. 7. After these things Cyrus made War upon his brother Artaxerxes, as hath xinoh.lib. 2. been faid elsewhere, at what time he sent to Lacedemon, demanding a return for his kindnesses shewed to them, who thinking it most just, sent their Admiral to keep in play Syennesis the Satrapa of Cilicia, till he passed that Countrey. After his overthrow, Tiffaphernes his greatest Enemy, being a most insolent man before, now grew more haughty (after the King had laid the Province of Cyrus to his Satrapy) and began to be more troublesome to the Greek Cities in Asia. They fent to complain hereof at Sparta, which State fent to their relief Thimbron with an Army of one thousand new raised Soldiers out of Laconia, four thousand Foot of Peloponnesus, and three hundred Horse from Athens, which the City willingly parted withal, with no good prosperity wished to their persons, for that they had been in the service of the thirty Tyrants. What he did in A fis, and how he returned home after Dercyllidas was fent to fucceed him, and was banished upon the complaint of the Confederates, is related in the Affairs of Alia. At the same time as Dercyllians managed the War beyond the Seas, the Lacedamonians and Eleans reviving their old grudges and complaints, broke out into another War, which was begun by the Lacedamonians at the instance of the Ephori. They fent out Agis their King, who led an Army into the Territories of the Eleans; but an Earth-quake hapning at his first entrance, which was counted ominous, he returned without any thing at all performed. The year after, he undertook another expedition, the Athenians, and all the other Confederates, except the Corinthians and Baotians, following him, wherein he forely afflicted all the Country, sparing the City Elis it self, and though he retreated, yet the Garrison he left behind him, continuing these depredations all the next Summer, and the Winter following, the next Summer the Eleans were conftrained to receive fuch conditions as their Enemies would give them. The Wall about Patra was demolished, Cyllene relinquished, five Towns delivered into the hands of the Spartans, and three to the Arcadians; the management of the Affairs of the Temple belonging to fupiter Olympius being only left remaining to

He had not been with his wife Lyjandro. of ten moneths before the Child was born; Times her felf was wont when de laudibus she would play with it to call it Alcibiades more commonly than Leutychides, as Astill. was acknowledged by her maids; and neither did Alcibiades himself forbear to acknowledge that he had to do with her, faying, it was not out of any carnal affection, but out of a defire that those who should proceed from him might reign at Lacedamon; upon these grounds Agis owned not Leutychides for his Son, the Spartan Kingdoms.

CHAP. II.

A contention but told the Ephori he was none of his, divorcing also his Mother; but when he Sect. lay fick, having no Children, and moved by his prayers and tears, he owned him for his fon before many witnesses. After his death a great contention insued about the succession betwixt Leutychides and Agesilaus brother to Agis, a man lame of one foot, but of a most noble and valiant disposition. Agesilans was bred after the ordinary strict way, as not having expected the Kingdom being a younger brother. and yet was in great favour with the people, and preffing the illegitimation of his adversary had their ear; but one thing they much stuck at, which was an old Prophecy much urged by Diophites their Prophet, that it (bould go very hard with Sparta when it (bould have a lame King. Yet Ly/ander, who had taken a great affection to him, answered, that by a lame King was not meant lame of a foot, which could be no hinderance to virtue, but one of spurious extraction ; and herewith, and by his private interest, procured the sentence to pass for Agellans.

9. Agesilaus had not been a year in his Office, before that being to facrifize for his Countrey according to the custom, the entrails of the beast three times did not permit it, which being viewed by the Prophet, he forefold that a grievous conspiracy was hatched against him, and all Magistrates, both in Town and Country. Five dayes after this a notable conspiracy indeed was disclosed to the Ephori by one of the Complices, the head of which was Cinadon. They presently referring it to the Senate, it was thought fit that he should be sent out of the City, under pretence of some employment, and that some should go after him to make him reveal his fellows, which accordingly was done, and an ignominious death was executed upon them. After the execution Herodus of Syracufe came with news out of Phanicia, that a Fleet of three hundred Gallies was prepared by Tiffaphernes, and the King, but upon what defign was not known. The Lacedemonians moved at this, called the Deputies of their Confederates to Sparta to consult about it. Now Lyfander had a great mind to return into Alia. defirous to relieve those his friends, who being by him placed in the Government of the Cities, ten in a place, were for their violence and great mildemeanours, either killed, or driven into banishment. He therefore perswaded Agesilans to undertake fo noble and pious an expedition, and wrote to his friends in Alia, to defire of the State that he might be fent. Being perswaded, he offered his fervice on condition they would grant him thirty Affiffants, by whose directions that thence, after the example of Agamemion, his might pass over into Ma;

Having his Army and Provisions in a readiness, he marched to Aulis

but going about to facrifize a Doe to the Goddefs, with which he thought the

would be better pleafed than the was with Agamelonon for his daughter, he was hindred by the Baottens from doing that which was contrary to their custom, and was conftrained in a great chafe to pass over without the Ceremony, the Omiffion of which he accounted as a bad prefage. When he came to Ephelus, it appeared that he only bore the name, and Enfander had all the credit and authority, all men making application to him, and observing him as a man of whom they had had former experience to exceed all men in earnestness to grais Ectypied by tiffe his friends, and deftroy his Enemies. This much moved Agefilaus, though a man of a most mild spirit (who was famous for bearing with any thing) and troubled also his own Collegues, so that the King resolving to cut off his authority, rejected all the futes he made for any, and plainly shewed that his delign was to cross him in all he attempted. Lyfander hereupon told his friends how the case stood, that they must make no more addresses to himself, and being fensible of the disgrace expostulated with him about it, who let him understand that he could not endure to be overtopped by him; He then defired some employment of him, wherein he might both fave his own credit, and do him fervice, wherein he promifed to be faithful. He then fent him to the Hellespont, where finding Spithridates the Persian to be offended by Pharnabazus, he brought him over to him with a great Treasure, and two hundred Horse, although hereafter it was found that he took very hainously the diminishing of his reputr. Agefilaus in Afia prospered in the War to admiration, gaining great glory

that the Spartans, in confidence of his abilities, and integrity, committed the Fleet also to his command, judging it most convenient for expedition, and that both the Armies might joyn the readilier upon occasion, that they should be in the Hands of one man whom they could trust. But in this one thing he is accounted to have erred, in that not having respect to the publick good, he pasfed by many far more Eminent for prudence and gravity, and pitched upon Pisander, his wives Brother (a man very bold, but meanly practifed in business) for his Admiral. As he was going towards the Fleet, and Agefilaus marching Tiberaful by Gold fent into for Phrygia, Tithraustes (who having cut off the head of Tissaphernes had suc-Gues, cor-cupeth the receded in his place) considering in how great dangers his Masters affairs stood, States to war sent Timocrates a Rhodian with much Persian Gold into Greece, wherewith to coragainst Laceds- rupt the principal men in the Cities, and procure them to make War against the Lacedamonians. This was effected at Thebes and Argos; and the Athenians, though they had no Gold, yet were very ready to imbrace the War, believing that therein they should have the chief Command. Those that were corrupted then grievously inveighing against the Lacedamonians, procured that the chief Cities entred into a Combination against them. The Thebans knowing that they would not begin the War except first provoked, took occasion to do it by the Locrian Opuntians, whom they procured to quarrel with the Phocians, and their other Neighbours, about fome grounds in question amongst them, concluding, that thereupon the Phocians would break into Lorris. They did fo, and did more hurr than they had received; whereupon Audocides, who had received much Gold, procured the Thebans to affift the Locrians. The Thebans then invaded Phocis, which they wasted, and presently did the Phocians send to Lacedemon to defire aid, shewing that they had not been the beginners of the

12. The Lacedemonians not unwillingly imbraced this occasion of falling out xnnoph at fawith the Thebans, to whom they bore many Grudges. They exacted the tenth prapart affigned to Apollo at Deceles, refused to make War against the Pirans, perfwading also the Corinthians, as they judged, to do the fame; they remembred also how they had forbidden Agistaus to facrifize, casting the Sacrifize from off the Altar, and would not follow him into Afra, They resolved now that they had no War in Greece, and that their Affairs were in fo good a condition in A sia, to curb their insolence. Lylander was then dispatched to Phocis, where he should gather the Forces of the Confederates together; and stay for Paufanias the King, who was to bring the Forces of Spania and the rest of the Associates corn. Noon & to Haliartus. He marching into Baotia drew, Orthomenus from the League of fantro. Thebes, and impatient of delay tarried not for Paufanias, who hovered about Fegea, but went with fuch Forces as he had already to Haliateus, which be himmoned, but in vain, the Thebays which already, were in the City hindring the Surrender. Upon refusal he led his men to the Walls, and they of Thebes upon

notice hereof hafted out of their City to holp their Friends, and falling upon Lyfander (whether aware of their coming or not is uncertain.) flew him in the place, and routed his Forces, of which were flain, one thousand men, and of the Thebans three hundred. This was the end of Lyfander, which he partly brought upon himself by his eagerness to make this Expedition, being in his old age fal-His character, len into Melancholly, which rendred him more prevish that usual. Helestra great name behind him, but purchased rather by his good Success than Virtue.

He would neither spare for Cruelty nor Falsehood to compass his designs, taking. no estimate of any thing by any balance but that of Profit. He scoffed at thehe as said, that those who were descended of Hereules (amongst which he was reckon. ed, though not of the Royal Families) ought to manage Wars without sleeer, faying, that where the Lyon's Skin would not ferve, the Foxes mas to be fowed to it. A Design of his was discovered after his Death, whereby he intended to have taken the Regal Power out of the two Families, and have made them common to all in general. To this purpose a Writing was found containing a Speech the intended to offer to the People, which Agefilaus would have published, that it might have been seen what kind of Commonwealths man he was; but was disswaded by Lacratidas chief of the Ephori, who said, that Lysander was not to be digged up again, but rather that Speech to be buried with him. Notwithstanding his Ambition, yet he died poor, which rendred him the more famous, fo that to do Honour to his memory, the Spartans imposed a mulct upon cerCHAP. II. tain Citizens, who being contracted with his Daughters before his death, afterwards when his Poverty appeared, refused to marry them.

13. The Thebans having loft fo many men in the late Fight, thought they had but small cause to Triumph, counting their loss equal with that of the Enemy. The Day after, when they understood that the Phocians and others had retreated, they took more Courage; but again, when they perceived Paulanias to draw near, they efteemed themselves in no small danger. Yet the day following the Athenian joyning themselves to them, and Paulanias not moving forwards, they then had no small confidence in the goodness of their Fortune. Paulanias being doubtful what to do, called a Council of the Confederates to consult, whether he had best by mainForce or by Truce recover the Body of Lyfander, who for that it lay near the Town Walls, and it was very dangerous to fetch it off by ftrong Hand, concluded a Truce was to be defired; and the rather, for that the Corinthians refused to joyn with them, and the Enemy had good store of Horse, which they wanted. The Thebans refused to give up the dead Bodies, except the Lacedamonians would ingage to depart out of Beotia, and therefore to their great grief they were constrained to do it, and in their Retreat the Thebans grown very insolent, killed such as staid behind never so little in the Villages. The Expedi-Profesias fea- tion was unfortunate to the Spartans in general; but especially to Pausanias, who at his return was accused capitally for not meeting Lysander in convenient time, according to agreement, for that he had not by Fight but Truce recovered the flain, and dismissed such Athenians as had been taken in the Pireus; and lastly, had not appeared at his Tryal. Being condemned he fled to Tegea, where afterwards he fell fick and died. 14. The Lacedemonians awakned by their lofs, and now knowing for certain xmooh lib.4.

that Money had been fent out of Asia to the several Cities, which had moved Platate is them to take Arms, they thought themselves in some danger, and recalled the following flaus to defend his Country. He having had success in the War suitable to his xough, in Military Skill and Valour, was now gathering of greater Forces, wherewith he Orat disastine intended to march into the higher Countries against the King himself, but notwithstanding this, and that it troubled him to leave Asia, yet he resolved to obey, acknowledging in his Letter to the Ephori, that then a General truly and justly commands, when he is governed by the Laws and Magistrates, upon which account he faid, he would follow the Letter, if not prevent it (feeing they had fet him a day, and that he commanded not for himself but the City and Confederates) although he had subdued a great Part of Asia, overthrown the Barbaria ans, and had made great preparations for the War in Ionia. He left Enxenus the Harmostes of Asia with a Guard of four thousand Soldiers, but making all Provision for his Country, drew over many out of the Cities to the Service. Having passed the Hellespont into the Cherronesus, he held the same way that Xerxes formerly had done, when in the mean time the Ephori and Aristodemus guardian to Agesipolis the young King, with an Army of fifteen thousand men overthrew that of the Leaguers, confifting of twenty thousand (whereof thirteen thousand bore heavy Armour) making great slaughter, though they lost no more than eight of their number. Care was taken that Ageflaus should have notice of this fuccess (with the Confederates in Asia) who grieved only that Greece should destroy so many of its own Worthies. As he passed through Thrace, he would not ask any of the Barbarians leave to go through their Countries; but only fent to know whether he should pass as a Friend or an Enemy. All friendly received and conducted him, except the Traller, who having formerly fold the paffage to Xerxes, now also demanded of him one hundred Talents, and as many Women. He jeered them, asking why they came not to receive what was demanded? and going forwards made great flaughter of them. The King of Macedonia, when he asked the question of him, faid he would consider of it folet him, faid he; but in the mean time we will proceed in our journey, which boldness so awed the King, that he suffered him to pass quietly.

Upon this report he put

Sect. 4. on a good Countenance, lest he should discourage his men, telling them Pifander the Admiral was flain, but that his Fleet had obtained the Victory. But now in Baotia, when he was come near to Coronea, the Leaguers opposed themfelves against him, being the Baotians, Athenians, Argives, Corinthians, Eubeans, Enianes, and both the Locrians, with whom was fought fuch a Battel as had not hapned in that Age. At the first onset Agestlaus had the better in one Wing, but the Thebans in the other, and being in the Pursute were forced to retire to help their Friends, where he charging upon the Front of the The-bans, and not on the Rear, as he might have done, did great execution and was wounded himself, notwithstanding the Valour of his Guard, consisting of fifty front young-men, lately fent him from Sparta to do him Honour. At length he had the better of it, and dismissed un-hurt eighty of the Enemies, who had taken Sanctuary near hand, after which he went to Delphos, and confecrated the tenth of his Spoils, which amounted to no lefs than one hundred Talents. In the mean time Gylus the Polemarchus brake out into Locris, where the Soldiers being greedy of Plunder, were fallen upon by the Inhabitants, whom though they repelled at first, yet Night coming on they were so intangled, that Gylus himself and very many others were slain, and all of them had been loft, but that the Alarm being taken by the Camp, relief was thence fent to them. After this, the Soldiers were dismissed to their several homes, and Agesilaus went by Ship to Sparta. Yet notwithstanding the War continued, the Athenians, Baotians, Argives and their Confederates, making excursions from Corinth, which they had made the feat of War; and the Lacedemonians with their Allies from

16. The Corinthians confidering that their Grounds were wasted, and many of them flain, because of their being so near to the Enemy, but their Confederates free from these mischiefs, the most and best of them desired Peace, and began to confider of it amongst themselves. This being understood by the Argives, Baotians, Athenians, and especially by such amongst themselves as had received the Persian Gold, and caused the War, they fearing Corinth would return again to the Lacedamonians, to prevent this, they resolved to Massacre all such as were for the Peace. This they performed on a Festival, when most were got together, sparing none that took Sanctuary in religious places, so that most of the elder fort were killed, and the younger fled out of the City. Many of them, by the intreaty of their Friends, and upon the Oath of the Mgistrates, that they should be safe, returned home within a short time; but feeing plainly the City was in the way to Ruine by the tyranny of Stirsat Covinib those that governed, asthat for Covinib it was to be called Argos, the Laws of which City they must be forced to receive; moreover being sensible that they had no more Power at home than meer ftrangers, fome of them refolved it was better, by attempting the freedom of their Country, to die in the Quarrel, if it should fall out, than to live in that slavish Condition. In profecution hereof they let in Praxitas Governour of Sieyon for the Lacedamonians within the long Walls, who having no great Force with him, fortified himfelf as well as he might, which being understood at Argos, they flocked out thence to affist their Friends, and the Lacedemonians opposing themselves they came to a Fight, wherein after much difficulty and various Fortune, the Lacedamonians were Conquerours, making great flaughter of their Enemies. This Victory was the more eminent, for that so small a number had vanquished such multitudes, after which, they put to the Sword a Garrison of Baotians, which held the Haven called Lo-

> 17. Praxitas pursuing his Victory, brake down part of the Walls to make a passage for his men, and then going on in the way towards Megara, took two Towns, wherein he left a Garrison and departed, after which followed only some light bickerings, till at length the Lacedamonians iffuing out of Lochaus. with their Friends belieged Corinth, at which time the Athenians fearing they might pass the long Walls and invade their Territories, came out of the City with Masons and Workmen, and repaired that part which was towards them. The Lacedemonians grudging that the Argives should flourish at home, and prosper abroad, sent Agestlaus with an Army, against them, who laying wast all their Territories, brake through to Corinth, and took the Walls which the Athenians had repaired, his Brother Teleutius Admiral, taking the Ships and Arcenals upon the Gulf. Returning home, he was not long after fent out again, who when he came to Corinth, thought to have furprifed it, but the Citizens aware of it, called in a Garrison of the Athenians, under the command of Iphi- Sect. 4. erates, and thereby prevented him. At this time Ambassadors came to him from feveral parts, and amongst the rest from Baotia, to know what terms of Peace. he would propound; but he carried himself so high, that he would take no notice of them; though Pharax interceded out of an inveterate grudge he bore towards the Thebans. But before their departure there came news that the party he had left in Lechaus was defeated by Iphicrates, at which unufual meffage being much affected he leaped out from his Throne, and in all hafte went to relieve them, but in his way met with three Horse-men, who acquainted him how late his affiftance would be. Hereupon he returned, and the next day fent for the Ambaffadors to hear what they had to fay; but they fomething incouraged at what had hapned, and minding to requite him for his difrespect, made then no mention of peace, but defired leave to go to Corinth. 13. He eafily apprehending them, told them they should the next day see their friends in the Town rejoycing, and the defeat of his men, which was the true cause of their desire to go to Corinth, and accordingly wasting all about the City, went to the Walls, and having in vain provoked the Inhabitants to fight, marched to the Lecheus the place of the defeat, after which he difinisfed the Ambassadors; not fuffering them to go to Corinth, His Army now beholding with their eyes the monument of the late mischance, were forely afflicted, having not at all been accustomed to such a sight, only the Parents, kindred, and relations of the slain, according to the Laconian cultom feemed to rejoyce in the Calamity of their Country. Having re-inforced the Garrison of Lecheus, he returned home his men, shunning the light and sight of all men, out of shame for what had hapned in this expedition contrary to their former fortune. But Iphicrates after his departure, in confidence of his good fuccels proceeded, and reduced fuch places as had been taken by Praxitas and Azefilaus. After these things the Achaans being put to it by the Acarnanians, who endeavoured to wrest from them Calydone, a Town formerly belonging to the Ætolians, fent to Lacedamon, and expostulated with them for not affifting them, who always were ready to follow them into all places. The State upon this complaint fent Agefilaus to aid them, who invading Acarnania, wasted the Country, made prey of most of their Cattel, and being opposed by them, was much put to it on the mountainous and precipitous places, by Darts and Arrows; but coming to hand ftroaks, they were prefently put to flight, and three hundred of them flain. Then confumed he all things with fire and fword, and attempted some Towns by the perswasion of the Acheans; but in vain. Now Autumn growing on, he could not be staid by their intreaties to prevent the Acar-nanians from fowing their Corn, telling them they were not well advised in their request; for his intention being to return the next year, how much more Corn

they should have upon the ground, by so much would they be the more desirous of 10 And according to his promife, the Winter being over, he returned, at the report whereof the Athenians feated in a mid-land Country, and thereupon more obnoxious to damage in their Corn, and in great danger of lofing their Towns, made an agreement with the Acheans, and entred into a fociety of War with the Spartans. This War being over, the Lacedamonians not thinking it fafe to contend with the Athenians and Baotians, whilst the Argives were at their back, they resolved to send their Forces against them. The conduct falling to Agesipolis, the other King, he would not undertake it, till he had confulted both the Oracle of Funiter Olympius, and that of Apollo at Delphos, concerning the lawfulness of of the War, because the Argives defired a Truce, but being satisfied therein, he invaded, and wasted their Territories; yet ere long terrified with divers prodigies, he retreated without any confiderable thing done. In the mean time Pharusbazus and Conon, having overthrown the Lacedamonians in a Sea fight at Cnidus, freed the Greek Cities from the Lacedemonian Governours, which Conon fuggested to the other as the only way to make them his own, and not to attempt to deprive them of liberty, which would force them to combine against him, and thereby give him work enough. He attempted Seftus and Abydus; but Dercyllidas having secured them, he lost his labour, and gave order to Conon to procure a Navy from the Cities upon the Hellespont against the Spring, being much incenfed against the Lacedemonians, and resolving to invade their Dominions. At Spring he did so, and having strengthned the Enemies of Sparta, as much as possible, he furnished Conon with a Fleet, and money to rebuild the long Walls of the Piraus, than which Conon perswaded him he could not do any thing more

20. Lest Conon should again recover the Islands to the Athenian state, they thought good to advertise Teribazus, another of the Persian Satrapaes, hereof. hoping either to draw him to their party, or at least to procure that no more furtherance should be afforded to the design of Conon. To this purpose they fent Antalcidas to him, to lay open these things, and to try what could be done with him about a peace, who according to his infirmations, to gain it the more easily, fully left to his disposal the Greek Cities in Ma, provided those without were but left to their own freedom. Teribazus liked well of this, but the Athenians , Baotians , Corinthians , and Argives , having also dispatched away their Ambaffadors upon report of his employment, refused to affent upon their own private interests. The Athenians seared, if the Islands should be left to their own liberty, left they should lose Lemnus, Imbrus, and Sciras. The Thebans, left they should be compelled to fer at liberty the Cities of Baotia, and the Argives concluded, that then they must lay aside all thoughts of Corinth, which they had conceived great hopes to make their own. Their diffention hindred Teribazus from concluding a peace with the Lacedamonians without the Kings special Warrant; but underhand he supplied them with money to maintain their power at Sea, and committing Conon to custody, went to the King to know his pleafure.

21. The King upon his giving account how affairs flood, fent Struthas to take care of the maritime affairs, who being fensible what damage Agestlaus had done his mafter, was inclinable towards the Athenians, which being understood at Lacedemon, they fent Thimbro into Asia to keep him in action, who at first forely afflicted the places subject to his command, but at length was slain, and his Forces defeated. At this time certain Rhodians being banished by the people who had the power in their own hands, came to Sparta, and complained that the Athenians had brought the Island under their power by that kind of Government. The Spartans understood their interest in so powerful an Island, and sent Ecdicus with eight Gallies to revive, if possible, the Oligarchy which was agreeable to their own model; and in this Fleet they ordered him to convey Diphridas into Asia, who was to gather up the Reliques of Thimbro's Army, and renew the War against Struthas. He ordered his affairs very well, being a man fitter for the purpose than Thimbro was. But Ecdicus fearful of the power of the people did nothing at Rhodes, into his room Telentias was dispatched, and with a a Fleet of twenty feven Gallies did that for which he was fent. The Athenians hearing of these motions fent out Thrasphulus against the Spartans, who despairing of Rhodes went into the Hellespont, where in Thrace he reconciled two Princes, Odryses and Scuthes, and made them friends of the Athenian State. Departing thence, he recovered several Cities, and amongst the rest Byzantium and Chalcis, whence going to the Island Lesbus (all the Towns whereof except Mitylene were joyned to the Lacedemonians) he had good success, taking several places, and wasting the Territories of the other.

22. From Lesbus he failed victoriously unto Rhodes, where he obtained money from the Inhabitants of Alpendus; but his men after the receit thereof dealing injuriously with them, they issued out in great anger, and killed him in his Tent. But whereas no man excelled him in worth, many overtopped him in nobility, and hereupon it fell out, that though in the Peloponnesian War he doing many things of himfelf, Alcibiades did nothing without him, yet the eminency of that man easily swallowed the glory and profit of all atchievements. The Lacedamonians having notice of what he had done, and fearful of what the friendship of Pharnabazus to the Athenians might produce, though they had nothing to fay against Dercyllidas, yet sent Anaxibius out to restore their fortune, who had prevailed with the Ephori for this employment, and promifed great matters

He coming to Abydua skirmished with Pharnabazue, and then getting three ships more, insested the Athenians. But the Athenians being follicitous for keeping what Thrasphalus had recovered, though they had nominated Argyrina to his place, yet now fent Iphicrates with eight Gallies and twelve hundred men, who was lately returned from the Corinthian War. He fetting upon Anaxibim whilft he carelesty went abroad, slew him as he was going to Abydus, and with him twelve more Governours of Towns, and thence betook himself into the Cherronesus.

23. At this time Agina was withdrawn by Eteonicus from the Athenians, who Xenophilis s. thereupon belieged it, but to no effect. At Sea both fides as it were played the Died Pyrats with each other for some time: But Teleutias being made General of the Lagedamonian Fleet, fell in upon the Haven at Athens, where he took some Vessels laden, with the men, and putting the Citizens into a great fright, in his return preyed upon the Coasts, whence he took many Fisher-boats with other booty, the places being not aware of any fuch things. In the mean while Antalcidas the Spartan returned with Teribazus from the Persian King, having concluded a League offensive and defensive with him, in case the Athenians and others would not confent to their proposals for a general peace. He coming to Sea took eight Athenian Gallies which came from Thrace, under the Command of one Thrafybulus, and making up the Fleet to the number of eighty fail, with twenty Syracustan Gallies, and others which he procured of Teribazus, obtained the Soveraignty of the Seas. The Athenians were startled hereat, fearing the iffue of this War might be the same with that of the Peloponnesian, especially the Persian being now Confederate with the Lacedamonians, and the Inhabitants of Ægina infesting their Borders; upon all which accounts they were very defirous of peace. The Lacedamonians also being much straightned in maintaining Garrisons in so many places, both affected to them, and weary of them, began to have enough of War, having moreover much trouble about Corinth. The Argives not ignorant that War was decreed against them, and that their old shifts and pretences would fland them in no flead, were also ready to imbrace peace. They all then fent their Agents to Teribazus to know what was proposed by Artaxerxes Mnemon.

24. Teribazus shewing them the Kings Seals, read the Contents of the writing; which imported, that he thought it just that the Cities in Asia, the Islands Clazomenæ and Cyprus, should be under his Furisdiction: and all the rest, little and great; (bould be left to their own freedom, except Lemnus, Imbrus, and Scirus, which having been time out of mind subject to the Athenians, he thought it fitting they should so continue. And such as would not admit of these conditions, he with the rest of the Confederates would prosecute with War, both at Sea and Land, to the utmost ability. The Agents returning home, all the States imbraced the conditions, except the Thebans, who were unwilling to fet at liberty the Cities of Bacotia; but Agefilaus making preparations to invade them, they were fo far awed thereby as to receive them. He constrained also the Argives to leave Corinth, from which the Authors of the late Maffacre then flying, the Exiles returned home. These things

25. The Lacedamonians were they who had the benefit thereof, being the Protectors and Patrons of it; and grew so high upon the success, that now they refolved to chaftize fuch of the Affociates as had in the late War born greater affection to their adversaries than themselves. First they fell upon the Mantineans as guilty of this Crime, whom by their King Agespolis (for Agesplans, because of the friendship that passed betwixt his father and them, defired to be excused) they forced first to break down their Walls by turning the River upon them, which ran through the City, and then to divide themselves into Villages. After this they forced the Phliatians to receive their Exiles, and made War upon the Olynthians in Thrace, at the request of the Acanthians and Appollonians, who accused them of clandestine practices with the Athenians and Thebans. By these courses they hoped that all the small Towns in Greece, upon occasion, would willingly follow them in their Wars as Authors of their

Sect. 4. liberty; and the great Cities, having lost their Dependents, would be unable to make opposition. And in particular they had conceived an emulation against Olynthus, now grown fo mighty, that not only she commanded her neighbour Towns, but was become terrible to places far remote, and to Sparea her felf. The Olynthians had taken a great part of Macedonia, together with Pella the Metropolis of that Kingdom, and now imitating the old pretence of the Lacedamonians to fet at liberty the places over which Amyntas did Tyrannife, had almost driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. They of Acanthus and Apollonia further adding, that either they must War upon Olynthus, or become subject to it, and fight shortly in its defence, Endamidas was fent before with two thousand men. He arriving in Thrace, fortified the Cities. and recovered Potidea, which had affociated it felf to the Olynthians, and managed his Affairs with fuccefs answerable to such force. favour of the Lacedemonians than was defired of them. 27. Things thus prospering, the Lacedamonians more chearfully pursued the War against Olynthus. They sent General thither Telemias, who with the help by the Spatists of Amyntas the Macedonian, and Derdas Prince of Elimea, overthrew the Olynthians under their Walls, and wasting their Grounds, for that Summer was ended, withdrew to their winter Quarters. But the next Year when he returned, the Olynthians fallied out against him, whom to repel, he fending a party which drave them back beyond a River which ran by the Town, and followed them over, they then thinking they had his men at an advantage, turned back upon them, and flew to the number of one hundred. He being in a great chafe hereat, went into the rescue with all his Forces, and following them within bow-shot from the Walls, his men were fore galled by those that stood on the Turrets, and forced to give back, and then being hotly charged he loft his Life, with many others, so that the rest clearly put to the rout, and shifting for themselves to several places, the strength of this Army was broken, which defeat Xenophon chargeth upon the Passion of Teleutias, shewing how dangerous it is in the Leader of Activatis cent an Army. A of which he died the seventh day, being much lamented by Agesslaus his Colleague, for their long familiarity, though emulated by him. Being put into Honey and brought home, there he was interred with Royal Rites, and Polybiades was sent to command the Army, who belieging the Olynthians, at length forced them by Famine to yield on these terms: To have the same Friends and Enemies with the Lacedamonians, and to follow them as Affociates whitherfoewer they should lead them

28. In the mean time the Phliasians grown consident upon the absence of Agefipolis, began to act very infolently and unjuftly against the Exiles which of late they were made to re-admit. The Exiles complained of them at Licedemon, and they thereupon in their absence put a Mulct upon them, which understanding, they ftill continued and pray'd justice from that State. At length the Ephori resolved upon War, and Agesilans was sent against the Phliasians, who thereupon offering largely to do all things fitting, he refused them, faying, he must have Deeds and not Words, to which now without further confirmation he could give no credit. They asking what he would demand, he required their Caftle to be delivered up to him, which being utterly refused, he besieged the City. They held out longer than he expected, because the Magistrate suffered them not to eat above half of the ordinary proportion, and by means of one Delphion, who with three hundred affiftants, imprisoned such as spake of a Surrender. But at length confumed with Famine, they defired a Truce, to fend Commissioners to Sparta to treat of Peace. Agefilaus stomached that they should pass him by, and therefore fending his Friends to the City, he obtained that the matter should be referred back to him. He ordered that fifty should be chosen of the Exiles, and as many others, who should determine which Citizens should be suffered to live, and which put to death, and that then Power should be given them to make Laws for the Government of the City. Whilft these things should be done he left a Garrison in the Town, and so departed, having spent twenty Moneths in this

29. All things thus falling out to the Spartans according to their wish, they judged their Empire sufficiently established; but another event (as Xenophon X nophout prins. gravely discourse the divine Vengeance) taught the contrary, it being clear, Olymo, 100. both from the Histories of Greeks and Barbarians, that God fulfereth not to cleape as, in unpunished wicked and ungodly Actions. They had favor not long before to leave Plears by unpunished wicked and ungodly Actions. They had favor not long before to leave Plears by the property of the prope the Cities to their own liberty, and yet they kept in their Hands the Citadel at in Polopide. Thebes, and therefore being formerly invincible, were now fufficiently plagued by those alone whom they had injured. There was one Phillidss Secretary to the present Polemarchi of Thebes, who being not at all suspected by his Masters, went to Albens where the Exiles lay, and there entred into a Conspiracy with Mello one of them, for the killing of the Polemarchi, and recovery of their Countries liberty. Mello and fix others being let in by Phillidas, were in womens apparrel brought in to the Polemarchi as Courtezans, whilst they were drinking and celebrating the Feaft of Venus at the end of their Office, whom they flabbed with Daggers hid under their Clothes; after which they did as much to Leontides the chief revolter, as he lay in his Bed, Mello being eafily admitted to him without suspition. Then went they to the common Prison, and killing the Keeper fet at liberty their Friends, when now they called the People together, and exhorted them to fland in defence of their native liberty. They prefently befieged the Castle, wherein the Lacedamonian Governour seeing the alacrity of the affailants, was forced to yield upon this condition, to go out with his Army, and for that was put to death at his return to Sparta. The Thebans then slew such as they could come by, who fided with Leontides, and, too rigorously, extended the same punishment to their Children. 30. He in his paffage flew those whom Phillidas had let out of Prison, to the number of one hundred and fifty, who kept watch upon the Mounrains, but did nothing farther confiderable, only he left Sphodrias Governour of Thespe to raise new Forces, and be a refuge to the discontented party amongst the Thebans, and so returned Yet herewith were the Athenians exceedingly affrighted, infomuch that one they put to death, who had conspired with the Theban Exiles, and condemned another who fled upon its. The Thebans also despaired of

A Merchant was sent to Sphodrias, then lying at Thespa, a rash and ambitious man, to perswade him to fall upon the Piraus or Haven of A thens, as a work very grateful to his superiours, for thereby he should cut off the Athenian power at Sea, and he might be fure the Thebans would not affift them being already too much incenfed. He pricked forwards by these conceits, inby the cunning vaded Attica as far as Eleusine; but there his Design being known, and his Soldiers unwilling to proceed any further, as not sufficiently prepared for such an enterprize, he was forced to return.

31. The Athenians cast into Prison the Spartan Ambassadors as conscious of such Xtaph. an unlawful act; but they utterly renounced the least knowledg of it, and promiling Sphodrias should answer it with his Life, they were content to expect the Justice of the State upon him. The Ephoricalled him to account indeed, and yet though he appeared not, was he acquitted, to the great admiration of all men, efpecially because of the Author of his acquitment, which was Agesilaus. For the Ageillant moved by his son King, though at first he refused several times to hear any thing in his behalf, yet Cleonymus the Son of Sphodrias beloved by Archidamus, made such means to him, that at length being very indulgent to his Children, he excused the matter, and procureth him faying, he held Sphodrias to be an honest man, and that the Commonwealth stood indemnity, whence the in need of fuch Soldiers, he got him acquitted, to his great dishonour. The Athenians hereupon out of indignation joyned themselves to the Thebans, and the joyn with the Baotians and they fent to the Cities under the command of Sparta, to draw them to their party, which they effected with most, they groaning under the Yoak of Lacedemon. They appointed a Common-Councel to be held at Athens, for carrying on the War, made up of one out of every confederate City, by which courie and other ways of felf-denial, the Athenians recovered much Authority, having constituted their Captains, Timotheus the Son of Conon, Chabrias, and Callistratus.

32. The Lacedemonians to counterwork them, took off their feverity from their Dioderus ad Sujects which had not yet revolted, whereby they kept them faft to them, and 30. 101 de. Cleombrotus liked not the cause so well as to ingage in it; and thereupon he was forced to lay afide his excuse of superannuation 7 being above fourty years older than one of ripe age) and submitted to the employment. The Thebans opposing themselves against him with the Athenians and others, took an Hill, where by direction of Chabrias, they received him carelesly, with their Shields let down to their Knees, and their Lances advanced, which Courage of theirs as it feemed made him to retreat, and so having done great damage to their Country, and lost many of his men, he returned, leaving the Horse still to make excursions, under the command of Phabidas. Several Skirmishes then hapned after his departure, in one of which Phabidas himself was slain, with three hundred of his Followers. This made the Thebans take more Courage, and many then revolted to them. The Spartans sent a party to reinforce the Garrison of Thespa, and in the begin-Ageflaus undertaketh anning of Spring prevailed with Ageflaus to undertake another Expedition, which was performed to little purpose. He broke a Vein in his found Thigh, and the Blood caused such an Inflammation, that though opening another at his Ancle gave him some ease, yet at his return he was forced to keep his Bed for a long time, the Blood at the Orifice having ran Night and Day, till at length he fwooned, which stopped the Flux. The Year after Cleombrotus was again fent out; but the Thebans and Abenians disputing the passage with him in his way, after he had lost fourty men he returned. By these Constitutes the Thebans were so exercised, that they became excellent Soldiers, as Antalcidas faid jeeringly to Agesilans at his return, that he was very well rewarded by them, whom without either will or knowledg he had taught to fight.

33. The Confederates being met at Lacedamon, accused themselves of idleness, for that they had not stroven with the Athenians at Sea, and being now confident they could starve them in the City, they rigged a Fleet of seventy Ships for that purpose. And hereby they for some time as it were besieged Athens, so that the Corn-Ships durst not approach, till Chabrias overthrew them in Fight, and brought in plenty of Provisions. The Lacedamonians preparing to fend new Forces into Baotia, the Thebans defired of their Friends at Athens to invade Peloponnesus by Sea, to divert them, which they readily did, under the conduct of Timotheus, the Thebans at the same time taking several Towns upon their Borders. The Spartans fent out one Nicolochus to Sea against Timotheus, who not staying for fix Gallies of Ambracia, which he expected, with fifty five Sail fet upon the Athenian Fleet confifting of fixty, and was worsted. Hereupon Timotheus erected a Trophy, but Nicolochus getting the six Ships of Ambracia, went and offered Battel again, and Timotheus not stirring erected another Trophy as a Conquerour. But Timotheus mending his Ships, made up his Fleet above seventy Vessels, and Xenoph. 116. 6 prevailed at Sea. there the Affociates both of the one fide and the other met; but the Athenians thinking now that the Thebans became too potent by their affiftance, were defirous of a Peace. The Thebans with five hundred men went against Orchomenus, held by a Garrison of the Lacedamonians, which fallying out against them, a hot dispute ensued, wherein, although the Spartans were double the number, vet they were beaten, which thing had not happened in former Ages. This added courage to the Thebans, and their military Glory daily increasing, it now became evident that they strove for the Soveraignty of Greece. With this Year Hermeas of Methymna concluded his History of Sicily, which confisted of ten, or, according to some, of twelve Books.

es having a design to make War upon Egypt, and to use the Gracians therein, sent the record to the toperswade them to agreement. They being weary of War consented to it, all general peace, the Cities being to be let at liberty, and the Garrisons drawn out; only the Thebans refusing to quit the Cities of Baotia were not comprised in the League, being very confident in their good Fortune, and much incouraged by feveral excellent good Soldiers amongst them, the principal of which were Pelopidas, and Epaminondas, who from a poor Philosopher became the most renowned for martial affairs of all Greece. This change produced great Commotions in the feveral Cities, but especially in those of Peloponnesus, which by the Lacedamonians had been fubjected to Oligarchy, and now having the popular Government restored, knew not how to use it moderately, but by unjust Decrees oppressed many worthy men, driving some into Exile, and selling their Goods. Great stirs especially hapned amongst the Corinthians, Megarians, and Phliasians, whilst those that were unjustly banished endeavoured by Force or Policy to restore themselves. Those that were for Democracy were maintained by the Athenians, and the Spartans affifting the Oligarchical faction, the Peace was but for a small time observed by these two States, whilst both favoured such as bare most affection to their form of Government, and so they renewed the War: Such was the fruit of Antimonarchical Government, viz. Nothing but Sedition, Confusion, and disorder.

35. They (a) contested first about the Zacynthians, and afterwards in Corcyra, (a) Xingohoni where the Spartans belieging the City, the Inhabitants almost all familhed, yet Diodoras ad fallied out, and killing Mn sippus their General, with many others, the rest olympations hearing of the coming of Iphicrates the Athenian with a great Fleet, with fuch Plunder as they had got, difgracefully raifed their Siege and departed. At this time the Plateans having a defign to commit themselves to the Protection and Alliance of Athens, the Thebans thereupon demolished the Town, and not long after did the same by These. The ruine of Platee is by (b) Paulanias referred (b) in Easticis. to the next Year when Afteus was Archon, in which also (being the fourth of Companies and the one hundred and first Olympiad) hapned (c) such Earth quakes, and Inunda-ann. tions of the Sea in Peloponnelus, that Helice and Bura, two Towns of the Acha- Strablib. 9. ans, were together with the Inhabitants swallowed up. Sect. 4. Thespa, two Cities which had so well deserved of Greece in the Median War and thereupon would no more joyn with them. They fent Ambassadors to Lacedannon mich about a Peace, who used such Rhetorick to that State, specially Callistratus, that they brought the Sparans; to affent upon these Terms: that the Gitter should be fet at liberty, the Armies disbanded, and whospever would not acquieste in these conditions, it bould be langla for any of the Conferentes, if they pleefed (not being constrained to it) to help the distribed. All others except the Thehans subscribed the League, for they were unwilling as before to quit the Cities of Baotia. Hereupon the Spartans jealous of them, resolved to make War in the behalf of all cleombrotus the Greece, and gave order to Cleombrotus their King (who now lay in Phocis, expecting what they would command him) to invade Baotia. The Lacedamonians having great Forces of their own, besides their Allies, and none being willing to affist

the Thebans, every one gave them for loft, who yet upon Cleombrotus his Summons refused to set free the Cities of Baotia, except the Spartans would restore Messene, and permit the Laconians to enjoy their liberty. In summ, they defired they would no more meddle with what they did in Baotia, than they were concerned in any thing done in Laconia.

37. They created Epaminondas General, of whose rare skill and valour they Diodorus ad had had abundant proof, joyning with him the other Beotarche. He levying twelve 200. 2. thousand men marched away, and possessed himself of the Straights of Coronea, xtmph. Plus which Cleombrotus hearing, marched through Phoeis another way, and came in tard in Plato Bacotis by the Sea's-fide. Advancing to Leuttra, hethere refted himfelf, which Plata. the Baotians understanding, passed over the Mountains, and came near to him, Basticii. but feeing fuch Multitudes overspread the Plain, were not a little discouraged. The Baotarcha then deliberating what to do, were divided in their opinions, three being for fighting, amongst whom was Epaminondas, and as many for depart- ab Exquéing, but whilst they were still in doubt came in the feventh, and through the way Patrony. perswasion of Epaminondas cast the ballance on his side. Plutarch saith, that mice si Ena. Pelopidas first approved of his advice, being Captain of the Sacred Company, which menovious was made up (as is most probable amongst many opinions) of intimate Friends per Syncopen and Lovers, who fighting earneftly for one another when in danger, did great harm Emparation thereby to the Enemy. Whilest Epaminondas was several ways incouraging his one to the Eight, came in Fison the Pheram, the most eminent leading man of Thessaly, with one thousand horse and fifteen hundred foot, in shew to help the Thebans, but with intention to take up the quarrel; and he perswaded both parties to accept of a Truce.

38. Cleombrotus was then departing out of Baotia, when a new Army met him from Sparta, under the Command of Archidamus; for the Lacedemonians feeing the courage and refolution of the Thebans, whereas otherwise they could not do it, resolved to oppress them by their numbers. The General then thinking it difgraceful at all to fear the Theban Valour, marched back to Leuttra without any regard of the Truce, where they found the Baotians ready to receive them. Cleombrotus and Archidamus (both descended from Hercules) lead the Wings of their Battel. Epaminondas gave leave to all that would to depart, which was accepted by the The pians and others, who bore no good will to the Thebans. His prime men he placed in one Wing, and the other by themselves, whom he ordered to give back, as though they fled. Making then an oblique bartalion, he with the stoutest men began the Fight, and whilst the other retired him in the state of the from the Enemy he followed him close, who now brake order to get into it.

The success remained doubtful as long as Cleombrotus lived; but he being slain whilft he most valiantly demeaned himself, a great and bloody contest hapned about his Body, which at length his men recovered, and gave back in order, and by degrees. But Epaminondas still pressing upon them, and doing great execution, at length they fled, having no body to govern them. About A.M. 3634-four thouland of them were flain, and three hundred of the other party. This Objector. 39. The Message of this overthrow came to Sparta the last day of their Gym- xanoph & nick Solemnities, wherewith, though the Ephori were fo affected, as those that faw platato at faw flags? now a conclusion of that Principallity they had almost enjoyed five hundred years, yet fuffered they not the exercises to be broken off; but sending the names of the flain to their relations, finished the Festival. The day after when it was known who were flain, and who escaped, one might see the Parents and Kindred of the dead to meet together in the Forum with cheerful looks and minds, shaking one ano- Secti 4. ther by the hands; but on the other fide the friends of fuch as were living, as in some solemn time of mourning to keep themselves at home, or if they came abroad, to fignifie their fadness in their habit, speech and countenance: and this was especially remarkable amongst the women. But when their affociates had revolted, and Epaminondas was thought to be about to invade Peloponnelus, they The behaviour Lame King; yet reverencing the valour, power, and glory of Agefilaus, they not then called to mind the Oracles, concerning what should happen to them under a of the Spartant only retained him in his feveral places of King and General, but made use of him after the batted as a Physician in this sad distemper. Now whereas by the Laws of Sparta, such as had fled from a battel were not only made incapable of Magistracy, and of marriage with others, who thereupon were noted with ignominy, but were to be ftrucken by every one that met them, walking in a dejected posture, in Fools Coats, with their beards half shaved; there being many and powerful who fled from Leuttra; lest any inconvenience might follow upon their discontent, Agestlans procured that the Law for his time should be filent, and (without repealing) obtain its antient vigour for the time to come. Then to recreate the minds of the Soldiers he lead them out into Arcadia, where industriously abstaining from fight, he took a little Town of the Mantineans, and made excursions in their Territories, to give his Citizens a little hope, and shew that the fortune of Sparta was not altogether desperate.

40. The Ephori made new Levies, lifting those now that were above fixty, the Tegeatans, Mantineans, Corinthians, Phliasians, Achaans, and other Cities sent their numbers, the Conduct of all which was committed to Archidamus, because his father was not yet recovered. The Thebans presently after the victory sent a Messenger Crowned to Athens, to let them know their success, and demanded aid ; but the Athenians being not a little troubled at what had hapned gave him no audience. Then fent they to Fason the Pheraan Prince of Thessaly, who though he was otherwise employed with the Phocians, yet came, and when Archidamus had now invaded Baotia, procured a Truce betwixt them, and thereupon the Spartan Army returned home. This by Xenophon is related as done after the battel at Leutira, and because he maketh no mention of any Truce made by Fafon betwixt them, before the fight, we may suspect a mistake in the time, either of him, or Diodorus, who relateth the story as before. Fajon returning home John Prince and Induction by seven young men, having great deligns in his head, after he of the house had, partly by perfwafion, and partly by awe, caused all The flaty to receive him by the seven was the Lacedemonians having refused to fend them and to receive him by the seven was felves from his power. After his death his two brothers Polydorus and Polyphron. Authors of his death, were made Generals, of whom the former was flain within a while by the later, who turning his Principality into Tyranny, held it but one year, being then flain by his brother Alexander, under pretence of revenging the death of Polydorus, and overthrowing the Tyranny. But he proved ten times more Tyrannical, * burying men alive, covering them in beafts skins, and 6o * * Plantch.id fetting them before the Dogs to be devoured, and killing others with Darts, to Plantch.id make himfelf fport. At length having a plot againft his Wives brothers, he was flain by them by her means, and Tifiphonus the eldeft of all the brothers fucceeded, who continued in the Government when Xenophon wrote his Hiftory.

41. The Athenians confidering that the Lacedemonians fill expected they should xemple. follow them in the Wars as formerly and would compel them thereto if they could, thought it best for saving their credit to revive the peace formerly made with Artaxerxes. They therefore fent fifty men about it, to the Cities, to take an Oath of them to this purpose: That they would observe the Truce established by the King, and confirmed by the Athenians and their Affociates; and if any injury should be offered to any that took the Oath, to affift them with their full power. All the States willingly admitted of it, and received the Oath, except the Eleans, who after the example of the Thebans, pretended that the Marganians, Scilluntians, and Triphyllians ought not to be fet at liberty, because they belonged unto them. All Cities both little and great being by virtue of this peace to be fer at liberty, the Mantineans taking occasion thereat, made a Decree to build their City again, and to fence it with walls, which formerly had been demolished by the Lacedemonians. They were agrieved that this should be done without their consent, and fent Agefilaus to them to ftop their proceedings; but the Magistrates refused to call the people together to give him audience, though a friend upon his fathers account, telling him what was once decreed by the people could not be altered.

Some of the Arcadians fent and promifed them affiftance, and the Eleans helped them with thirty Talents of Silver. At this time the Inhabitans of Tegea fell A Sedition at out amongst themselves, whilst some would have all the Arcadians meet together and choose some one man to be their Prince, but others were for living under their own Laws only, and the maintenance of their liberty. These at the first had the better of it; but by the help of the Mantineans, at length the other Alias Diodorus. prevailed, and killing some, drove the rest of their Enemies to Lacedamon, to the vide. number of eighty.

42. The Lacedamonians thought they were bound by Oath to revenge the cause of the Exiles upon the Mantineans, who by falling on them had broken theirs, and gave order to Agefilaus to invade them. They by the advice of their friends the Arcadians contained themselves within their walls newly built, and suffered him to spoil their Country, which doing with great caution and wariness, yet without any lofs of honour, he returned home. At this time it must be, according to * Pausanias (who placeth it in the same year with the battel at Leuctra) * In Accadicio. that by the persuasion of Epaminondas the Arcadians built them one City to inhabit (destroying there many little Towns) which thence had the name of Me-110. 24.41, 41. galopolis. The fame of Plato being now spread abroad, the Thebans and Arcadians fent to him to defire his help, not only for the instruction of their youth, and to teach Philosophy, but also to prescribe them Laws for their Commonwealth. At first he intended to go, but asking the Ambassadors how their Superiours Paulanias in flood affected to an equal distribution of goods and honours, and hearing they were utterly averse to such a constitution, he thereupon resuled to go to them. At this same time also Epaminondas sent into Sicily, Italy, as far as the Islands Euesperites, and all over where the old Messenians, dwelt, to invite them home into their antient Country, which was restored to them, and called after the old name Meffene. Which restauration hapned two hundred and ninty eight years (reckoned The Migrature from the first of the twenty eighth Olympiad) after the taking of Ira, and their banishment; in the third year of the hundred and second Olympiad, Dyscinetas being Archon. During all this time of their Exile they preserved entirely their antient Rites, and the Dorick dialect unchanged, which in our Age (faith Paulanias) by them, and only by them, is also preserved uncorrupt and 43. The same year hapned such a Sedition and Massacre at Argos, as could Diodorus and never be parallel'd in Greece. That City was then Governed in a Democratical Olymp. 102. way; but the Orators fo stirred up the People against the Nobility, that some and 3. Being hereupon fulpected and examined, some fearing to be Argos, the fruit tortured made away themselves, and one in the midst of his pains accused thirof Antimonar- ty of the most eminent in the City. The common fort giving credit to this accufation, put all those to death unheard, and confiscated their goods, and then many others being accused who were wealthy, they put them all to death, and in this manner made an end of fixteen bundred. The Orators themselves now were afraid, left in this fo general a Maffacre they themselves also might unexpectedly miscarry, and therefore ceased from their calumniations; which being understood by the multitude, as though they now for look them, they put as many of them to death as they could find in the City, the vengeance of God thus

44. The next year, the Lacedamonians sent one thousand of their Citizens, 1dem ad ann 4 and five hundred Argives and Bactian Exiles, under the command of Polytropus Xenophinto Arcadia, who there fortified Orchomenus, but meeting with Lycomedes the Mantinean, General of the Arcadians, he was flain in battel with two hundred men. The Arcadians after this defiring help of the Athenians in vain, procured it of the Baotians, who dispatched into Peloponnesus Epaminonaas and Gelopidas, to whom the other Bæotarcha of their own accord left the command of the Army. When they were come into Arcadia, all the Confederates made up the number of fifty thousand men; but yet the Thebans were very unwilling to invade Laconia. They confidered that the Countrey was well fortified, and that the Lacedemonians terrible every where would fight more desperatley at their own doors. But the other preffing them much to it, and some bringing word how the borders were defolate of defence, and offering to conduct them into it, at length they invaded it in four feveral bodies, and bearing down all opposition, met together at Sallasia, whence they marched for Sparta it self, burning and consuming all things in their passage. Six hundred years had the Dores now inhabited Laconia, and for all this time not an Enemy had dared to appear in it, to that this Sect. unufual fight caused great tumults in the City, the women having never before feen as much as the smoak of War, nor the men able to endure a Siege. Plutanto. & Apellaus contained them within, bestowing them as he found convenient in Apellaus feveral places, for the defence of the City, which had no other walls than the bodies of it's Inhabitants. He was much moved at the arrogance of the Enemy, who challenged him by name, as the cause of these diffentions, to come out and fight; yet so contained himself, as taking great pains for the preservation of his Country, he shewed clearly, that if he had not been, the City could not have

45. The Baotians laboured to provoke the Spartans to fight, bidding them either do it, or confess themselves to be inferior to their Enemies; to which they answered, that when they saw occasion, they would not fear to try a battel with them. They left then the City, and making great waste of all Laconia, returned into Arcadia. The Spartans in the time of this their extremity, had promised liberty to such of their Slaves as would fight for them, and sent to Athens to procure affiftance from that State, which the Ambaffadors procured to be decreed, especially by this motive, that the Lacedemonians had faved that City, at the end of the Peloponnesian War, when the Thebans were earnest for its utter destruction. They made choice of Iphicrates for the General in this Expedition, Iphicrates sent who otherwise a man of excellent conduct, yet is judged by Xenophon to have been far overfeen in the management of this employment. For having loitered at Corinth, and the Thebans being about to return home, he ought to have fortified Cenchrea, where they had the most convenient passage, and when he sent to spie whether they had passed Oneus, he sent both all his own and the Corinthian Horse, whereas is confused by few had been sufficient to spie, and better for a speedy retreat, and hereby he lost no fewer than twenty men, and the Thebans returned without any great molestation. The Lacedamonians having got four thousand Auxiliaries, besides one thousand Slaves newly manumitted, and many men out of the neighbouring Towns, thought themselves then able to try a battel; yet convenient for them first to send to the Thebans about a peace. They offered it might one these terms; that Meffene should be restored by them, and the Laconians left to their liberty. Most encli-

ned to receive these terms, till Archidamus rising up, said, that peace was not to be received upon such unequal conditions by them, who were wont to give and not to receive it; that Meffene was justly destroyed three hundred years be-

cedemonians.

But Epaminondas having to his great honour restored Messene fully (the piedorit ad grounds being divided, and all things done) after eighty five days spent in Divident and olymp. 10:1. this Expedition, returned home, and being in his way molested by Iphicrates, ann. 4pursued him to the walls of Athens. But there was a Law at Thebes, which made it capital for any one to retain the chief command longer than was in that questioned for case provided by the constitutions of the City, new Magistrates being to be chofen the beginning of the new moneth Bacatius. This Epaminondas knowing to have been made for the good of the City, would not keep it to the dammage thereof, but continued his command four moneths longer than his Commission, warranted. After his return, he and his Colleagues were accused, and he permitted them to lay all the blame upon himself. They being hereby freed, no man expected any defence from him, as having nothing to fay for himfelf. He appearing, denied nothing that his adversaries objected, confessed what his Colleagues Platorth in Pifaid to be true, and refused not to undergo what the Law inflicted, only he made lopida & coin one request to them: that this might be written upon his Tomb: Epaminonda's was missods: punished with death by the Thebans, because he constrained them at Leuctra to vanquilb the Lacedamonians, whom, before he was General, none of the Baotians durft once look in the face, and for that in one battel he not only faved the Thebans from ruine, but hill lis. 13. also restored liberty to all Greece; and brought matters to that pass, that the Thebans cap. 42. also reported uporty to an urecue; and windows had enough to do to preserve themselves; fell upon Sparta, and the Lacedamonians had enough to do to preserve themselves; Paulania Bastella Clim Union Girl this Paulania Bastella Clim Union Girl this and left not off till Messene being restored, he besieged their City. The Lacedamonians and Athenians had lately established a League between themfelves on these Terms: That each should command the Army five days in their course, which before was folely left to the Spartans. The Athenians hearing of the coming Examinandas of Epaminondas, fent Chabrias with an Army to stop his passage. He coming to again invadeth Corinth, with the Lacedamonians and other Allies, made up an Army of twenty Phopassis. thousand, and then all joyning together fortified the passage into Peloponnesus, making a Ditch and a Wall cross the Isthmus from Cenchrea to Lachaus. But Epaminondas observing at what place the Guards were weakest, there with some difficulty brake through, harazed the Country, had Sieyon and other places delivered up to him, but coming to Corinth was gallantly repulfed by Chabrias, who fallying out of the City, and getting advantageous ground, not only sustained his charge, but did good execution upon the Affailants. At this time two thousand Gaules and Spaniards were fent by Dionysius Tyrant of Sicilie to the aid of the Lacedamonians, who arriving at Corinth, the Gracians to try their Valour led them out against the Enemy. They behaved themselves very well, did good service against the Baotians, many of whom and their Allies they slew, for which receiving great commendations and rewards befides, they returned in the latter end of Summer into Sicilie.

48. The Thebaus being returned home, the Athenians conceived indignation a - Manyl.

Inhabitants of their Country) and more deserving, to be commanded by the other, and follow them in the War. Being much puffed up with fuch conceits, the Thebans began to be alienated from them, and the Eleans bore them Malice, because they could not obtain of them the Towns which the Lacedemonians had The Arcadians taken from them. Things being at this pass, came Phyliseus of Abydus, sent from Ariobarzanes the Persian Satrapa, with much Money, to perswade the States to Peace. The Thebans yet would not come to any conclusion, alleging that Messene ought to be exempted from the jurisdiction of the Spartans, with which he being offended, not enduring that old pretences should be again revived, he left two thousand men already paid to the aid of the Lacedamonians, and returned into Asia. The Arcadians having chosen Lycomedes their General, sent him into Laconia with an Army, where he took by ftorm Pallene, and therein put to the Sword three hundred of the Lacedamonian Garrison Soldiers. To return the like unto them the year following (the first of the one hundred and third Olympiad, wherein Pythrostratus the Athenian was Victor) Archidamus was fent into Arcadia with the Confederates, and a new fupply of men fent from Dionysius. He took Carya, and put all therein to the Sword, and going on in his attempts, Ciffidas the General of the Sicilian Forces, pretending he had staid his full time fet him by Dionysius, would needs be gone; but in his way was circumvented by the Messenians, and was forced to crave aid of Archidamus.

49. He hastned to relieve him, and in his march the Arcadians and Argives opposed themselves, whom charging with great resolution, he got a most famous Victory, killing ten thousand of his Enemies without the loss of one man; fo that as the Priests of Dodona had sung (that it should be a Fight without Tears to the Lacedamonians) yet the Message being come to Sparta, Agesilaus, the Senators, and the Ephori, are all said to have wept for joy. As this success revived the Spirits of the Spartans, which had been almost extinct by the Battel at Leutra, fo, as Diodorus telleth us, the Arcadians now fearing their in-roads, for their better fecurity built them one great City, twenty of the Menalian and Parrhasian Villages being taken in for the fite thereof, though Pausanias will have Megalopolis built two years before. The Thebans and Eleans only rejoyced in the misfortune of their Friends the Arcadians, as tending to the humbling of them. The Thebans casting much in their Heads how to obtain the principallity of all Greece, resolved upon sending an Ambassage to the Persian King to contract a straight League and Alliance with him, and assembling the Confederates they pretended a necessity thereof, because Euthycles the Laceby the Tobass demonian was now with the King in behalf of that State. They fent Pelov the Pelos bids: with others for the Acadism Blass and Assistant They fent Pelov pidas, with others for the Arcadians, Eleans, and Argives: The Athenians alfo understanding hereof sent Timagoras and Leon. Pelopidas being very famous even in Asia for his Valour, by his demeanour got all the favour from the rest. He urged the King with the merits of the Thebans, who had never of all Greece born Arms against him, or his Ancestors, either of old in the Median War, or of late in affiftance to Agefilaus, and he extolled their Valour, shewing that the reason why the Arcadians were of late overthrown by the Lacedamonians,

This employment got Pelopidas abundance of Credit (who not long af-Alexander the Tyrant) but Timagoras returning home received a great prefent from the Persian, and being accused by his Collegue of siding with Pelopidas was put to death. The Thebans, though they had got what they defired of the King, yet their delign came to nothing, for the commissioners of the Cities first refused to take the Oath of this new League, and then most of the Cit ties themselves after the example of Corinth, the answer of which was, that there was no need of this new Engagement. This Plot then of Pelopidas have ving not taken good effect, Epaminondas thought of an other to reduce the Are Accept, at fa cadians and Allies to Obedience; and that was, first by subduing the Acheans; madiedores all to which purpose he went again into Peloponnessis. He easily effected this, and ann. 20 receiving an ingagement from them to continue faithful to the Thebans, returned, for which being much blamed by the Artidians, and the rost of that saction, Governours were fent from Thebes into the feveral Cities, who bringing in the popular Government, thereupon drove away many of the principal men, who uniting themselves, seized again upon their several Cities, and then stood no more Neuters, but openly declared for the Lacedemonians. So this fecond device of the Thebans came to nothing; and the Arcadians were preffed both by the Lacedamonians and Acheans. At this time Euphron the Sicyonian, a man of great power in his Countrey," perfivaded the People to bring in the popular Government, which done, and he with others being chosen Pracors, he murdered some of his Collegues, expelled the rest, and openly established a Tyran-ny. The Affociates he put off by doing them pleafures, through which the Argives being incouraged, together with him fell upon the Phliafians, and brought them to great straights, because of their faithfulness to the Lacedemonians, wherein they excelled beyond Precedent, no adverfity nor any advantage being able to affright or allure them from it, as is largely diffcourfed by Xenophon. The Athenians fent Chares with relief to them, who overcame the Argives in two Fights and restrained their violent attempts against them.

51. But & Breas the Symphalian, General of the Arcadians, judging things not sirs about Si to be at Sicyon as they should, seized upon the Castle there, and forced Euphron to leave the Town, and give up the Haven to the Lacedamonians. Yet a Sedition following in the Town he took occasion thereat, and repostessed himself, joyning with the people against the Nobility, but the Castle being held by a Garrifon of Thebans, he thought there was no long continuing without their leave, and fo taking money with him, went to Thebes, to procure the good will of the people there. Thither several of his adversaries followed him, to withstand his delign, and finding that he wan upon the Magistrates and Senate, to hinder the progress of the builness, killed him in the Castle, at such time as the Senate was sitting there. One of them taking all the fault upon himself, made such a discourse in his own defence, by telling what the Thebans themselves had lately done in the like case, and by other arguments, that Euphron was pronounced justly slain, and he was absolved. Yet being carried to Sieyon he was honorably buried in the Forum, and worshiped by the people as one of their greatest Benefactors. The Phliasians now had by the affiltance of Chares taken Thymia, which was fortified against them by the Sicyonians, but their Exiles had seized upon Oropus; the Sicyonians and Arcadians recovered the Haven at Sicyon, and no body affifted the Athenians at Oropus, but all forfook them, fo that it was committed to the trust of the Thebans till the controversie about it should be decided. 52. The Athenians as foon as this was done, cast in their Heads how they might make Corinth their own, through the perswasion of Demetion; which being known there, their Soldiers were dismissed, and the Alliance broken betwixt them.

Sect. 4. This made the Corinthians, who now had gotten fo new and potent Enemies, look about them for their own fecurity; and to this end levying all the force they could, they made also their peace with Thebes, in which they would have the Liacedamonians concluded, faying, they were constrained to this accommodation; but the Lacedamonians giving them, and all other their Confederates leave to provide for themselves (which was accepted by the Phliasians and others) said they would perfift in the War, and commit the Issue to God, being resolved never to consent that Messen, which they had received from their Ancestors, should be taken from them. The condition of this Peace was only that each City should enjoy its own; for the Corinthians flatly refused to enter into a society of Arms, because they would not offend those that had well deserved of them, but presently a contention was revived betwixt the Phliasians and Argives about Thymia, which was feized on, and held by the later, notwithstanding all that could be objected. At the same time were twelve ships, under the Command of Timocrates, sent to the aid of the Lacedamonians by Dionysius the younger (who now had succeeded his dead father) which they used in the storming of Sellasia, and then the Fleet returned back into Sicily. At this time Artaxerxes fent once more to mediate about a peace, which was submitted to by the Cities, and so the Laconian, or (as it

53. But in the very next year fuch sparks were kindled, (first betwixt the E- xamphon, Disleans and Arcadians) as brake out at length into a mighty flame. Laston a Castle derm ad Olympi of Triphylia first belonged to the Eleans, but being in the possession now of them, and another while of the Arcadians, continual controversies were moved about it. The latter now having it in their hands, the Eleans, by means of the Arcadian Exiles with them, feized upon it. This being taken in great disdain by the Arcadians, they procured help from Athens, and recovered it by force; after which they overthrew the Eleans, and wasted their Territories to the City Gates. This put them upon craving aid of the Lasedamonians, and defiring them to invade Arcadia, who accordingly fent Archidamus the year after the first action at Lafion. He took Cromnus, and therin leaving a Garrison returned; but after his departure the Arcadians recovering the place, and going into Elis, gave the management of the folemnities of the one hundred and fourth Olympiad now drawing on, to the Pileans, who by old and fabulous arguments pretended it once to have belonged unto them. For this purpose they seized on Olympia before-hand, and The Pilesss belonged unto them. For this purpole they teized on Olympia before-hand, and put in polleting on when the time was come in the management of the exercises, the Eleon or warmer are fall'n upon ans with all their strength fell in upon them, and with incredible boldness so laid by the Elians about them, that they put the Arcadians to flight, and though they could not keep the place, yet with great honour retreated to their City, having never before been at all accounted of for valour. This Olympiad, because the Piscans managed it by force, was not registred in the Annals of the Eleans, neither is it certain who overcame in the course, Phocides the Athenian being named by Diodorus, but Eubotus the Cyrenwan by Paulanias, in the second of his Eliacks.

54. At this time Epaminondas labouring all manner of ways to get the Soveraignty of Greece for his Country-men; perfwaded them as a means hereto first to obtain the Dominion of the Seas. He shewed it was an easie thing for those who were ftrongest at land, to obtain, by instancing in the Lacedamonians, who though the minimum to look after Seal in the War with Xerxes they furnished out but ten ships for two hundred of the Athenians, yet for their power on land were obeyed by them. By this, and other arguments, he got them to ordain that one hundred Gallies should be provided, and that the Rhodians, Chians, and Byzantians should be invited to joyn with them in these preparations. He himself going with a little Force to these Cities, induced them to fide with the Thebans, and to terrified Laches the Athenian, who indeavoured to cross his design, that though he commanded a strong Fleet, yet did he quit these parts. During his absence, some of the Theban Exiles having a great defire to change the Government into an Aristocracy, drew into their plot three hundred horf-men of the Orchomenians, who when they were about to execute their design, it was revealed by some principal contrivers to the Baotarcha. The Thebans had conceived a grudge against the Orchomenians of a very long date, ever fince that. City having paid Tribute to them formerly, was exempted from The Torbans it by Hercules. Having now then an opportunity to vent their malice, they first put to death the three hundred horf men, then taking the Town, they put to the fword all the men, fold the Woman and Children, and so utterly destroyed Orchomenus. This cruelty was utterly detested by Epaminondas, who said, if he had

This was decreed by the Council, which the great ones feeing, and apprehending in what danger they were, fent to the Thebans to tell them, that except they would come in time Arcadia would wholly revolt to the Lacedamonians. The most sober men amongst the Arcadians hereupon perswaded the Council to send to the Thebans, to protest against the coming down of their Army un-sent for; and by restoring to the Eleans the Temple, to make peace with them. All took the oath of the League, and amongst the rest the Governour of Tegea, who lay in Garrison with three hundred Thebans; but the great ones who feared to be called to account for the money, prevailed with him to lay hold upon the Mantineans and other Arcadians, who at Teges were making merry for the peace. But the Mantineans making demand of their Citizens, promiting if they had done amifs they should appear before the Council, the Theban General was at a frand, knowing not what to do, and at length dismissed the prisoners, purging himself by saying, he heard the Lacedamonians were about to invade Arcadia, and that some of the Arcadians had defigned to betray Teges into their hands. 56. Though they believed him not, as knowing the contrary, yet they difmif- riden & Paulo fed him, but sent to Thebes to accuse him as worthy of death, for attempting a alter Polybian matter so contrary to the good understanding betwirt the States. But Epaminondas excused him, laying the blame upon the Arcadians, who having drawn the Thebans into the War, would offer to make peace without their consent, and thereby were guilty of Treachery: and he plainly declared, that the Thebans would march into Arcadia, and there affift their Friends. The Mantineans and others understanding this, sent to Athens and Sparts to desire aid, laying open the design of the Thebans plainly to be this: To meaken Peloponnesus, and bring it all into subjection to themselves. They jealous of this, entred into a League with them, wherein it was provided, that each State should have the command over the Army in their own dominions. Whilft this, was a doing, Epaminondas marched from Thebes, leading with him, besides the Baotians, some Thessalian Horse, and Soldiers out of Eubers. When he came to Nemes there he staied a little. having a great defire to meet with the Athenians; but understanding that they passed by Sea into Peloponnesus, he arose and moved towards Teges. Having notice in his way that Azefilaus with the whole power of Lacedamon was come into Arcadia, and that the City must needs thereupon be desolate, he marched in all hafte thither, and had become absolute Master of it, but that by meer divine Pro vidence (as Xenophon himfelf acknowledgeth) a certain Gracian gave notice of his intention to Agestlans, who sent word in all haste to Sparta, willing them

Archidamus his fon being there left, fet the old men and boys upon the Houles to annoy the Thebans with stones, and disposed so of those that were sit to fight, in the several places of the City, that though Epaminondas had continued his march all night, yet found he that his delign was betrayed, and fuch was the opposition he found, that although he chose the steepest descent into the Town, to have the upper ground, yet was he repelled, the Lacedamonians losing Sens upon 1 own, to have the upper ground, yet was he repetied, the Lacedamonian soling sparts and re- the most in their too long pursuites. At this time it hapned well for the Mantineans, that fix thousand Athenians under the com-His Horse put mand of Hagelochus were come through the Ishmus into the City, who upon their defire, notwithstanding they should have to do with such Horse as exceeded

In the engagement they had the better of it, and thereby preserved all that the Mantineans had without their walls. Epaminondas after this thinking with himself that he must be gone within a few days, the term of return or stay. his commission being almost expired, was full of various thoughts. If he should leave those, for the aid of whom he was sent, to be besieged by the Enemy, he saw he should lose the honour he formerly had obtained, especially seeing he had been repulled at Sparta by so small a number, and now also had miscarried at Mantinea: and he confidered that by this Expedition of which himself was author, he had given occasion to the Lacedamonians, Arcadians, Achaans, Eleans, and Athenians, to enter into a straight League of offence and defence. From these reasons he concluded he could not in honour depart without a battel, in which if he overcame, he should make amends for all, and if he should die, such a death could not but be glorious, which should be undergone in an endeavour to make his Country Mistress of Peloponnesus.

58. Ere long the Armies of the Lacedemonians and Mantineans appeared, confisting, with their allies, of twenty thousand Foot, and about two thousand Horse. To the Baotians were affiftants the Tegeatans, and fuch other Arcadians as were most powerful and wealthy, the Argives, Eubæans, the Thessalian Horse which the Thebans brought, the Messenians, Sicyonians, and other Peloponnesians; the number of all which amounted to thirty thousand Foot, and little fewer than three thousand Horse. This is much admired by Xenophon, that Epaminondas should so discipline his Soldiers, that neither night nor day they should shun any labour, refuse to undergo any danger, to be contented with any kind of provision, and very ready to obey all orders. When he had ranged his men in order of battel, he led them not straight on against the Enemy, but fetching a compass towards the Mountains of Tegea, and made as though he would there pitch his Tents. This rendred the Enemy secure, which he well understanding, formed his Battalia like a wedge, thereby to break them fooner, and led with speed against them, who now were all to feek, and in a confusion, some hasting to bridle their Horses, others to buckle on their harness, and all in a condition rather to suffer than act any thing. And left the Athenians should relieve their Companions from the left wing, he placed a Party of Horse and Foot in the hills to keep them in awe, by being continually ready to fall upon their reer.

59. His expectation was not croffed, for on what part he fell he earried all before him, the Enemy not daring to stand; but rushing more violently amongst them, the Lacedamonians taking notice of him, flocked to him, and laid at him amain with Darts, some of which declining, and fencing himself from others, those that stuck in his body he took thence and retorted. Whilst he heroickly thus contended for the Victory, he received a wound from one Anticiates a Spartan, who gave him so mortal a stroak with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the iron and a piece of the tronchion in his breaft. By the of it brake, leaving the from and a piece of the troncing in his breat. Which fo falling out, another thing hapned than men generally had expected. ever Greece brought forth, and hardly to be parallel'd in any other Country, all the Virtues which in others were but fingular having concentred and united themselves in him. In strength both of body and mind; in Eloquence, Justice, Temperance, Wildom, Magnanimity, and Sincerity, he excelled all men, and so far in Military skill, the art of a General, and in valour, that he could not adequately be called a Valiant, Politick, Wary, Bountiful, Industrious, or Prudent Captain; all these Titles and many more being due unto him. His modelty was incredible, shewing it felf especially in this, that after the Victory of Leuctra, and many other rare atchievements, he refused not to go in the Expedition into Theffaly, in quality of a private Soldier. He was grave, yet affable and courteous, as a means to all those virtues, having great infight into all parts of Philosophy and Learning, being therein instructed by Lycis the Tarentine, a Pythagorean. But * enough will be faid in his commendation, if this be added, that the City Thebes before the birth and after the tavita Pomini, death of Epaminondas was ever subject to the command of others; but as long as he had to do in the management of the affairs thereof, was the head of all Greece; from which may be gathered, that this man was of more confequence than the whole City.

61. For with Epaminondas all the strength of the Theban Commonwealth Justin. was extinct, as if he had not only died, but all the rest of the Citizens with him, who as before him they did nothing memorable, fo now after were famous for nothing but their overthrows and disafters. After this battel of Mantinea, Diodoras, all the Grecians being tired out with War, entred into a League offenfive and defensive together, out of which Agestlaus would have excluded the Mesfenians. But Artaxerxes stood for them, as having Territories as large and fruitful as the Laconians, whereupon the Lacedemonians burning with an implacable grudge against them, would not subscribe, and alone by themselves refused to be comprehended in the League, hoping still to recover Messenia. This reflected fomething upon Agefilans, who out of an infatiable corn. Neps. thirst after War, had by his utmost endeavour hindred the union of Greece, Plutareb in Agistic. and the burying of publick quarrels. And he seemed to increase the infamy, by undertaking an Expedition shortly after into Egypt, though it was by his fervice in his decrepit old age, to get fome money for the supply of the now very poor and exhaufted State. For it appeared a thing unfeemly, for the best Agifilans bla-med. man in Greece, and one who had filled the world with his fame, to go ferve a mean man, and a Traytor, and venture his life, credit and all, for a little gain, when because of his old age, he had refused the Office of General at home, and in his own Country, though for the liberty of Greece. But he thought nothing too much wherein he might ferve the Commonwealth, and in this respect undervalued his own honour, and having served in Egypt in a condition far unworthy of him, after he had received two hundred and thirty talents of Silver as a reward from Neitanebus, died in his return, when he had lived eightty four and reigned fourty one years. A most excellent Captain, in whom Nature inwardly made amends for that wherein outwardly she had been deficient, most ambitious of glory, and yet of exceeding great humility, which he shewed in his house,

Affairs of the Gracians Contemporary with

62. Artaxerxes King of Persia, and Agesilans of Sparta, died both in the same Diodorus ad year, and the next after the death of Epaminondas. And the same year the Peace Olympilos. of Greece was again broken by some Arcadians, who having been translated out as. 3. of the neighbouring places into Megalopolis, took occasion at some words of the League (which gave leave to all to return home) to quit the City and return to their old Habitations. The other Megalopolitans endeavoured to reduce them by force, and thence infued a great controversie, they calling in to their help the Mantineans and the rest also of the Arcadians and Eleans. The Megalopolitans that fent to the Athenians for aid, who fent them three thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse, under the command of Panmenes. He with this Force took some of the Towns, and terrified others into composition, and so reduced them all to Megalopolis. The Year following Alexander the Pharean Tyrant subdued several of the Cyclades and took thence abundance of Captives. The Athenian Garrison commanded by Leosthenes opposed him in Peparethus, whereupon he attacqued the Athenian Gallies, and took them, together with one belonging to Peparethus, and fix hundred Prisoners. The Athenians enraged hereat, condemned Leosthenes, and sent Chares with a Fleet into those parts, who spending his time in scaring the Enemies, but oppressing the Confederates, thereby contracted an ill name. For going to Coreyra he there caused such a Sedition, as could not be ended but in the ruine of many, and committed other things which much tended to the difgrace of those that sent him. With this Year Diodorus concludeth his fifteenth Book, having, according to his promife, related fuch things as hapned before the Reign of Philip King of Macedonia, and fuch, as together with other affairs of the Greeks related by others, shew that peace, security, and order, were things little akin to Antimonarchical Government.

63. Of Learned Men Contemporary with this Period, in the first place is to be remembred Hippocrates native of the Island Cous, Prince of all Physicians. He was the Son of Heraclidas and Phenarete, the twentieth in descent from Hercules, and the ninteenth from Æ [culapius. Some have written that he was born in the Soranas. first Year of the eightieth Olympiad. But a certain passage mentioned in his life of his curing Perdiccas of an Eratick Feaver, argueth him at this time to have been famous. This Perdiccas King of Macedonia (who having reigned twenty eight Years according to Euschius, or according to others fifty three, died about the third of the ninty third Olympiad) fell in love with Phila his Father Alexander's Concubine, but Modesty forced him to conceal his Grief, till he fell into a Confumption and languished. Hippocrates by the motion of his Eyes found out the cause of the Distemper, and told Phyla it was in her power to save the King's life, whereupon the was willing though with the impairment of her own credit to redeem it. The like Story is told of Erafifratus the Phylician, who difcovered that Antiochus the Son of Selencus was in love with his Fathers Concu-bine, which Galen* mentioneth, adding that he had made the same discovery in a certain Woman.

64. Hippocrates grew fo famous in his Art, that Artaxerxes Longimanus hear-Lib. mel ing of him, fent for him, with large offers to come and cure his Army, then feized 78 mech on by the Plague. But he said it was not fit for him to touch any Persian Gold, or vastely. cure the Barbarians who were Enemies to the Greeks. The Letters of entercourse betwixt the Persians and him, are amongst others yet extant. Having lived as some faid eighty five Years, but as others ninty, or one hundred and four, or one hundred and nine, he died amongst the Lariffeans, in the first of the ninty fourth Olympiad. He left two Sons, Theffalus and Draco; but the Fruit of his Brain hath been far more effectual for the propagating of his name to all posterity, wherein he hath not only been a benefactor to the mystery of Medicine by his writings, but also by his religious care of the Integrity of those who should profess it. For he framed an Oath to be taken by all that entred into his School, which for his honour, and the shame of those who have more reason to be convinced of their Duty, together with the information of the ignorant, it is convenient to exemplifie. 65. I swear by Apollo the Physician, and Afculapius, and Hygia; and call all the Gods and Goddesses to witness, that to the atmost of my strength and judgment I shall observe what new I swear and covenant by writing. Nomely that I will esteem as my Parents my Master who taught me this Art, and thankfully communicate to, and supply him wich all things necessary both for sustenance and convenience, as also what I have heard, and the whole discipline to mine own Children, to his who taught me, and my Scholars who have given their Names and Faith in this Oath, and none else what soever. That I shall also to my utmost Power and Fudgment prescribe an wholesom course to the Sick, and defend them from all harm and Injury. Neither through the procurement of any will I give, or cause to be given, any deadly Medicament. Neither in like manner will I procure any Woman to miscarry of her burthen; but preserve my Life and Age alwaies chast and pure from all Wickedness. Neither will I cut any of the Stone, but leave this Work to be done by those Chirurgions who are skilful in it. If I come into any House I will do it for the Health of the Sick, shuning all suspicion of injury, or Corruption, especially as to the silthiness of Venery both towards Women and Men, free Persons and Slaves. Whatsoever things I shall see or hear, either in administring Physick or otherwise in common entercourse, which I think ought not to be told abroad, I will conceal them. Now if I (ball religiously observe this Oath, and in no case break it, let me live in great esteem alwaies an happy Life amongst all Men, and reap ample Fruit from mine Art. But if I break it and for swear myself, may the contrary happen to me. Much skill in Physick therefore corrupteth not the conversation; for though a little Philosophy may occasion Atheism, yet a great deal is an Antidote against it, not suffering a man to rest in second causes; but discovering a necessity of looking higher. But more concerning this, as also to the praise of this excellent person, may be said in a particular account of the original, cause, professors, succession, progress and matter of the art of Medicine.

66. Besides Hippocrates, there lived at this time (a) Democritus of Abdera the (a) Anniymus. Philosopher, who died in the same Year, and was well known to him, having alwaies laughed at the folly of men. Four Years after, (b) Socrates the Athenian, the Father of Ethicks, was made drink Poyson for speaking against plurality (b) Diodorus, of Gods and the Superfittion of his Country-men; Anytus having first procured

Aristophanes the Poet, and then Melitus to accuse him. But afterwards the Athenians repenting of what they had done, in way of mourning forbad all publick

(c) Plato at this time being twenty eight years (c) tantistic old, and having heard Socrates eight Years, went to Megara to learn the Mathematicks of Euclide, who now also flourished. Acedonia having been formerly called Emathonia from Emathon a certain King, and afterwards Macedonia from Macedon the Son of Osris, or as others fay of fupiter and Athra, was bounded on the North and Northwest by the Thracians and Illyrians, on the South and Southwest by Thessaly and Epirus, and on the East with the Legean

But Caranus an Argive, the fixteenth in descent from Hercules, some five years after the fall of Sardanapalus, by the command of an Oracle led a Colony into these parts, and having setled himself by force reigned twenty eight years. Canus succeeded him and reigned twelve, then Tyrimas twenty eight, Perdiccas a Prince much renowned fifty one, after him Argens twenty eight, Philip the first as many, Euripus twenty fix, in whose infancy the Illyrians invading his Kingdom, his subjects carried him in his Cradle into the field, thinking he being present could not but be victorious, or that his people durst not forsake him, who was unable to defend himself. Alcetas after him reigned twenty nine years, Amyntas the first fifty years, to whom Darius Hyltalbis sent for earth and water as tokens of subjection. Alexander his fon who flew the Ambaffadors fent to his father, reigned fourty three years, and by marrying his fifter Gygea to Bubares the Persian, grew into such grace with Xerxes, that he obtained all the Region between Olympus and Hermus to be united to his Kingdom, and yet during the Warheld fecret intelligence with the Gracians, discovering to them all his intents and purposes. He left three Sons, Perdiceas, Alcetas, and Philip, the eldest of which succeeded him, whose story is fometimes by pieces related by Thucydides. Perdiccas left behind him Perdiccas and Archelaus his base son. Perdiccas was drowned in a Well by Archelaus his Guardian at feven years of age, the murtherer to excuse himself alledging to his mother that he fell in by chance as he hastily followed a Goose that but Fustin saith he perished by the wicked practices of his mother, as Alexander First Guardian did. Perdicess left behind him a young fon, of whom Philip his brother was constituted Guardian in the second year of Ochus King of Persia, in the first year of the one hundred and fifth Olympiad, Callimedes being Archon. Plutarch maketh Philip to have been carried as an Hostage to Thebes by Pelopidas. Diodorus writeth that his father gave him as an Hostage to the Illyrians, and that they committed him to the Thebans to be kept, who delivered him to the custody of Polymnis the father of Epaminondas, with whom he was brought up, though Plutarch faith he lived with Pammenes, and thence become an emulator of Epaminondas. Fustin faith he was twice given as an Hostage by his brother; once to the Illyrians, and another time to the Thebans, which mightily conduced to his education; for being three years at Thebes, he laid the foundation thereof in a City full of antient leverity, and in the house of Epaminondas a great Scholar and General. If he there continued but three years, he feemeth to have returned home at the beginning of the reign of his brother Perdiccas, but Diodorus faith, it was after his death that he made an escape from Thebes. At first, as it seemeth from Fullin, he bore but the Office of a Tutor, or Guardian to his Nephew; but afterwards great Wars hapning, in which the expectation of the Child could nothing avail, he was constrained to take upon him the Dignity of King by the courteous deportment, bare up the Spirits of his People. He amended military Discipline, and instituted the Macedonian Phalange. Understanding the Athetis Conquer- nians to have a great defire to recover Amphipolis, and to have Argans established King, helefethat City to its own Liberty. The Paonians and the King of Thrace he bought off with money, and overthrew Argaus at Methone affifted by Mantias the Athenian, by which Victory he mightily incouraged his men.

7. The year after he made Peace with the Athenians, who readily accepted of Diodorus ad it, because he was content to quit Amphipolis, giving him great commendations Of pape 105, also for his elemency, in that he had suffered the Remainders of their Army at Me-448, 2. thone to depart with their Lives and Liberty into Attica when he had them at his mercy. Being thus freed from the Athenian War, hearing that Agu King of the Paonians was dead, he invaded, and brought them into Subjection to himself. Then entred he the Country of the Illyrians with about ten thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse, whose King Bardylis sent to treat with him, offering that each should retain fuch places as they already held; but he returned answer, that though he was also desirous of Peace, yet would he admit of no terms, except the Illyrians would quit all the Cities which belonged to his Kingdom. Bardylis then met him with a strong Army, and a great and bloody Battel was with great animosity on both fides fought, wherein at length Philip had the Victory, and the Illyrians having lost above seven thousand men, were forced to relinquish all places belonging to Macedonia.

8. After he had brought under all the Illyrians as far as the Lake Lychnitis, and Iden ad ann 2. made an honourable Peace with them, he returned into Macedonia with great Fame. The year after, for that the Inhabitants of Amphipolis had feveral ways provoked him, and ministred occasion of Quarrels, he went against them with a great Force, and having cast down the Wall with his battering Rams, entred the City, whence banishing all his Enemies he granted indemnity to the rest. This place being very conveniently fited for his occasions in Thrace, much conduced to the progress of his affairs. For hereupon he presently took Pydna, and to ingratiate himself with the Olynthians (the friendship of whom was very necesfary for fuch as would grow great) having taken Potidea, he gave up Pydna with the Grounds belonging to it into their hands. Then going to Crenida, he inlarged this Town with an accession of new Inhabitants, and called it after himself Philippi. Here were rich Mines of Gold, which having been formerly neglected he now fo far advanced as to bring him in yearly a Revenue of one thousand Talents, which mightily tended to the advancement of his Affairs, and the Majesty of his Kingdom, for now ftamped he that piece of Golden Coyn, called the Philipick, raifed great Forces, and afterwards with Bribes drew many Gracians to betray their Countrey. But he proceeded in his Affairs with more confidence and freedom, for that now the Athenians were busied in the Social War begun this year, and thereupon could not take fuch care as was necessary, for the preservation of Amphipolis. 9. The Social War, which continued three years, had its original from the revolt of the Chians, Rhodians, Coans, and Byzantians, from the State of Athens. The Athenians fent against them two Generals, Chares and Chabrias, who when they came to Chius, found there Succors sent from other Cities, and from Maufolus the Prince of Caria. They fell upon the City; Chares by Land, and Chabrias by Sea, but the later whilit too boldly he ventured by himself into the Haven, was flain, and then the rest retreated without any thing done. One * in *cms. Mess. his Life telleth us, that in this Expedition he was a private man, but excelling the Commanders in Military Skill and Fame, was more regarded by the Soldiers; which thing proved his destruction. For endeavouring first of all to enter the Haven, when he had broken in none followed him, so that being compassed with Enemies his Gally was funk, out of which casting himself, he might easily, as the rest did, have swom to his Friends and escaped; but preferring an honourable death before an ignominious Life, fighting alone was flain, in all Fights having been daring, though otherwise he was accounted flow and heavy.

10. The year following, for any thing we understand, was spent altogether, or Diolana at for the most part, in preparations on both sides to decide the controversie in a Sea Of 1919, 106. fight. The Athenians having dispatched before under the Command of Chares a on 1. Fleet of fixty Ships, fent other fixty after, which they committed to the truft of Iphierates and Timotheus, two of the most noble in the City, who were to joyn with Chares, and in equal Authority to manage the War. On the other part the Confederates with one hundred Gallies wasted the Islands Imbrus and Lembus, and coming into Samus, after they had harased the Country, besieged the City both Sect. by Sea and Land, and making depredations upon many other Islands under the jurisdiction of Athens, got much money thereby. But the Athenian Generals uniting their Forces resolved to besiege Byzantium, which the Consederates underflanding, raised the Siege at Samus to come and relieve it. They were about to iovn in Battel, when suddainly arose a mighty Tempest, which made Iphicrates and Timotheus decline the Fight, but Chares would not acquiesce in their opinion, but fent to Athens and accused them to the People, as wilfully having neglected a good opportunity of doing their Countrey Service, which fo incenfed the heady Multitude, that they condemned them in many Talents. Corn. Nepos relateth, in vitis Timethat Menestheus the Son of Iphicrates, and Son-in-Law to Timotheus, was fent as gratin General, and they two as his Advisers. That the action was about Samus wherein Chares miscarried, and whereupon he accused them to the People. That Iphicrates being quitted, Timotheus was fined ten Talents, which he being unable to pay departed to Chelus, where dying, the Multitude repented of their rash Judgment, and remitting nine parts of the Fine, caused his Son Conon to pay the other, towards repairing of the Wall. So that the Walls which Conon the Grandfather built with Spoils, Conon the Grand-son was forced to repair at his own cost and difference of his Family. This was the last Age of the famous Athenian Captains, which concluded with the lives of Iphicrates, Chabrias and Timotheus, those that followed being not at all worthy the reckoning.

11. Chares having got all the Power into his own Hands, affifted Pharnabagus Diederuck the Persian Satrapa, who had revolted from his Prince, and was so rewarded for his Service after the Victory, that he was enabled to pay his Army. This was very acceptable to the Athenians at first; but when the King had once fent to expolitulate the matter with them, and a rumour was abroad that he intended with three hundred Ships to affift the Enemies in the Social War, they were far otherwife affected, infomuch that they refolved to make Peace with the Revolters, which was eafily done, they being no less desirous of it. Philip having the year before married Olympias the daughter of Neoptolemus late King of the Moloffians, and Niece (not Sifter as Plut arch hath it) to Arymbas or Aribbas the present. was much envied for his good fuccess by the three Kings of the Thracians, Illyrians, and Paonians. Since they had been overthrown and fubdued by him, they had no ftrength feverally to incourage them to a Revolt; Yet joyning their Forces together they were confident of good Success. But before they had compleated their Army, and whilst they were as yet incomposed, he set upon them

12. The same year being the first of the one hundred and fixth Olympiad, the fixth of Artaxerxes Othus, Elpinices being Archon, Alexander the Son of Philip and Olympias was born at Pella in Macedonia, in the Attick moneth Boedromion, if that be true which Ariftobulus relateth in Arrianus, that being thirty two years and eight moneths old at his death, he died on the last day, but one, of the moneth A. Vet overthrow from Parmenio his General: Another that he had got the Prize at O. Testam. g. 271. lympia with his swift-sooted Horse: And the third concerning the Birth of Alexander: and this was a little after he had taken Potidae. But Potidae was taken two years before, as appeareth not only from Diodorus, but also from Demosthenes; and strange it is, that Philip should not know of his Sons Birth a good while before he could have intelligence of the Olympian Solemnities, concerning which Judgment was given on the fixteenth day of the moneth: So that the relation of Julia lib. 12. The Phocians also having plowed up a great piece of the Ground belonging to the Temple at Delphos and called Cyrrhau, were also fined by the same Common-council of Greece, many Talents. He perswaded them therefore to get it again into their Hands, promifing, if they would give him power, to do it, and all other things for their profit and honour. They made him General, with full power according to his defire, who straight went to Sparta, where he pressed also the injustice of the Amphyctiones toward that State about their Fine, and shewing how it also concerned them to have the Sentence of the Council nulled, he perswaded Archidamus the King to joyn with him. He supplied him with money, wherewith raising Soldiers he invaded the Temple, and beating backthe Locrians that came to oppose him, with great Slaughter, pulled the Decrees of the Council from the Pillars, and brake in pieces the Tables wherein were registred the Names of the condemned. He caused it to be told abroad, that he neither-intended to rob the Temple, nor to have any other dishonest intention; but the Baotians not believing him, in their general Council decreed, that the Temple was to be recovered, and gave order for Levies for the fame purpose. Philomelus in the mean time fortified the place, and made all possible provision for defence. He invaded the Locrians, who killing some of his men, refused to restore the Bodies, alleging the Law, that all facrilegious persons ought to be cast out unburied: but he on purpose ingaged with them in another Skirmish, and with some of theirs redeemed them formerly denied. Then forced he the Prophetess to ascend the Tripos to give him advice concerning the War. She out of fear, told him he might do what soever he pleased. 14. This being blazed abroad, and may who flocked thither experiencing the same thing themselves, it came to be judged an Oracle. For a time one gave answer to another indifferently; but many were transported with the fury, and leaping down into the Hole were utterly loft, fo that it was judged best, to set apart one woman, who should attend constantly, and a certain Engine to be made, wherein standing safely over the place, she might give out the Oracle. Philomelus sent to Athens, Lacedamon, and the other eminent Cities of Greece, to excuse himself, professing he only intended the recovery of the Temple into the possession of his Country-men, and not with any desire or design to pillage the treasures, adding, that he should be always ready to account for the money or gifts belonging thereto. He defired that if any out of ill will to the Phocians bare Arms against them, that they would enter into a League with them, or at least to forbear all Hostility. The messengers essectually solliciting according to their instructions, brought the Athenians and Lacedamonians to enter into society, and to promise aid; but the Baotians, with the Locrians and some others, thought the contrary, and resolved that the Temple was to be rescued. Philo- Iden at asia melus feeing what kind of a brunt he must undergo, laboured always to strengthen himself, for which purpose abstaining yet from the Treasures of the Temple, he took a great summe of money from the Citizens of Delphi, wherewith he hired Soldiers. Having got together a confiderable force, he took the field, and overthrew the Locrians who made head against him. They then sent to Thebes requiring aid for Apollo and themselves, and the Baotians thinking their demand to be just, desirous to shew their Devotion, and conceiving it to concern them that the Decrees of the Amphyetiones should not be nulled, fent to the The salians, and the rest of the Amphyctiones to joyn with them in this War against the Phocians. The Council meeting together, then Decreed, that War was to be made upon them, which caused great motions and factions through-16. Some thought Religion bound them to relieve the God, and punish the Phocians as facrilegious persons; but others inclined to defend them, according to their particular interests. The Baotians, Locrians, Perrhabeans, Dorians, Dolopians, Athamanians, Acheans, they of Pthiotis, the Magnetes, Enianes, and fome others were for rescuing the Temple. With the Phocians stood the Athenians, Lacedamonians, and some others of Peloponnesus, whereof the Lacedamonians were now more than before concerned, for not having paid their Fine imposed on them by the Amphyctiones within the time limited, at the last sitting they were Fined one thousand Talents more. This made them desire that the Decrees of the Council should be invalid, as well as the Phocians, and being unwilling to contract the Odium of making War in their own name upon that account, they were glad to do it as it were in the name of the other, endeavouring withal to get the Temple into their own hands. Philomelus, when there came certain intelligence that the Thebans would invade them with a ftrong Army, to furnish himself with mercenaries, seized upon the Treasury of the Temple: then offering half as much more wages as formerly, he had multitudes offered themselves to the service. With ten thousand he invaded the Locrians, who being affifted with the Baotians opposed him, and having the worst of it, afterwards taking fome of his men as they were gathering forage, put them to death as facrilegious persons condemned by the Amphytiones. This the Phoeians complaining of procured of their General, that to stop such proceedings for the time to come, he should punish such prisoners as he took in the same kind. After this the Armies removed into other parts of the Countrey, where ingaging in Woody and difficult places of paffage, the Phocians were overmatched by the number of their Enemies, and being put to flight, Philomelus, after he had omitted nothing worthy of a Caprain, for fear he should come into the power of his Enemies, leaped down a Rock, and perished with the fall. He as his Prodecessor had done, with large pay allured many unto him, corrupted the Thessalians to quit the society of the Baotians, and invading the Territories of the Enemy took Thronium, forced the Amphissians to submit, and wasted the grounds of the Dorians; he took Orchomenus in Baotia; but besieging Charonea was worsted by the Thebans, and forced to retreat. At this time the Thebans, though deserted by the Thessalians, fent over forces into Asia to Artabazus, who had revolted from the King, and now began to decline after Chares the Athenian had left him. The War was renewed betwixt the Argives and the Lacedamonians who had the better in a battel fought at Ornea. Chares going into the Hellespont took Sestus, and Kersobleptes

the fon of Cotys King of the Thracians, bearing ill will to Philip of Macedonia, drew all the Cities of the Cherronesus to the party of the Athenians, except Cardia, Party being confidering that the eth Mathyman, into which the people were about to fend Colonies. Philip confidering that the a Town structe Methymneans suffered his Enemies to use their City seated in Magnesia for a refuge, and as a place convenient for carrying on the War, befieged it. They held out against him for some time, and in the siege he lost one of his Eyes with a ftroak of an Arrow; but at length they defired to be dismissed with one sute of Apparel apiece, and this being granted, he destroyed the City, and divided the grounds amongst the Macedonians. 18. Onomarchus improving the credit this ted himself, and returned into Theffaly against the Tyrant, who being straightn'd by defeated by fent again to Onomarchus, promifing if his affairs succeded, to do his work in the Philip, and is Cities of Theffaly. Onomarchus with twenty thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse was ready at his call, but ingaging in battel with Philip, and the Thessalians, was utterly defeated by the power and courage of the Thessalian Horse, and fled amain with such as could get away towards the Sea. It hapned that Chares the Athenian hovering then about the Coasts with a fleet, saved many that took the Sea, and swom to his ships. But of the Phocians and their affistants six thoufand were flain, and as many taken, amongst whom was Onomarchus, whom Philip caused to be hanged, and the rest to be drowned in the Sea as sacrilegious perfons. This battel hapned in the year wherein Maufolus the famous Prince of Caria died, and Clearchus the Tyrant of Heraclea a City in Pontus, was flain, to whom succeeded his son Timothems, and reigned fifteen years. The Lacedamonians fent him one thousand Foot, the Acheans two thousand, and the Athenians five thousand, besides four hundred Horse. Lycrophon and Pitholaus the Pherean Tyrants, after the death of Onomarchus being destitute of succour, were forced to quit their power by Philip and gathering together two thousand men, lead them to the service of Phayllus. With fuch forces and those of his own he invaded Baoiia, but was worsted several times, first at Orchomenus where he lost many men, then at the River Cephilus, and again at Charonea. After this he invaded the Locrians, called Epicnemidii, several of whose Towns he took, and received some loss from the Baotians, who invading Phocis he came fuddenly upon them and revenged himself. But having conflicted long with a Confumption, not long after in great pain, as his impiety (faith Diodorus) had deserved, he ended his life. He left for his Successor Phalachus the fon of Onomarchus, who being but young, he joyned as Counsellour to him, one Mnaseas his familiar friend. The Baotians falling by night upon them, flew two hundred of the Phocians with their Captain Mna- Sect. feas, and within a while in a fight at Charonea, Phalaus himself was also worsted, and many of his followers were flain. Philip of Macedon having restored the The falians to liberty by taking away the yoak of the Pheraan Tyrants (which bound them ever after very fast to him and his son) went towards the Pila, or Streights, to make War upon the Phocians; but the Athenians hindring his passage, thence he returned with great honour into his own Kingdom.

Whilst these things were adoing, the Lacedamonians being at Enmity with the Inhabitants of Megalopolis, fent Archidamus their King to invade them, who Stirs betwirt being too weak for them of themselves, defired aid of their friends. The Ar-MILE LAUGAMO gives, Sicyonians, and Messenians helped them with their whole strength, and the Thebans fent them four thousand Foot and five hundred Horse. The Lacedamonians had three thousand Foot from the Phocians, and one hundred and fifty Horse from Lycophron and Pitholaus, by the affistance of which forces they took Ornea, a City of Argolis, before their Enemies could come to relieve it. The Thebans afterwards coming down, a battel was fought with equal fuccess, after which the Argives departed to their feveral homes, and the Lacedemonians invading Arcadia, took and plundred Elissus, and returned unto Sparta. After fome time the Thebans had the better of it at Telphussa, and after that in two battels more, wherein they killed many of their Enemies; but then again the Lacedamonians by a notable victory recovered their credit, and the Armies returning home, a Truce was made betwixt them and the Megalopolitans. This was done whilst Phalechus in Baotia took Cheroieda, and presently lost it again to the Thebans, who then with a numerous Army entred, and wasted Phocis, and then having taken some inconsiderable places with much booty they returned into Bæstia.

21. The next year the Thebans being spent with the Phoeian War, sent to O-telm reduced thus the Persian King to desire a supply of money from him; who without any difficulty, or delay, bestowed on them three hundred Talents. No memorable thing passed betwixt the Phocians and them this year, which was spent in skirmishes and mutual depredation. Two years after (a) Philip cast out again Pitholaus the Tyrant, who had feized upon Phere, and fetting upon the Cities (a) lieu ad of Thrace which belonged to Chalcis, took by from the Caffle Zeira, which he demolished, and forced other Towns to submit to his yoak, (b) though upon the defire of the Chalcidians, Charidemus had been fent from the Athenians to help them, then lying in the Helleftont. The (c) year following wherein was folem. (b) neighbor nized the one hundred and eighth Olympiad, whereof Polyeles the Cyrenean was (c) Diadria. Victor, having great designs in his mind, he hasted to get into his hands the adolymp. 108, Cities of the Hellesport, and without any stroaks got Micylerne and Torone 7 usin lib. 81 by treachery to be delivered up to him. Now he quarrelled with the Olynthians (because his affairs were improved by fuccess) whom before he courted as fearing their power, which had been ever too much for his predeceffors. 'Tis faid he pretended a quarrel because they received his two half brothers, whom after he had taken in the Town he murdered; all things being lawful to him now that might any way ferve his turn, all his affections and pathons being swallowed up in his ambition, which made him not flick to break faith himfelf, and by his Gold to attempt others to do it. He thought it to no purpose to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had first inclosed all their power within the Walls, and therefore he first overthrew them in two battels, and then besieged the City, which attempting with many affaults and great loss of men, at length it was betrayed intohis hands by Euthycrates and Lasthenes the chief Magistrates, whom he had corrupted with money. He fackt it, and fold the Inhabitants with the rest of the plunder, whereby he much enriched himself, and was enabled to buy in Cities which he daily did, having been advised by the Oracle at the beginning of his undertaking, to make his affaults with filver flears; infomuch that he boafted that his Kingdom was more increased by Gold than Arms.

22, The Athenians being fensible of his incroachments, jealous of his grow- Diodorns ibid. ing power, and warily providing for the liberty of Greece, supplied, as they might, fuch as he fell upon with war, and now fent up and down to the Cities to defire them to value their liberty, and punish capitally such as were treacherous amongst The Athenians them, promifing them their alliance and utmost assistance, in this work. And pegan to look to themselves, now at length by the special advice of Demosthenes (the greatest Wit and Orator of Greece) they openly declared themselves his Enemies, and undertook the quarrel. But so far were the spirits of the Greeks degenerated, that this

Sect. 5. endeavour of theirs could not counterwork the efficacy of his Gold, fo that having a mind to take a Town that was strongly fortified, and one of the place telling him it could not be done, he asked him if he thought it not possible for his Gold to get over the walls. He had in all the Cities up and down his instruments and secret workers, who fought for a little gain to undermine the fortune of their own Country. After the taking of Olynthus, he celebrated the Olympick Games, and feafted all Comers; and entertaining them with great magnificence, by this cunning ingaged many to betray their Faith.

But Phalacus the Phocian General, being accused to have Hollen the facred money, was put out of his place, and three Generals substituted in his room, Democrates, Callias, and Sophanes, who were to make inquifition about the money which was stollen, and call the Trustees who had the management thereof, to account. The Chief of the Trustees was Philo, who being not able to give an account, was racked, and confessed many of his fellow thieves. They had taken out of the Temple four thousand Talents of gold after the rate of filver, and above fix thousand Talents of filver of fuch prefents as Crafus and others had fent: and there wanted not fome who affirmed as much to have been rifled out of this Temple, as Alexander afterwards found in the treasures of the Persians. Phaleeus was about to search in the pavement for treasure, hinted at by Homer; but when the Soldiers came to dig near to the

Philip was very glad to find them in fo weak a condition, defiring to abate that Spirit which they had got at the battel at Lenctra, yet he fent them a confiderable number of men, because he would not seem to be wanting to so religious a cause, as vindicating the right of the Oracle. At this time the Phocians building a Castle near Abe, were fallen upon by the Baotians, and shifting for themselves into the neighbouring Towns, five hundred of them stepped by into a Chappel of Apollo near Abe. Fire being left in their Tents, seized upon some Straw there, whence a great flame arifing, caught hold at length of the Chappel, and therein burnt alive those that had fled thither, for an example (as Diodorus accounteth it) to all sacrilegi-

The Athenians hearing of his coming, notwithstanding the place, were in great fear, and caused all their goods to be brought into the City. The Thessalians and Baotians earnestly now defired of him that he would undertake the conduct of all Greece against the Phocians; and on the other fide the Ambassadors of the Phocians, Lacedamonians, and Athenians, earnestly dehorted him from the War. He hearing both fides, being accustomed to double dealing, promifed them he would do as all had defired, and fo making them fecure hereby, feized upon the Straights of

They were to pay to the Temple a yearly tribute of fixty Talents, till the money stollen was made up. But from this punishment, Pausanias tellethus the Abaans were excepted, who alone had not contaminated themselves. The Council then took order for restoring of the Oracle, and for the establishment of peace in Greece; and Philip having confirmed their Decrees, imbracing them all with fingular kindness, returned into his own Kingdom, flourishing with great glory both upon the account of Piety and Martial matters. This Expedition made not a little for the enlargement of his Empire, and the improvement of his defign already laid, to procure himself to be chosen Captain General of Greece, and to make War upon the Persians.

The year after he profecuted this defign to a further advantage, for Kerfobleptes the King of the Thracians much distreffing the Greek Cities in Thrace, he exhorted them to joyn together, and with a strong force going against him overthrew the Thracians in several battels, and forced them to pay the tenths of their Lands to the Kingdom of Macedonia. He built Forts in such places as were convenient for the bridling of their power, whereby the Cities being delivered now from their fear, most gladly imbraced his alliance and fociety. of the Athenians croffed his deligns. With his utmost might, he fell upon it, continuing the form without intermission, by fresh men sent in the place of the dead or wounded: he built Turrets higher than theirs, and with battering rams and mines brake down a part of the wall. But the defendants being relieved from Byzantium, manfully refifted, and built a stronger wall in the room of that which was thrown down. By this means the Siege being drawn on in length, and great talk being in Afit of the power of the Macedonian, Ochus the Persian King being now jealous of his power, thought it wisdom to ballance him, and for that purpose gave order to his Satrapaes upon the Sea Coasts to assist the Perinthians. They uniting their Forces together, gave them their utmost assistance, which with the natural strength of the place inabled them to fland it out. For it was seated upon the cliff of a Peninsula about a furlong in length, the houses were thick and high, rifing one rank above another, according to the ascent of the hill, so that the whole Town represented the form of a Theatre. Hereby, though the wall was battered down, yet ftopping the ends of the streets, their defence was little diminished, which Philip perceiving, and how all things necessary for the War were abundantly supplied

29. By this time the grudges betwixt Philip and the Athenians were fo heightned, that now the Peace was held as broken on both fides. Photion the Athenian was fent against Clitarchus the Tyrant of Eretria, who was made by Philip, and cast him out, being by (a) Plutarch called Plutarch. (b) They sent Aid also (a) In Photion. to the Byzantians, at the perswasion of (c) Demossheres, contained in the fourth (b) Dieders Oration of his Philipicks. With them joyned the Chians, Coans, Rhodians, and at 0,111,110. other Greeks, which so terrified Philip, as he was glad for the present to yield (c) Platarch to necessity, and made a Peace with them. For Demosthenes having perswaded in Demosthers, his Citizens forgetting all committed in the Social War, to fend relief to the Byzantians and Perinthians, and he himself being sent Ambassador to the Cities, wrought fo effectually with them, that besides their ordinary Militia, they raifed fifteen thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, and liberally contributed Money for their pay; at which time the Affociates defiring that the fum of the Tax might be fet, Crobylus the Orator faid, that War had no fet rate of allowance. Philip hereupon demanded money to pay the men, but he also refusing it upon pretence of Poverty, raifed his Siege from Byzantium to go against him, and fent Messengers before to let the Scythians know he had vowed to fet up to Hercules a Statue upon the Bank of Ifter, and to defire peaceable access and recess for that purpose. He answered, that if he pleased to fend the Statue it should be erected, but refused to give leave for him to enter his Borders with an Army, saying, that if he set it up by force, he would pull it down after his departure, and turn the Brass thereof into Heads of Arrows. The Athenians exceedingly ftruck hereat for some time stood mute, after they were met together, being come of their own accord, for that the Magistrates caused an Allarm to be founded all the night after they received the news. At length all their Eyes were turned upon Demosthenes, who perswaded them to send to the Baotians to defire their affiftance in the vindication of the liberty of Greece, and being fent himself by his Oratory perswaded them to it, though they held themselves upon the account of the Phocian War obliged to Philip. The Athenians were incouraged by this accession of the Baotians, which doubled their force, and dispatched their Army under the conduct of Chares and Lysicles towards Charonea in Baotia, all of flourishing age willingly giving their Names to the expedition, and the Baotians admiring their readiness hasted also themselves, and joyning to them expected the coming of the Enemy. He fent his Ambasisadors to the Council, one whereof was Python an eloquent man, to withdraw them from the Athenians, but prevailing not, he notwithstanding resolved to fight them both, and with an Army of thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse invaded Bwotia. Philip thereupon with his drawn Sword made at Alexander, but to the good of both, being light headed with Wine, and mad with Anger, stumbled and fell. After this Alexander carried his Mother into Epirus, and went himself into Illy ritum, whence his Father stiortly recalled him by the procurement of Demarasus the Corinthian. Sacrifice to the Gods, and celebrated the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra with her Uncle Alexander of Epirus, to which he invited all that would, and gave large entertainment, being willing to shew to the Gracians how thankfully he took their making him General of all Greece. Feafting and Musick there was in abundance, and the Feast being done for that day (but all the Solemnity to be renewed on the next) whilst it was yet night all the People ran together into the Theatre. Thither were carried twelve Images of his Gods in solemn procession, and his own next after in a Divine habit, as arrogating to himself a place in the Council of the Gods. Then followed he himself apparelled in a white Robe in the midst of the two Alexanders, his Son, and Son-in-law. As he thus proceeded in the ruff of his Pride, the People fending up loud acclamations to the Skies, and Ecchoing his Felicity, one Paufanias met him in the straightest place of his passage, and stabled him into the Side, the wound being so mortal that he fell down dead. This Pausanias having been invited that he fell down dead. ted to a Feaft by Attalus, had been carnally abused by him after he was drunk, and V. The murderer having mounted on Horse-back had got away whilst the Tumult was about the Body, but that his Shooe catching hold on a Vine he was thereby pulled down, and then flain by Perdiccas and others. This end had Philip after he had reigned twenty four years, and lived fourty fix, to which Olympias is reported by fome to have contributed, by incouraging Pausanias to commit the fact, and neither know they how to clear Alexander of the matter. She put a Golden Crown upon Paulanias his Head as he hung on the Cross, and a few days after burnt his Body upon the Reliques of her Husband, built him a Monument in the same place, and caused a yearly parentation to be made to him. After this having killed Cleopatra's young Son in her Bosom, she then hanged her, or as one faith, fried them both to death in a brazen Veffel, and confecrated the Sword wherewith Philip was flain, to Apollo, under the name of Myrtalis, by which she was called when young. The foundation of a great Empire was laid by Philip, and a great pattern left unto his Son, which to make, was far more His great at. hard than what with greater Glory was atchieved by Alexander. The recovery of Macedon when there were two Competitors that had fuch affiftants, was a work of much prudence and dexterity. The regaining of fuch places as were loft to the Illyrians and Olynthians, with the overthrow of the neighbouring Kings, and the State of Olynthus, were fuch things as would have feemed too difficult for many ages to his predecessors. The matters atchieved by him required both Mars and Mercury for affiftants, and therein he bred fo many choice Commanders, as for their Skill and Valour being worthy to wear Crowns; He feemeth most to deferve that Glory which his Son by the influence of his abilities afterwards at-

By Sect. 5. fuch a Master he was not only instructed in morality, but had some insight into the more abstruse Sciences, and seemed to have some skill in Physick, being wont to give directions to his Friends about their health. Being fixteen years old, Philip undertaking an expedition against the Byzantians, left him his Deputy in Macedonia, where improving his time, he subdued the Medaans who had revolted, and taking that City, planted it with new Inhabitants, and called it after himself Mexandropolis. At the Battel of Charonea he behaved himself very stoutly, which with other his good parts drew great love upon him from his Father (infomuch that he willingly suffered the Macedonians to call him King, and himfelf General) but Philips mind towards his latter end being withdrawn from his Mother and fastned upon Cleopatra; thereupon ensued great diffatisfaction on both fides, whilft his mother ftirred him to great indignation, infomuch as he escaped not suspition of being privy to her designs against his Father's life.

Father with royal Rites and Ceremonies, he began to take care of his publick affairs, and being contemned for his youth and little experience, above expectation explicated himself out of all difficulties, by imitating his Fathers courtesie, and overcoming many by the invincibleness of his Spirit, which through the course of his life bore down all opposition. He renewed the discipline of War, and gained the affections of the Army; knowing also that Aitalus upon the account of his Niece Cleopatra, lay at all advantages to do him mischief, he sent Hecateus with a band of men with order to attack him and fend him over alive if possible, or else to kill him one way or other, which was at length effected. In the mean time Demossible having had secretintelligence of Philip's death, went to the people, and pretending to have dreamt it, fitired up the Athenians all ways possible to contemn the youth of Alexander, and not to suffer him to obtain the Principallity of Greece, and to this purpose they sent unto Attalus, and entred into conspiracy with him,

His difficulties how they might best effect it. The Atolians intended to restore the Exiles of the Acarnanians banished by Philip. The Ambraciots expelled the Garrifon there, and the Thebans decreed to do the fame by that in Cadmea. As the Aracdians had refused to consent that the Father should be General of Greece, fo were they now nothing better inclined towards the Son, and the rest of the Peloponnesians, as the Argives, Eleans, and Lacedamonians were ready to do any thing for the afferting of their own Liberty and Power. The Nations about Macedonia began to stir, being altogether inclining to renounce their obedience.

37. Alexander as an earnest of his future success easily removed those obstacles, overpowring some by entreaty and good words, others by awe, and some by force of Arms. He first obtained of the Thessalians by a publick Decree to be owned as his Fathers Succeffor in the Generalfhip, and then eafily bringing the neighbouring People to do the lame, paffing the Pyla, he called the Council of the Amphystiones, and procured by their suffrages to be elected the Captain General of all Greece. Having done this, to bring over the rest by fear, he led down his Army into Baotia, where pitching his Tents by Cadmea he affrighted the Thebans and the Athenians also so much, that these getting in all their Goods to the City, and fortifying it as well as they might, fent to beg his Pardon, that they had owned him no fooner. One of the Ambaffadors was Demosthenes, who came not with the rest to Alexander, but returned back when he was on his way, either for that he stood in fear of him for the Orations made against his Father, or because he would not crack his Credit with the Persian King, from whom Achines accused him to have received much money. He answered the Ambassadors to their satisfaction, and then sent for the Deputies of the Estates to meet him at Corinth, where speaking very courteoully to them, he was again declared General against the Persian, and aid decreed to him for carrying on the War; after which he returned into Macedonia.

Whilst he here was in the Ishmus, many Philosophers came to salute him; * only *piegent Lar-Diogenes the Snopin made no reckoning of him. The King understanding this & Plathis, went to visit him then at Albert, and finding him suning himself in his tweb, slit. a delign to revolt, and not a few Cities, amongst which Thebes was most eminent, and had renounced his authority. Hereupon he returned into Macedonia; the Thebans in the mean while besieging his Garrison in Cadmea, which, being Eut the Total upon fupplied with Arms by Demosthenes, they fell upon and slew many. They implored the affiftance of the Argives, Eleans, Arcadians, and Athenians. The Athenians were perswaded by Demosthenes to send them aid, who reigning in the Assemblies by the Power of his Tongue, wrote also to the Kings Captains in Afia, thence to oppose Alexander, whom he called a boy and a fool. But Alexander marching with speed into Baotia, the Valour of the Abenians well abared, and Demosthenes himself grew very cool. The Thebans uncertain what their Allies would do, and furprifed with the Kings coming, called a Council of Officers to consult what should be done, where it was resolved to fight for their liberty, and this was confirmed by the People, which with great alacrity prepared for reliftance, though they might have had good Terms of A. lexander. Who delayed also to do any thing, that they might have time to advise; for his mind being fully intent upon the Persian War, he would gladly have been rid of all trouble on this fide of the Seas. But when he faw their wilfulness, he fully resolved to make this City a Terror to the rest. Yet he first offered indemnity to all fuch as would come over to him, which they to crofs, out of emulation, caused to be proclaimed from an high Tower, that if there were any who had a defire to joyn with the great King and the Thebans in vindicating the liberty of Greece, and suppressing the Tyrant thereof, they should repair

39. Then fell he with all his might and skill upon the City, which they as floutly defended, knowing else what would follow, and encouraging themselves with their former successat Leuctra and Mantinea, they made resistance to the wonder and discouragement of their Enemies; till at length Alexander perceiving a little Door to be left unguarded, fent Perdiccas thither with a party, who breaking into the City made way for the rest of the Macedonians. Now were the Thebans on one fide by them, and the other by the Garrison in Cadmea (which like a Tempest fell upon them) cut in pieces, the Law of War not being allowed them, because of that Proclamation they had made from the Tower. The Gracians also that served under Alexander, as the Phocians, Thespians, Plataans, Orchomenians, and others, bearing them malice, spared them no more, so that great flaughter was made, they fighting it out to the laft, having no other regard to their lives than this, to fell them at as dear a rate as possible. There were flain fix thousand (Alian * by some mistake hath ninty thousand) and thirty * Var. bin.lih. thousand were taken Captives. Alexander having buried all his Slain (to the 13. 44. 7. number of five hundred) affembled a Council of the Gracians, to which he referred what should be done with the Thebans. There their Enemies urged against them, that they had conspired with the Barbarians against the Gracians, in the time of Xernes, had fought amongst other Allies of Persia against Greece, and fince that being acknowleged and rewarded by his Successors as well deserving of them. By these things they so incenced the Council, as to decree the City to be levelled with the Ground, the Captives to be kill'd, and fuch as had fled to be fought for and brought to punishment. The King acquiefcing in this fevere Sentence, executed it accordingly, felling all he had taken, except the Priests and those that had entertained his Father when he was young, and their kindred, with the posterity of Pindar the Poet, whose House alone he left standing. This Famous City then was demolished the last day of the Eleusinian Solemnities then celebrated by the Athenians, the twentieth day of the moneth Boedromion, after it had continued in a fetled condition almost eight hundred years.

40. Alexander publishing an Edict, whereby all Gracians were forbidden to receive the Theban Exiles, the Athenians alone refused to obey it, setting open their Gates to them, being then celebrating the mysteries of Ceres. Hereat he was inraged, and when they had fent to deprecate his indignation the fecond time, forgave them only on this condition: to give up to him the ten (Plutarch nameth but eight) Orators who had ftirred them up against him, and the principal

Antipater hereupon was forced to march against him and leave Macedonia; the absence of whom the Lacedamonians The Lacedemo- thinking a sufficient occasion of working some notable feat, excited the Grecinisms make this in his ab- ans to agree together with united Force to recover their Liberty. The Athenians conceiving themselves ingaged to Mexander, who had respected them above all others, refused to ftir, but most of the Peleponnesians, and some others, gave their Names willingly, and raifed amongst them twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, which were commanded by Agis the Spartan King. Antipater hearing this composed the matters of Thrace as he might, and with an Army of fourty thouland men raifed out of the Confederates of Greece marched against them, and joyning Battel, after much opposition slew five thousand and three hundred with the loss of three thousand and five hundred of his own men: Agis himself fighting most valiantly, after he had received many wounds was to be carried out of the Fight and so to be conveyed home. But being incompassed with Enemies, and feeing there was no hope to escape, he bade his men shift for themselves, and referve their lives for the future service of their Countrey: he on his knees received his Enemies as well as he could, till having first killed some of them, at length he was flain, after he had been King nine years.

43. Antipater having obtained this Victory, was willing to put an end to the War out of fear of Envy, by feeming to proceed further than the modesty of a Subject should require. For he knew the high Spirit of Alexander, who rejoyced in the Victory, but not in him being Victor, which he not obscurely grudged at, thinking so much to be detracted from his own Glory as was added to that of another. The Lacedamonians therefore being constrained to send to him, he to beg pardon. remitted them for answer to the Council of Greece, which having heard what could be faid on both fides, referred the whole matter to the Cognifance of Alexander. They then gave up to Antipater fifty Hostages, and sent into Asia to Alexander to beg Pardon. Most of such learned men as were eminent during this Pe-

CHAP. III.

The Affairs of Sicilie during this Empire.

SECT. I.

The first Names and Inhabitants of this Island, with a relation of such things as preceded the Persian Empire.

ICILIE is an Island of the Mediterranean Sea, lying over against Italy at five miles distance; from which it is thought to have been severed by some Earth-quake, or the violence of the Sea, being joyned formerly by an Isthmus, or neck of Land, to the Continent. 2. It was first, from the Triangular Figure, called Trinacria, then Sicania, and afterwards obtained the name of Sicilie. The most antient Inhabitants were Cyclopes, or Gyants with one only Eye in their foreheads (as the Poets fancied) and the Lastrygones of the same Original. After them succeeded the Sicani, by some said to be indigena, or naturals of the place, but by others a People of Iberia, or Spain, and so named from Sicanus, a River

The old Inhabitants of CHAP. III. in that Country, whence they were expelled by the Ligyes, and coming into the Sect. 1
Island Trinaeria changed its name into Sicania. After these, the Sicilli a people of Italie (fo named faith Thucydides from Italias a King of Arcadia) being expelled by the Opici, passed into this Mand, and overthrowing the Sicani leized upon the best parts of it, and gave it the name of Sicilie, almost three hundred years before the Greeks found it out. When Rium was taken, some Troians fled A. M. 2821. by Ship from the Aheans into this Countrey, and fixing themselves near to the Sicani, were called Elymi, whose principal Seats were Erys and Egesta. To these were added some of the Phosensians, of those who in their return from Troy being driven by Tempest into Libya, or Africk, thence passed into Sicilie. The Phanicians also inhabited all over the Island in the Maritime parts, and the little Islands near adjoyning, for the benefit of Traffick with the Siguli . But after that many Greeks arrived, they removed, and joyned themselves to the Elymi, and inhabited Motys, Soluns, and Panormins, because thence was but a little pasfage unto Carthage. So many Barbarians, and after this manner, inhabited Sicilie Lib 6. ad inti faith Thucydides, with whom in the main of their relations, confent Diodorus, tium. Strabo, Dionysius of Halycarnassis, Pausanias, Constantinis Porphyrogenheta and o

The v. c. 20. year following Archias the Corinchian, descended from Hercules, drove the Siculi Achasi 100 from that place where flood the City afterward called Syratufe. About the fame time Lamis brought a Colony from Megara; which he first placed upon the River Pantacius, in a place called Trotilus. In the fourty fifth year after Syracufe began to be inhabited, Antiphernus from Rhodes, and Entimus out of Crete, with their several Colonies planted Gela, so named from the River by which it flood, the Inhabitants whereof one hundred and eight years after erected the great and magnificent City Agrigentum, or Agragas, To called also from a River of the same name. Zancla was first inhabited by some Pyrates of Cama, a City belonging to Chalcis; but afterwards by a multitude that came promifcuoufly from Chalcis and other parts of Eubera, under the Conduct of Perieres of Cuma, and Cratamenes of Chalcis, and were hence cast out again by the Samians and other Ionians, who fled from the Medes into Sicilie. Zancle was so named by the Siculi, from a Sicle, in their language Zanela, which it refembled. Not long after Anaxilas Tyrant of Rhegium banishing the Samians, filled it with a mixt mul. titude, and called it Messana, after the name of his own Countrey. Himera was planted by the Zancleans, and many Chalcidians amongst them, with whom al-To joyned certain Syracusians being expelled by the contrary faction, and called Myletide. Their language was mixed betwixt the Chalcidian and Dorick Tongues.

These were the Colonies which from several parts of Greece planted Sicilie, As for other Towns that were Colonies of these Colonies, they shall be told whose they were upon occasion.

4. That Gyants inhabited Sicilie (although to some it hath seemed no other than the invention of Poets, who usually speak monstrously of antient things) the discovery of the last age hath made most manifest; at what time were in feveral places of the Island found the Bones of such kind of men, and the perfect proportion of one or more within the Earth, which upon touch mouldred all into dust. Cluverius in his Description of Sicilie, and Fazellus, herein give abundant fatisfaction, which might be further strengthned from what the difcoverers of America relate concerning men of fuch stature; but that the Testimony of Scripture alone fufficeth to make evident the being of Gyants. That they were Indigena, or first Inhabitants of Sicilie, is probable, and the very same with the Lastrygones. As for the Sicani, no credit is to be given to the Testimony of Thursdides in this point that they came out of Spain, for that Diodorus being this Countrey-man, and certainly rather more concerned in the delivery of the Antiquities of it, than other Nations, averreth the most accurate Historians to have affirmed them Indigena, which Timeis, who lived under Agathocles the Tyrant, did fully demonstrate. Thucydides, who first obtruded this Fable upon the Greeks, consesseth that they themselves were of a contrary opinion, and though they in a matter concerning their Honour might not be heard, yet this may fatisfie, that in Spain there is no fuelt River to be found as ever had the name of Sicanus, which some of those who follow the opinion of Thucydides change into Sicoris (at this day Segre) and others speak of a City called Sicania, and one Sicanias Captain of the Colony,

The Sicani came not out.

Neither could these Sicani be driven from their feats by the Ligures, whose habitation was not in Spain beyond the Pyrenean Hills, but in Gaul near the River Rhodanus and the Alps. Lastly, that difficult journey which those obscure people must have taken by Land (for the use of shipping was much later in Spain) through the Countreys of the Tyrrhenians, Umbri, Ligures, Ausona, Opici, Oenotrians, and other fierce and warlike Nations, after the passage of the Pyrenaans, Alps, and Gaul, may justly induce us to give credit rather to the opinion of Diodorus, and of Demetrius Calatianus a most antient Writer; who, as the Scholiast of Theoretius telleth us, derived the Sicani from the Cyclopes or Gyants.

Neither the

5. That the Siculi came out of Italy several grave Authors relate, as amongst others Diodorus and Dionysius of Halicarnassus from the credit of Hellanicus the Lesbian, Philistus, and Antiochus, both of Syracuse; but they so diversly relate the flory, that it appeareth to be no other than dubious, and so intricate as nothing certainly can be pitched on. In Thucydides the Opici, in Antiochus the Oenotrians and Opici drove out the Siculi: But in Hellanicus instead of Siculi the Elymi and Ausona were expelled, with Siculus their King, by the Oenotrians and Fapiges. Again, according to the mind of Philistus, neither any Siculi, Ausona, nor Elymi transported themselves out of Italy; but the Ligures under conduct of Siculus. Solinus and Martianus make this Siculus the Son of Neptune, Isiodorus the brother of Italus, Servius Captain of the Sicani, and Antiochus will have him a Roman Exile, whom Morges the Successor of Italus entertained. Further, Dionysius writeth, that the Siculi were Native Inhabitants of Latium, and thence beaten by the Aborigines, which is plainly out of the road of history, the Siculi never having been masters of Rome. It would be too tedious to recite the feveral opinions concerning the time when the Siculi should make their passage out of Italy into this Island. And what Thucydides bringeth for a confirmation of his opinion, viz. that in his time some of the Siculi remained in Italy, cannot but be falle, no foot-steps of them being to be found out in that Countrey by the discovery of any Geography; so that others, on the contrary, grant that the whole Nation passed over. These arguments drawn from the uncertainty of reports constrain us rather to acquiesce in the opinion of Bochartus, who concludeth that no other stranger came from other parts to inhabit Sicily, but all were Indigena, except the Greeks and Phanicians, the Siculi and Sicani not being distinguished in Nation but only in place. From the Phanicians (who especially lived about the Promontory of Lilybaum, though they were dispersed throughout the Maritime Coasts) he sheweth the Island it self, and every notable Town and River to have been named, in the first book of that admirable work intituled Canaan.

6. Sicily, faith Fustin out of Trogus, was from the beginning the Countrey List. 4. of the Cyclopes, which being extinct Cocalus made himself King of the Island. To him fled Dadalus for protection, from the presence of Minos King of Crete. A. M. 2773: This Dadalus was an Athenian, of the family of the Erechthide, and a famous Artist in all manner of Graven and Carved works. It hapned that he had a Scholar, his own Nephew by his Sifter, named Talos, who going beyond him in Skill, he privately murd'red him, and the matter coming out, was forced to fly for his life, and went into Crete. There being courteously entertained by Minos, he wrought many rare pieces of Architecture, but at length fo displeased the King in some thing which concerned Pasiphae his wife, that he also fled thence into Sicily, where he was entertained by Cocalus King of the Sicani, then reigning at Inyeus, called also Camicus. Some thought that by the means of Pasiphae he escaped by Boat, his Son Icarus accompanying him in another, and that having invented fails, (whereas before Oars only were in use) Icarus not managing his with skill enough, his Vessel sunk, and thereupon arose the fable that they escaped with wings made of feathers waxed together, and of the young man's foaring fo high, till the Sun melting the wax, he thereupon fell headlong into that part of the Sea which afterwards bare his name. Others thought Icarus was drowned as he took water. But Minos getting notice whither Dedalus was fled, purfued him with an Army, and required Cocalus to deliver him up. Cocalus returned him a fatisfactory anfwer, and invited him unto his house, where he stissed him in a Bath, or else his daughters, for the love they bore to Dedalus. when they came to wash him

(which was the custom for women and maids to do unto guests, according to Athenaus) instead of warm water, poured on him scalding Pitch. He gave up his body to his men, pretending he had flipped by chance into hor water, and perswaded them Sect. 1. to stay and plant in the Island, where they built Minoa and Engyum, now Gange, the two first Greek Cities founded in Sicily, as some note. The Cretans afterwards in revenge for their King's death, came and belieged Camicus five years to no purpose, and were shipwrackt in their return upon the Coasts of Italy, where then resolving to stay and hide their disgrace, they built Hyria, betwixt Tarentum and Brundusum, and from them descended the Japyges and Messapii. This pasfage concerning Minos the younger, happened in the days of Hercules the Gracian, an Age before the Trojan War.

7. After Cocalus the several Cities (because they wanted rightful and successive Kings, as it seemeth, and lived under loose Democracy) became the prey of Tyranni. whereof no Country was ever more fertil than this Island, saith Fustin. Of ut sure. these, Anaxilaus his Justice vied with the Cruelty of the rest, and was not unrewarded. For at his death leaving his Children young, whom he committed to the truft of Micythus his faithful flave, his Subjects fo prized his memory, as they chose rather to obey him, and suffer the Majesty of a Kingdom to be managed by a flave, than defert his Sons. But if by these Tyranni be to be meant, such as after the settlement of the Greek Colonies, made themselves Masters of the Cities (as we have no other ground than to believe; the name of Anaxilaus fufficiently declaring its original) then Cocalus living an Age before the Trojan War, and the first Greek Colony mentioned by Thueydides being planted in the * ele- * A.M.27231 venth Olympiad, this after Cocalus is with great liberty used by Trogus or Fustin; feveral hundreds of years, (viz. five or fix) intervening betwixt Cocalus and those Tyranes. For the Cities were many years after their founding governed by the People, according to the custom of Greece, till Phalaris usurped in the State of Agrigentum, which Suidas writeth to have happened in the fifty second Olympiad, and Eusebius in the fifty fourth. This difference betwixt them may A.M. 3441. well be reconciled, if, with Cappellus, we believe that Phalaris coming to Agrigen U1799-54-40-12 tum, there was kindly entertained for eight years, at the end whereof took oc- Evilvandes casion from a guest, and perhaps a Judge of Controversies, to make himself Tyrant, chi, 2.

and the People flaves.

8. Phalaris was born at Aftypalea a City in Crete; his Fathers name was Laodamus, who died whilst this his Son was an infant. He married Erythia, and on her begat Paurolas, a little before whose birth being banished, and deprived of the greatest part of his Estate, he continued long in a desolate condition, not knowing what to do, till at length a Sedition being raifed in the State of Agrigentum; he was sent for by the weakest faction, and in conclusion got all the power into his hands. He kept the Tyranny by the same arts he first obtained it, viz, frand and cruelty, for which cause he was grievously hated by many, and his life laid at by those of whom he had well deserved. Erythia continued all her life with her Son Paurolas at Aftypalea, where though she was much importuned by many Suters, yet she remained stedfast in sidelity to her husband. The Citizens of Astypalea when they saw Phalaris had so advanced himself, either for that now their hatred was allaied, or out of fear of revenge, fent to him to intimate that they had revoked what had been formerly done against him, as unjust. He despifed not this late repentance, but fent them his hearty thanks, and rewarded them. Having obtained a victory over the Leontines, his Son Paurolas fent him a Crown of Gold, which he returned back unto his wife Erythia. She was at length poy-foned by Psthon one of the Suters, inraged at a repulse, which thing Phalaris took most impatiently.

9. It hapned that one Perillus an Athenian, and an excellent Statuary, came to Agrigentum, where shewing his rare skill, he was kindly entertained by Phalaris. He taking notice of Phalaris his cruelty, framed a brasen Bull, which being heated and a man put in his belly, would by the roaring of him that was thus tormented, imitate the voice of a natural one. Presenting him with this exquisite piece, as incomparable for the torturing of men, he admired his skill, but deteffing his wickedness, caused him first to make a tryal of it, and excufed himself to the Athenians, who took it ill, as having done nothing but what was just and meet. If Perillus had only made experiment, Phalaris had satisffied all reasonable men; but threatning his Enemies with this Engine, and making good his word upon them as often as he could have occasion, he thereby incurred, and flighted the hatred of mankind. At the same time flourished one Stesichorus a Poet of Himera, who died eight years before Phalaris. He wrote verses against the Tyrant, and raised an Army, animating the Inhabitants of Conon was presently condemned to the Bull. He doubted at first what to do with Stefichorus, but at length beholding his worth, he not only difmiffed him unpunished, but with large gifts; and ever after mightily reverenced him both alive and dead; infomuch as he defired the Himerians to build him a Temple, and Altars (offering for that purpose men, money, and all necessaries) and most lovingly comfor-

10. He was fo great a contemner of Popularity, and fo conscious of his wickedness and publick infamy, that he refused the honours offered him by them of Melita, not for any pride, but with a friendly admonition, that it would be to them infamous, and to him not at all advantagious. So when Ttefichorus, Cleaneta, Theana, and others, thought of writing in his praise, he seriously defired they would forbear, wishing rather that his name might be buried in oblivion, than celebrated in the Writings of Learned men, and, to no purpose, adorned with falle commendations. Being grievously provoked by the affronts of the Messenians, Catanians, Leontines, Zancleans, and Tauromenites, he prosecuted them to the utmost, often faying, that he most certainly knew they would fall into his hands, which accordingly came to pass. He confessed that he had tortured in the brazen Engine thirty seven men, seriously wishing they might be the last, but he foresaw that Lamachus and Epiterses, though absent, would increase the number. These things are related in the Epistles that go under his name, which some Learned Men think written by Lucian. But whoever so drew to the life another's disposition as he there doth his own, insomuch as Suidis accounteth them * very admirable. If one confider their ftyle, accuteness, * Σαυμαςίand invention, there are no Epistles of any Tyrant, no not of any Orator or ας πάω. Philosopher to be compared with them. But if one look at the disposition of the man, he was a portentous thing, born for the chastisement of the naughtiness of men, of cruel hatred and unparallel'd cruelty; yet of a most propense and munificent mind towards his Friends, and withal reverencing Virtue fo much in his very Enemies, that for its fake he would pardon injuries, and relinquish hatred.

(b) Ælian hath a more likely ftory concerning Chariton and (b) Like Like Melanippus. Chariton loved Melanippus with an extravagant and immodest Love. as appeareth from the historian. Melanippus having a contest with one of Phalaris his friends, was commanded, and at last forced to desist, which taking very ill, he complained of it to his Lover, and defiring his affiftance for killing the Tyrant, thought of taking in other young men into the conspiracy. Chariton defired of him to trust him alone with the matter to take an opportunity to revenge him, unwilling that both of them should miscarry in it if it were discovered; andon a time made at Phalaris with his dagger, but was prevented by his Guard, which he had continually about him. Being examined concerning his Complices, he endured great tortures, folong, that Melanippus more sensible of them than he himself, went to the Tyrant, and revealed the whole matter. He admiring the courage and love of both, difmiffed them, with this condition, that they should depart the same day out of Sicily. This love which appeareth to have been no better than an unnatural lust, was afterwards by Apollo called divine, whence, as in other respects, these impure Spirits, the gods of Heathens, betrayed themselves what they were. After seven years, he was also slain in a battel against the Siculi, having before this made War with the Syracufians, and by composition got from them the City of Camerina. After his death Gelon the Son of Dinomenes (descended of the Race of the Rhodians, who with the Cretans and other Greeks had feated themselves in Sicily) that had commanded his Forces with great success, and to whom committed the trust of his Children, breaking all obligations made himself Lord of Gela. Such being the danger and infirmity of all Governments, except rightfully fuccessive Monarchy. This fell out in the second year of the leventy second Olympiad, when Hybrilides was Archon at Ashense the thirty first of Darius Hystaspis, and the same, as some reckon, wherein the battel at Marathon was fought. Now the comportment of Sicilian affairs constraining us to speak most concerning Syracafe, so considerable a place, both as to its self, as a City, and as the scene of so great transactions, requireth a more accurate description.

The Original

2. Syracuse was first inhabited by some Greeks of Atolia, and had the name of Ortygia. These were expelled by the Siculi, who possessed themselves of the place, and at length were outed also by a Colony led hither out of Peloponnesus by Archias the Corinthian, in the eleventh Olympias, Romalus then reigning at Rome, and the Messenian War being very hot in Pelopomess. This new Colony, because of Archias, and for that many followed him from Corinth, owned that City for its Metropolis, which at that time was most powerful at Sea. But many afterwards flocked out of other parts of Peloponnesus, and by little and little the City of Syracuse so increased, as it became not only the greatest, and most beautiful of all in Sicily, but of Greek Cities whatfoever, as Cicero affirmeth. It contained, as he writeth, four great Cities; the Island, Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis. Its compass was one hundred and eighty furlongs, having, besides Suburbs, two Ports very commodious for shipping, being seperated by the Island, and grounds about it very fertile, in some places rising into little hills, but compassed about with Fennes. The first Inhabitants dwelt in the Island antiently called Ortygia; then as the City increased the other parts were added, whereof the latest was Neapolis. As for the flate of the City, after it received a new beginning from Archias, the form of the Commonwealth was without doubt the same that then was in the Metropolis under the Government of the Bachiada, viz. Oligarchical bordering upon Aristocracy. Afterwards the common people waxing heady outed the better fort of the possession of the grounds, and seizing of the Government, made bad to be worse, as the sad changes and desolations will shew. The Exiles (by Herodotus called Gamori) betook themselves to Gelon the Tyrannus of Gela, who coming to restore them with an Army, the people resisted not, but received him into the City, whereby obtaining the whole power, he restored it not to the Nobility, but made himself master of Syracuse. This hapned at the time aforesaid, and about two hundred and fourty four years after the Plantation of Archias:

3. Gelon

3. Gelon fo used his power as he was loved by all, and feared by none. He every way much inlarged, adorned, and inriched the City : out of all Conquered Towns he took the Noblest, and worst disposed Citizens, and brought them to Syracuse. He procured the affections of almost all that dwelt in Sicily, and so greatly strengthn'd himself, that he was able with a Navy of two hundred Triremes, and as great an Army as all Greece could fet forth against Xerxes, to help the Gracians in the Median War; and had gone to their affiftance, if they would either have granted him the Command of the Land Army or the Fleet. When he could obtain neither of those, he employed his Forces against the Carthaginians, who had been called into Sicily by the Egestans, and on the same day wherein the Greeks obtained their victory at Salamine, got fo great an one over them at Himera a Maritime Town, that his glory is thought to have equalled, if not exceeded, the other of Themistocles. At this time the Carthaginians were very powerful, and become eminent; whose affairs being by necessity to be joyned with such matters as relate to this Island of Sicily, a more convenient place cannot be had, to speak something (as this work requireth) of the Original, and progress of their

4. Carthage was a Colony of Tyre, and Tyre of Sidon the most antient Metropolis of Phanicia, mentioned by Homer with commendation for ingenious industry (who hath not one word concerning Tyre) and built by Sidon the eldest Son of Canaan. Tyre was built about the two thousand seven hundred and fourty seventh year of the World, and two hundred and fourty years before Solomons Temple, as (4) (4) Antiquit.
Folephus hath observed. The Greeks thought it received its name from Tyrus the 1, 2, 2, 2. Founder: and (b) some invented a fable of a Nymph, called Tyros, beloved by (b) Styleaus Hercules. But Tfor in the Phenician language fignifying a Rock, the situation it symmetry. felf sufficiently declareth the Original of the name, which upon this account was Pollar lib. 1. communicated to three other places, besides this eminent City, viz. (e) two in (e) solar in the Continent, and another in the same Island. Near the Island of this famous Phanics vide City flood Palatyrus, or Old Tyre, mentioned by Joshua, and called a strong City Bochartics. even at the division of the Land of Canaan, which hapned about two hundred 647, 17. years before the building of that whereof we speak. Now (d) Fosephus maketh (d) antiquit. the Temple of Ferufalem to have been founded in the eleventh year of the reign of Contra Apito. Hiram King of Tyre, who was son to Abebaal, by Fosephus called Abibalus, and min live. by Eusebius, Abelbalus. Hiram, or Huram according to the Hebrews, (by the Greeks called Irom and Syron (for Horom) by Eupolemus) was a great friend to David, and supplied Solomon his Son with materials, and work-men for building the Temple. He also proposed hard questions to Solomon to be unfolded, as Menander testified, who translated the Tyrian Annals into the Greek language: He strengthned, and inlarged the City of Tyre, as Dius also wrote, and reigned thirty four years. After him his Son Beleastartus reigned seven, and Abdastartus nine, who being flain by the four Sons of his Nurse, the eldest of them reigned twelve years. Then Aftartus the fon of Baleastartus twelve, his brother Aftarimus nine, who was slain by his brother Phelles. Phelles reigned but eight months, being killed by Ithobalus the Prieft of Aftarta, who reigned thirty two years; after him Badezorus his fon fix, then Mettinus his fon nine, and lastly, Pygmalion fourty, in the seventh of whose reign his fifter Dido built the City of Carthage in Africk. Therefore from the beginning of Hirams reign to the building of Carthage intervened one hundred and fifty five years and eight moneths; and whereas the Temple was founded at Ferusalem in the twelfth of his reign, from the building of the Temple to that of Carthage passed one hundred and sourty three years and eight months, as Fosephus collecteth from the Testimony of Menander the Ephesian, in his first book against Apion.

5. But Appian in his History of the Punick Wars, writeth that Carthage was opinions con built by the Tyrians, fifty years before the destruction of Troy, which precedeth the former date three hundred and fixty years. He nameth as founders Zorus and Carchedon, according to the opinion of the Greeks, who thought them the Captains of the Colony; whereas Tfor, or Zor, was the name of the Metropolis, and Carchedon of the new City, Carthada fignifying a New City, in the Phanician language, as Solinus witnesseth. Strabo again will have the Phanicians to have Lib. 1. 9. 48. led out Colonies as far as the Pillars of Hercules, and planted some, a little after the Trojan War, upon the Maritime Coasts of Africk, with which Virgil closing, feigneth Dido to have reigned at Carthage at that time; whereas she was three hundred years later, according to the Testimony of the Phanician Annals; fo as Servius upon the Poet affirmeth the whole ftory of Æneas and Dido to be a fiction fiction, and utterly against the course of History. Further, Eusebius noteth that Sect. 2 some accounted Carthage built one hundred and fourty three years after the destruction of Tray, about the 2966 year of the World, and the twenty third of the reign of David, one hundred and fixty four years or more before the time affigned to Dido by Menander. For the reconcilement of these several affertiof three parts, ons it must be considered that Carthage consisted of three parts, viz. Cothon, Megara, and Byrfa, whereof the first was the Port, and the last the Citadel compassed about by the second, called Magalia and Magaria, but more truly Megara, fignifying properly in the Punick Lauguage, dwellings in a ftrange Counbout the Haven before the War of Trox, the other some time within one hundred and fourty four years after the destruction of it, which might rightly, in respect of the other, be called Carthada, or New Town; and lastly, the Byrfa by Dido one hundred and fixty fix years after. For the Phanicians being mafters at Sea, might according to their pleasure, as they had occasion, fend out Colonies. which they began to do from the time that Follows expelled them out of the Land of Canaan. The Greeks themselves believed that Cadmus made an expedition into Africk, and there built many Cities, as appeareth out of Nonius; and he built the Citadel at Thebes about the time of Foshua. In Procopius his age, who lived under Fustinian the Emperour, about the five hundred and fourtieth year of Christy the two Pillars were yet standing, which those Canaanites erected that fled from the Face of Folhua, in that part of Africk, called Tingitana, as the inscription testified, which we formerly mentioned, and Eusebius writeth that these same Canaanites led Colonies into Tripolis in Africk. Lastly, amongst several other Cities built by the Phanicians, the most considerable, after Carthage, was Utica, some ten miles distant from it, which Aristotle, from the Phanician Mica. Histories reporteth to be two hundred and eighty seven years antienter than Carthage, and Velleius Paterculus to have been built by the Tyrians a few years after Gades, about the time of Codeus, who being contemporary with Saul, this City obtained the name of Utica or Ityca, that is (faith Bochartus) in the Pha-

Ground as an Ox's hide would compais. The Africans laughed at their folly, and Aniad, libit. out of a defire to see what use they could make of so little Ground, swore to make good the Bargain. The Phanicians then cut the Hide all into one small thong, with which they encompassed twenty furlong, and thereon built a Castle, thence, (faid the Greeks) called Byrfa. But learned men explode this Story of the Hide as a meer invention, and a fable railed from a falle explication of the word, which in the Hebrew Tongue is Bofra, and fignifying a fortified place, or Caftle, is changed into Byrfa for the better found, because the Genius of the Greek language suffereth not Sand R to be joyned together. Fustin out of Trogus relateth that Hierbas King of Mauritania sent for ten of the principal Carthaginians, and required Dido in marriage, threatning elfe to make War upon them. At their return they told her he defired some one who might teach his people breeding and manners, but none could be found that was content to leave his Countrey, and joyn himfelf with the Barbarians, whose Lives were like to those of wild Beasts. She blaming them all exceedingly, that they preferred their private commodity before the good of their Countrey, to which if need required they ought their very lives, they opened to her the whole matter, faying, that what she would impose upon others, she ought not her self to refuse. Being caught with this wile, she long called on the name of Sichaus, her husband, with many tears and great lamentation, then taking three moneths time for the doing of what there was necessity for, fhe made a pile of wood, as though to make a Parentation to Sicheus, and appeale his Ghost before her second marriage. Having killed many Beasts, she ascended the Pile with a Sword in her hand, and turning to the people faid, that now the was going to her Husband, and therewithal killed her felf. 7. Carthage being then re-edified, or inlarged by Dido, and the Colony flie brought thither, about the 2132 year of the World, in the days of Fohat King of Fudah, and Fehu of Israel, three hundred and ten years after the destruction of Troy, ninty seven before the first Olympiad, and one hundred and twenty before the building of Rome, was at first under Monarchical Government; but afterwards rejecting it, indured many hazards and hardfhips, which followed loofe liberty, whereof most are briefly recited by Fustin in his eighteenth book, and those that follow. The (a) Philosopher compareth this Commonwealth with those of the (a) Polit. Cretans and Lacedamonians, saying that it was mixed of Arifotracy and Policy, as he lib. 2 cap. 9. calleth it. (b) Polybius faith it was composed of Kingly, Aristocratical, and Democratical Governments, and (c) Ifocrates maketh it Oligarchical at home, and in War (b) Lib. 16. Monarchical. As two Kings at Lacedamon had the first rank of Magistracy with (1) in Nicele equal power, so at Carthage two persons, by them called Sufferes, and by Ari on it dis flotle, and Polybius, and Corn. Nepos, termed Kings, yet only nominal of As the Ginese 1636. former were for life, so these were but Annual (in which respect (d) Livie compareth them with the Confuls of Rome) and their dignity being hereditary, those (d) Lib. 10, were yearly elected out of any noble Families. Such were especially preferred as were accounted most eminent for Virtue, and able to defray the charges of their place. Aristotle commendeth this above the Lacedamonian custom; all but that concerning their wealth, imputing it as an error to the Legislator; who ought another way to have provided for Magistrates, that they might attend publick business without any detriment to themselves, and so be preferred meerly for

8. These Sufferes were more rightly in their own Language called Sophetim. the Hebrew name of those chief Fudges amongst the Ifraelites, who from Folhua to Saul governed their Commonwealth, and the History of whose actions by us called Fudges, hath the same title of Sophetim, for that interpretation which renders it Sophim (i. e. Overseers) at the first fight appeareth less probable. Their Office was to * affemble the Senate, in which doubtlefs they prefided and proposed. They decided causes Criminal, but their power was confined to home, Emminmin nothing appearing of their medling with warlike matters, or having command Defor. Relp. of the Armies. To these Suffetes was added a Senate, which because Aristotle Carthaginites compareth it with that of Lacedamon, may be supposed elective out of the best fort and most antient men, and the Senators it's likely injoyed the dignity all their lives. How many they were in number doth not appear; but that herein this Senate exceeded the other of Lacedamon, is to be gathered from * Fustin, * Liv. 19. who speaketh of one hundred persons that out of it were chosen for Judges, to take account of the actions of all Generals at their return from the Wars. This Senate, as that at Rome, was the chief member, and as the Soul of the State, wherein the Suffetes propounding, as the Confuls there, all things of moment were brought to it: especially what concerned those great things of Empire: viz.Peace, War, and Leagues. The Sufferes deliberating with the Senate, if it was unanimous, and they refolved the fame thing, their Decree was Law to the whole State; but if the Senate and Suffetes disagreed, then was the matter referred to the People. 9. In the Concio or Assembly of the People, any one of the rabble might speak his mind freely, and without danger contradict the Magistrates. The People's Decree concerning any thing referred, was taken for the ultimate determination of the whole and State, and being once paffed was fo binding, that it was not lawful to offer any thing against it, which Aristotle reprehendeth (and well may he) as too Popular, and too much declining from the best form of a Commonwealth, affirming this Constitution to have no place in the best modelled States. But * Polybius differting from the Philosopher, where the compareth * quo [1974] the Carthaginian with the Laconick and Roman Commonwealths, sheweth that it was poiled of the three kinds of Government, that the Suffetes were as Kings, the Senate held the place of Optimates or Nobility, and the People a convenient Power. Yet he addeth, that when Hannibal made War upon the Romans, (which happened ten years after the death of Aristotle,) the State of Carthage declined from its antient and best condition, the People having assumed more than formerly, when the Raman Senate's authority was yet whole. This he thinketh to him. have much incommodated their affairs, and brought great advantage to the Romans. But what authority the People had during the best and most antient

State, he no where in those Books and fragments that are remaining, declareth. Emmius thinketh that it confifted in electing Magistrates, making Laws, Leagues, Peace, and War; in appointing and ordering Negotiations, Customs, Tributes, and fuch like things, which concerned the generality, and respected the profit of the multitude. But some of these things seem rather to have fallen under the confideration of the Kings and Senate; however the diforders that followed, as in all other fuch Governments, will fatisfie the Reader in his opinion of the excellency of Monarchy.

Council of

CHAP II.

10. Besides the Senate there was a Council of one hundred and four men, whereof Aristotle only informeth us, and which, according to the round number, from him we may call the Centumvirate. They had power to chuse five men out of their Body, who had very large and great authority; Both these forts of Magiftrates retained their power longer than any other, enjoying it both before and after they came to be of the five, which thing was plainly Oligarchical. But in that they were not chosen by lot, but by the Suffrages of the People, and ferved without Wages; in that they alone took cognifance of, and judged controverfies, and publick actions, none being remitted to others, as the cuftom was at Lacedemon, this he taketh notice to be Aristocratical. He compareth the power of the Centumvirate with that of the Ephori at Sparta, whereby he teacheth us, that the power of judging lay in it. And as the Ephori were (according to him) Conservators of Popular Liberty at Syarta, protecting the Plebeians a. gainst the power of the great ones, so it is likely, from these words of Aristotle, that those one hundred men at Carthage were the keepers of the Popularity. Herein he preferreth them before the Ephori, that they were not chosen out of the Rabble, but the better fort of Citizens, wherein lay also a piece of Aristocracy; for mean persons being preferred to greatest places, do much hurt a Commonwealth, faith he, and have already endamaged that of the Lacedemonians. Amongst civil Officers there were some that made inspection into the manners of the Citizens, as Corn. Nepos telleth us in the life of Amilear, the Father of famous Hannibal, from whom they removed a beautiful young man called Afdrubal, because he was reported to be more familiar with him, than modesty required. There was also a Pratorship which had authority to look to the Customs and Tributes, and also to prefer Laws, as appeareth by Hannibal, who being chosen into this Office, not only reformed the Customers, but also taking notice of the corruption of Judges, procured a Law for them to be chosen every year. But whether there were more than one of these Officers, is not to be discovered from antient Writers.

Faults in the

11. Besides the Faults before mentioned, Aristotle reprehendeth the Custom of chusing the Suffetes for their riches, which openeth a door to avarice and indirect practices thence arising. He also noteth it as a fault, that one and the fame man had several Offices, which yet they esteemed as a great honour. One detestable practice they used of old, to facrifize to their Gods humane Sacrifices, when any affliction or disafter fell upon them, and even their own Son, as Plato witneffeth, which custom they feem to have brought with them out of Palastine, every year fending thither fuch kind of Prefents unto Hercules, as we find in Pliny. Another abfurd Law they had, which forbad any Citizens to learn the Lib. 30. 60, 50 Greek Language, left they should hold intelligence with the Enemy, because one Suniator had so done with one Dionysius the elder, as Fustin writeth. This in deed was laudable, that this City abhominated Drunkenness, and severely prohibited Wine as much as to be tafted in the Camp, as Plato recordeth in his Laws. This also Aristotle commendeth, that, for an incouragement to warfare, they had a Law which gave liberty to a Soldier to wear fo many Rings as he

The disposition had served times in the Field. The People were by their natural constitutions on of the peo morose and surly, obedient to their Magistrates, tyrannical towards their Subjects, most dejected in time of fear, and cruel in anger, resolute in their defigns, notwithstanding all force of flattery, and so infamous for their breach of faith. that the Punick faith or trust became a Proverb. Sect. 2. Peloponnesian War the three hundred and twenty third year of the City, fifty years after the passage of Xerxes into Greece, and consequently as many from the Victory which Gelon got over them; a gross mistake. (b) fustin out of Trogus, ha-(b) Lib. 18. ving first related their impious custom of pleasing their gods by humane Sacrifices, addeth, that the divine powers being therewith displeased or averse to them, when they had long unhappily made War in Sicily, they translated it into Sardinia, and there losing the greatest part of their Army, received a grievous overthrow, whereupon they banished Mazeus their General, (by whom they had conquered a great part of Sicily, and done great matters against the Africans) with that part of the Army which remained. The Army taking this in great disdain, sent to the City to defire a repealing of the Act of banishment, and threatned by force to refeind it in case they were thereto constrained by a denyal of their sute. Their mesfage being despised, they belieged the City, and after a few days took it. Mazeus calling the People together, complained of the injury, excused the necessisty of the War, and inveighed against the contempt of his Victories. He faid he would pardon all, but such as had been authors of the injurious Exile of their fellow-Citizens; and accordingly putting ten of the Senators to death, he restored the City to its Laws. Not long after being accused of an intention to make himfelf absolute, he was punished both for his paricide committed against his Country, and his own Son (as fuftin termeth it) whom being a Prieft, he had crucified, for refusing to come to him before he had finished his superstitious rites, and when he came appeared in his purple and other ornaments, which Mazaus thought unsuitable with the condition of him his Father. Him succeeded Mago, by whose industry the wealth, dominion, and reputation of the Carthaginians, for matters of War, increased. 13. Mago being the first, who by ordaining military discipline, had laid the foundation of Empire, and added to the strength of the City, as well by in-Justine lib. 19, troducing Virtue as the Art of War, left two Sons behind him, Afdrubal and Amilear, who by treading in his paths, fucceeded as well to the greatness as the Patrimony of their Father. Under their conduct the State made War in Sardinia, and fought against the Africans, who demanded Tribute for the ground on which Carthage stood, which also at length they constrained the Carthaginians to pay. Aldrubal died of his wounds in Sardinia, whose death was ennobled by publick mourning, eleven Dictatorships, as Fustin calleth them (by which feemeth to be understood no other than fo many times fending out, or commissionating as General, with full power in the field, yet so as to be under the commands of the State) and four Triumphs: and the Enemies of Carthage took heart, as if with the Captain its force and power was also dead. The Inhabitants of Sicily then vexed with the continual injuries of the Carthaginians, betook themselves to Leonidas the brother of the King of Sparta, and a great war insued, wherein both parties long struggled with various Fortune. At this time came Ambassadors from Darius (the Son of Hystaspes) King of Persia, commanding the Carthaginians to forbear offering humane Sacrifices, and eating mans flesh, requiring them to burn their dead rather than to bury them, and demanding affiftance against the Greeks, with whom he was about to ingage in War. They denied to afford any fuccours because message to the of their continual Wars with their neighbours; but obeyed him in the rest. carbeginism. left they should seem too stubborn, saith fustin, yet that they stood not to their word, the testimonies of Plato, Diodorus, and Pliny, do certifie. Whilst these things passed, Amilear was slain in the War of Sicily, leaving three Sons: Amileo, Hanno, and Gifgo. Afdrubal also left so many, viz. Annibal. * Margin ad Aldrubal, and Sappho. Of thele, Annibal is mistaken for Annibal the great, Londini, wo

The Annotator wondreth what came into Fustin's print 13-mind to make Annibal (the great) the son of Marubal, and well he might, if any fuch thing had been intended; he also referreth the Reader to the life of Timoleon, to find that Mago killed himself, and was after his death nailed to a cross, because he fought unprosperously in Sicily, which Plutarch intendeth of another person. Of this gross mistake of one (whoseverhe was) that took upon him to inform beginners, Students in History are to take notice and 14. With Amilear perished one hundred and fifty thousand Carthaginians; the Captives that remained of his Army, filled all the Cities of the Island, and the State of Carthage was constrained to beg peace, having, as some say, made this War at the instance of Xerxes, that thereby the Greeks in Sicily might be diverted from helping their Friends. The Syraculians now gladly refumed their liberty; yet not therewith content, that they might the more secure it, they freed also many other Cities of Sicily, from Tyranni and forrein Garrisons. But not long after they fell into a most pernicious Sedition. For excluding those from honours whom Gelon had brought will, Polit. into Syracuse for the establishment of his own interest, they themselves bearing 1.5.63. all Offices of Magistracy, and governing the Commonwealth, though they took not away from the other the freedom of the City, the lately made Denizons not enduring it, conspired together, being in number seven thousand of ten thousand which Gelon had brought in. Three years after liberty recovered, they sudainly fell upon the two parts of the City: the Island 3rd Acradina. The natural Inhabitants overpowering them in numbers, belieged them close, and overthrowing them in a Sea fight, at length constrained them to acquiesce in the present state of things, or else quit the City, after the Sedition and tumult had endured two years. In the mean time by the conduct of Ducetius a Sicilian, those planters that Hiero had placed in Catana, were thence ejected, and the old Inhabitants reftored to the place, whom he had cast out: now also

CHAP. IH.

16. That form of a Commonwealth was now established at Syracuse, which Aristotle properly calleth Policy, mixed of Oligarchy and Democracy; which, how dangerous it was, appeared shortly. For, after some years, the State continuing in this form, and the number of Citizens increasing, one Tyndarides, an eminent man, and very rich, egged on by his ambition, brought it into great danger. For binding to him the indigent rabble by his gifts, and using them as a Guard, he manifeltly pressed towards the Soveraignty, but by the Union of those who were in greatest grace with the people, he was repressed, and when the beggerly fort would needs undertake his protection, killed in a tumult. When others not at all deterred by this example afpired after fuch power as threatned liberty, the people for to humble those that carried their heads highest, in imitation of the Athenians brought in the use of the Petalisin. As they by their Ostracism removed such Citizens for ten years, who for their reputation and interest were dangerous to the freedom of the City, so the Syracusians by the Petalism removed such like for five years. This kind of banishment, without loss of honour, or fortune, was called in Greek Petalismos, because his name whom any one would have banished was written in a leaf of an Olive, according to * Diodorus, both which in the same language ann. 2.

the whole Island was restored to its antient condition, the Exiles being repossessed, and new comers driven out, who fetled themselves at Messana, the utmost part of the

Sect. 2. were fignified by the word Petalos. But this conflictation, as the other at Athens, could not long continue. For those eminent persons who were most fit for state Affairs, for fear thereof by little and little withdrew themselves from publick business to a private life. Hereby the Commonwealth fell into the hands of bold, rash, unskilful, and the naughtiest fort of men, whence grievous incommodities and dangers followed. By these things the people were moved to abrogate the font.

Law of Petalism, and the better fort returned to the care of the Commonwealth, after which it remained in quietness for some time, but again relapsed, as necessarily it must, from the infirmity of its Antimonarchical Government.

17. Abroad the Syracustans had War with the Tuscans in Italy; with Ducetius Captain of the Siculi, as also the Agrigentines, Trinacrians, Leontines, and Agestans in Sicily, wherein most commonly they had the better, and either fully brought under, or bound to them by Leagues, most of the Cities in the Island. Leontium a most flourishing Town was utterly destroyed when it now gaped after the Empire of Sicily, the principal Citizens being removed to Straufe, and the multitude driven into Exile. Out of these motions they fell into the Athenian War in the first year of the ninty first Olympiad, concerning which we have already sufficiently spoken. Syracule was so exhausted therein with expences and flaughters, that upon the brink of Ruin it was meerly preserved by the wifdom and valour of Gylippus, a stranger of Sparta; and not only preserved, but made victorious to admiration, and inabled to return to the Athenians fo great overthrows by Land and Sea. This War which begun in the fiftieth year after the recovery of their Liberty (by means of the Egeffant, who craved aid of A thens against them and the Selinuntians) lasted not fully three years, leaving a fufficient warning to all, of the vicifitude of human affairs, and shewing, that they who gape after Dominion, and are busie to inlarge their bounds, being carried out by the force of ambition rather than reason, often fall into a necessity of defending their own Estate, and sometimes lose all.

18. The multitude grown exceeding high upon this fuccess, would not reft fatisfied with its former privileges, but so ordered the matter, that the temper of this Commonwealth more and more degenerated. Diocles a man of principal Lib. 2.1294. note, who had perfuaded them to put to death Nicias and Demosthenes the A. Died. thenian Generals, being of a most severe and rigid disposition, eloquent tongue, A. M. 3593. and great reputation for wifdom, perfwaded the people to change the Common of wealth, and elect Magiftrares by lot, whereas formerly they were left to the control of the Common of the new modelled admillion was given to the meanest and unfittest Person to Govern, which ill agreeth with the fame of Diocles his wisdom. Some think that the multitude having got a promise from the great ones in the late danger, in case they would well demean themselves, now wrested this Law from them, that Diocles perswaded the Nobility, and the better fort to give way to the time for avoiding fome greater missiner, and then he with his Collegues having power from the whole State, as Diodorus addeth, form'd this new Commonwealth with convenient Laws, whereby this liberty was bounded, and other things ordered as they thought, but falfly, made for publick good. This Diocles was in punishment of vice rigid, and inexorable, and yet most just in what was deserved by any man. His Laws were fo well thought of by the vulgar, that many Cities of Sicily received them on their own accord, the whole praise of the invention being given to him, though he had others joyned with him in the work, that were excellent for Wisdom and Prudence. In after-times one Cephalus under Timoleon, and Polydorus under Hieron, were deputed to the making of Laws, but neither of them were accounted Legislators, but both Commentators upon him, who in the form of his Speech was something short and obscure. 19. Diocles amongst other Laws ordained, that it should be Capital for any Diod ad Olympia man to come into the Forum, or place where the people was wont to meet, with 91, 450, 44 his Arms, and that neither the plea of ignorance nor any other excuse should stand him in flead that so offended. Afterwards it hapned that he himself having iffued out against the Enemy who made incursions, as he returned with his Sword, heard of a tumult in the Forum, and so went directly thither, not thinking what he had about him. Being for this reprehended by a private man as breaking his own Laws, he cried out he would do no fuch matter, but establish them with his Blood, and therewithal killed himfelf. In the Commonwealth thus new modelled by him, 'tis uncertain what order there was, or what method was observed in acting. There was a Senate consisting of fix hundred men, as we understand from Diodorus; but the fame of it was very obscure, and the Sect. 2: Power, as may be gathered, exceeding fmall, which maketh it be fo feldom mentioned. The Multitude was fole Lord of all, and daily meeting together created the chief Magistrates, disposed of the Militia, placing, and displacing Officers therein, decreed War, made Peace, contracted Leagues and Alliances, exercifed Power as to life or death, granted Indemnity, banifled, and recalled at their pleasure. Other things of lefter moment were left to Magistrates, which were various, as in other popular Commonwealths. They were annual; as the Generals abroad, two, three, four, or more, as the people pleafed; the General at home who was over the Militia of the City in time of Peace, and had great authority. Others were chosen by lot, as Judges, Treasurers, Cenfors, and such like, amongst which were also those that oversaw the matters at Sea, the City having an excellent fite for trading. But things could not thus long frand, the Government being fuch, and wherein the wifeft fort could do leaft, and the foolith unexperienced rabble was most powerful, though having no skill in State Affairs they little minded what they did, and only aimed at their private advantage. Hereby they were eafily led afide by one, who cunningly, though underhand, wrought his own defigns. For scarcely were eight years passed over from the overthrow of the Athenians, when Dionysius the Son of Hermocrates, a man of a subtile Head, and deep diffimulation, so fooled the multitude, as obtaining from it a Guard for his Person, he invaded the Tyranny in the fourth year of the ninty third Olympiad, the very same that the City, of Athens was yielded up to Lyfander. How this was effected must more particularly be related, to let the Reader behold the danger of Antimonarchical Government, and the happiness of a People under that of hereditary Kings.

20. The Citizens of Egesta (who had entred into League with Athens against the Syracusians, and been cause of the Athenian War, by reason of the controversie betwixt the Selinuntians and them about some Grounds) were in great fear after the overthrow of their Friends to be called to account, and quitted those Grounds for which they had contested. But their adversaries not resting satisfied with the restitution of these Territories, but seizing also upon part of the adjoyning Region, they sent to Carthage for help, giving up themselves into their protection. The Carthaginians were very desirous to be masters of this City, so fit for their purpose of Conquering Sicily, but on the other hand they stood in fear of the Syracufians, who had so lately grapled with, and worsted the Power of Athens. Yet their Ambition prevailing, they promised them aid, which they committed to the care of Hannibal, then one of their principal Magistrates, giving him Commission to make War if the case should so require. After the Jointh death of Amilear the Affairs of Carthage had been managed by his, and his Brothers Sons, being fix in number, under whose conduct War was made upon the Moors and Numidians, and the Africans were also constrained to remit the Tribute which had been formerly paid them for the fite of the City. Now it was, that this great and numerous Family being dangerous to the liberty of the City, by doing and judging all things, one hundred Judges were chofen from amongst the Senators, who received an account from the Generals at their return from the War, that by this awe they might fo manage Affairs abroad, as having an Eye upon Juffice, and the Laws at home. To Amilea in Sveily succeeded his Son Amilea, who having good fuccess in the War, both by Land and Sea, on a sudden lost his Army by the force of Pestilence, for which disaster there was a sad mourning at Carthage (asit is largely described by Fustin) and he at his return killed himself. Carringe (13) It is surgery to control by June 2 and the first by his Son Gefco, * Ad Olymph I familial was his Brothers Son, being the Grandson of Amilear by his Son Gefco, * Ad Olymph James 2. or Gifco, * as Diodorus informeth us,

21. Hannibal having an inbred Hatred against all Greeks, and an earnest desire by his own acts to redeem the credit of his Family, was glad of an opportunity A.M. 3395. by in own acts to retect the contract of the contract of gratify his Country, and near upon feventy years after the overthrow, and hear upon feventy years after the overthrow, and seath of his Grand-Father, undertook the Employment. They accordingly opposing it, the Syracusians decreed to hold them as Allies and Confederates, and also to be at Peace with the Carthaginians; but the two concerned Cities falling upon each other, both Syracufe and Carthage was thereby drawn into the Quarrel. Hamibal then having both in Spain and Africk made great pre-id and 4-parations, the next year landed at Lilphaum the most Southern Cape of Sicily towards Africk, and fetting upon the Selinuntians at unawares with a vaft Army, took their City in the tenth day of the Siege, wherein he made Captive feven thousand persons, fixteen thousand being slain, and two thousand and fix bundred escaped to Agrigentum. He permitted Empedion and his kindred to peoby the Cartha ple it anew, under condition of paying Tribute to Carthage. This was the condition of Selinuns, after it had flood two hundred and fourty two years from its first founding by the Megarians, who being descended from Megara in Greece first came into Sicily under conduct of Lamis, and built a Town upon the River Pantacius, called Trotilus. Thence Lamis departing with fome of his Colony went to the Leontines and Chalcidians, with whom having lived some time he was driven out by them, and planting some Inhabitants in Thapfus, after his death they left the place, and under the conduct of Hyblon the Sicilian King, who betrayed the Countrey, inhabited Megara, and were called Hyblaans. After two hundred and fourty five years they were driven hence by Gelon of Syracuse, but one hundred and fourty five years before this, they fent out a Colony with Pammilaus, which built Selinuns.

22. Hannibal from Selinus marched to Himera, having a particular grudge against that place for his Grand-father's death. Falling on it with all his might, he was repulsed for a little time by the resolute valour of the Inhabitants, but the Wall being beaten down with his Engines, he shortly took it. Many Women and Children had withdrawn themselves out of the City; of those men which he took he carried up three thousand to the Hill where his Grandfather had been slain, and there killed them, being before used with all kinds of indignities; then rafed he the City which had been inhabited two hundred and fourty years, and dismissing his Mercenaries and Subjects of Sicily departed home, where he was received with greatest expressions of Honour and affection for having done in three moneths what other Captains would have required far larger time to effect. After his departure, Hermocrates the Syracusian (who having been sent as General to the asfistance of the Lacedamonians, was condemned to banishment in his absence, through the malice of his Enemies) returned with a confiderable Force into Sicily, and to ingratiate himfelf with his Country-men, repeopled Selinus, and fell upon the Tributaries of Carthage. The more still to indear himself, he took up the Bones of those Syracusans that fell at Himera, and in a cariage sent them to the City, Olymp, 93.22.1. well knowing, that this would procure as love to him, fo envy and hatred to Diaeles his main adversary, who having been the Captain of the Slain, had taken no care for their Burial. Diocles much opposed their publick Sepulture, but the People resolutly decreed it, then banished him, and yet they recalled not Hermocrates, being jealous left he should improve his power and abilities to the making of himself absolute. He then being in despair of returning by fair means, attempted to do it by force, and getting in to the City, was among this complices killed by the multitude.

23. In the second year of the ninty third Olympiad, the Syracissians sent to A. M. 3558. Carthage to complain of the late War, and to desire that for the time to come ol 93 and they would forbear all hostility, to which they returned an ambiguous answer, V. C. 347 and made all possible provision for an Army, wherewith to subdue the whole Island. Before they transported any Forces they fent a Colony thither, which at the hot Waters built a City, and called it Therme. The year following they ordered Hannibal to go over as General, who excufing himself by reason of his Age, they joyned with him Imileo the Son of Hanno, one of the same Family. These two Generals then made Levies throughout Africk, hired Soldiers out of Spain, the Islands Baleares, and Italy; and got together an Army of twelve hundred thoufand men according to Timeus, but after Ephorus his reckoning three hundred thousand. As they were passing over, the Syracustans met them, and sunk fifteen of their Veffels, but with the rest Hannibal passed safe over, and fell upon the rich and stately City of Agrigentum, which contained two hundred thousand Persons. The Agrigentines wanted not affishance from their Friends, all the Greek Cities being deeply concerned in their welfare, and the Syracufians gave the beliegers a confiderable defeat, who demolishing the Tombs and Monuments the better to get to the Walls, had thereby pulled down a Peftilence upon themfelves, faith Diodorus, wherein Hannibal died. But Imileo (or Imilear) thereby not diffecuraged, continued the Siege, expiating the offence, as he thought, by facrifizing a Boy to Saturn, and drowning a company of Priefts in the Sea as an offering to Neptune. His Soldiers mutinying for Provisions, hesupplied, by taking of the Ships which loaded with necessaries were sent from Syracuse to the belieged. Hereby he starved them within, and constrained them to quit and derigen the City, being guarded to Gela by armed men. Imilear found extraordinary Sect 2, rich plunder in it, whereof some rarities he sent to Carthage, amongst which was Phalaris his Bull, though Timeus the Historian carping at all others, by denying that there was ever any fuch thing, is justly centured by Diodorus. For Scipio A. fricanus the younger, two hundred and fixty years after, having destroyed Carthage, restored this Engine to the Agrigentines, with whom it was yet remaining when Diodorus wrote his Hiftory.

24. Imilear having, after a Siege of eight months, thus maftered Agrigentum, a little before the Winter folftice, destroyed it not presently, that therein he might quarter his Soldiers that Winter. All the Island was ftruck with great fear upon report of what had hapned; fome of the Sicilians departed to Syracufe, and others transported their wives and children with their wealth into Iraly. The Agrigentines being got fafe to Syracuse, accused their Captains, as having betrayed their Country, and the Syracufians were also blamed by the rest for having chosen such Generals, as by their dishonesty had brought Sicily into extreme danger. A meeting being had at Syracuse, and great sear of a War possessing all men's minds, none dared to speak one word, or give any advice. All sticking at the matter, at length stood up Dionysius the Son of Hirmocrates, and accusing the Captains of having betrayed Agricentum, earnestly moved the People to punish them forthwith, and not stay the time prefixed by Law. For this unlawful and seditious motion, the Magistrates fined him; but one Philistis a wealthy man, who afterwards wrote his History, bade him proceed, promiting to pay his fine, though it were a whole day together. Animated hereby he proceeded urging that the Captains had been corrupted to betray the interest of Sicily, and accusing others of the better fort of Citizens as affecting Oligarchy. He therefore moved that new Officers might be created, fuch as were not eminent for power, but good will towards the People, for that the other usurping dominion despised the common fort, and made their own markets out of the publick; whereas those being of lower fortunes, by a consciousness of their own weakness could not attempt such a matter. 25. Having discoursed these things fitly to the humour of the multitude, and his own defign, he made no small impression in the minds of the Vulgar, who having had the fidelity of the Captains in question before, gave credence to these flanders, and deposing them, made new, amongst which was Dianyllus, having got much credit for his valour against the Carthaginians. The foundation thus laid, he beat his head all manner of ways how to accomplish his device, and refolved if poffible to get his Colleagues removed. For this purpose he never would meet in council with them, giving out they hatched clandeftine defigns a gainst the State, and seeing the Citizens much affrighted at an approaching War, procured the Exiles to be called home, hoping that they being obnoxious to him, and defirous of innovation, would be fit for his purpole, taking great delight in feeing their Enemies killed, and their goods fold, their own Estates being restored to them. At this time it hapned that a Sedition falling out in Gela, he had an opportunity to lead thither two thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse, where procuring their principal men to be put to death; and their Estates confilcated, he thereby much ingratiated himfelf with the multitude and Soldiers. At his return he found the People just departing from the shows of the Theatre, which asking him news, he faid he knew none, but that their Governours were greater Enemies to the State than the Carthaginians, by whose flatteries they now kept holy-day, and who fleecing the Commonwealth, cheated the Soldiers of their wages. Now was an innumerable Army hovering upon the borders, and ready to invade, which they not at all regarded. This he understood a little before, but now fully, having received a meffage from Imileo that defired his connivance. Wherefore for his part he would lay down his Office, not induring that others making merchandile of the Commonwealth, he alone should rogether with the Citizens, bear the burthen, and undergo the danger; and yet allo be accounted as treacherous as the reft. For this night every man in gireat fear went home to his houfe. The next day the called them together, and loading his Colleagues with great invectives, to fittred the multitude, that fome beginning to cry The milery of our he was to be made Dictator, for that they had formerly had experience how reported editions of the conduct of a fingle Person was, by the example of Gelon his Victorial and here ry over Amilear; the multitude out of hand created him General with full power. Then to bind fast the Soldiers to him, he procured a Decree for double pay, alleging that it would make them more valiant in that time of danger, and bidding

. 26. The wifer fort had all along fufficiently understood whither these actions tended, but the multitude stopped their ears against all accusations, as proceeding from the malice of the great ones. But now upon further confideration they began to suspect him, and repent they had put the power out of their own hands, which he being aware of, left the discontent should so seize upon the generality as thereby to procure him any let or hindrance in the full compleating of his defign, he drew out the Army to Leontium, which now was used as a Fortress or Garrison, and there shutting himself close up, pretended a great conformacy against his life. The day following he called the multimade together, and, alleging many probable reasons to perswade them to believe the danger, obtained to have fix hundred men as a guard for his person, which he should chuse out where he pleafed. This number he increafed to one thousand, picked out, and confifting of fuch as were desperate in fortune, and thereupon backed with stomach and resolution. He called the Mercenaries, and ingaged them to him with good words; then new modelling the Army, gave such commands therein as he knew would best serve his own turn : he gave free admission to all Exiles and malefactors, knowing fuch would be effectual for all his purposes. Having thus in imitation of Pififiratus got him a guard, and made-himfelf Tyrant, at his return to Syracuse he openly shewed himself such, placing his Tent in the Arcenal. The People murmured in vain, being befet with strangers and mercenaries at home, and in continual fear of a War hanging over them from abroad. To establish himself he took to wife the daughter of Hermocrates, who did fuch service against the Athenians, and was slain in attempting to seize on the City: he also gave his own fifter in marriage to his wives Brother, thinking it his interest to be allied to so great a Family. Then affembling the A.M. 3599. People, by his devices he procured Daphneus and Demarchus the most potent of his of 93: 28.34. Adversaries to be put to death; and so from a Scribe and a man of mean condition, Danis Manks. he became Master of the greatest Greek City, continuing such for thirty eight years, 18.

27. Imilcar having wintred in Agrigentum, at Spring-time razed the City, and then fell upon Gela. The Inhabitants betook themselves to Dionysus for help; but his endeavours not well fucceeding, they were forced to quit the Town, and leave it also to the disposal of the Enemy. Dionysius made Idimad and the Citizens of Camerina to do the same, possessing them with a fear of the Carthaginians, fo that departing thence in hafte, some with their Gold and Silver, others with their Wives and Children only, and the ways being full of both fexes and ages, who miferably thunned fervitude by Exile, the Syraculian Horfemen pitied them exceedingly, and accounting this but a fetch of their Tyrant, to make himself Master of the place, conspired how they might kill him in the way, and the rather, because they had observed how remiss, or rather induffroully treacherous, he had been in the relief of Gela. He keeping the Mercenaries close to him, they could not execute, this defign, but rode fast to Syracule, where being caffly admitted, they rifled his Palace, and used his Wife so harshy that the died. They were secure of him as at a great distance from them; he conjectured the same, and in post-haste coming to Syracuse, set fire on one of the gates, and so got in. Then slaughtered he such of them as Diappointed he could light of, as also of those Citizens whom he knew to be most averse to him, some he slew, and others he expelled the Town. Scarcely were things settled, when a message came from Initian, inviting the Sysaulans, though conquered, unto Peace. Diomysia, most gladly imbraced the offer, so that is was made upon these terms: The Carthaginians, were to have subject to them, besides their old Tributaries and Colonies, the Sicani, Selinuntians, Agrigentines, and Himerians, and allo the Geleans, and Camerinaans, who might inhabit their Towns unwalled, but be tributary to Carthage. The Leonines, Mellenians, and all Scillians, swepe to be free and the Syrauffair libbest, to Dionylius. All thips taken on both fides were to be reftored. These things confirmed, Imilear passed over into Africk, having loft half of his Army by the Plaguer, which so raged also in Africk, that great multitudes both of the Carthagingue, and their Associates fell thereby.

28. Dionysius knowing that the gracustans now eased of the War, would bufie their heads how to recover their liberty, to prevent fuch a defign, fortified that part of the City called the Island, which he caused to be inhabited with his own confidents: he also divided the publick grounds to such as he thought fit, and admitted strangers to equal privileges, with the Citizens. Having thus as he thought secured his estate, he resolved to march against such Sivilians as he thought most affifted the Carthaginians, and was about to beliege Erbefa, when the Citizens of Sect. 2 Syracuse now armed, considering what an opportunity was put into their hands, and repenting they had not affifted the Horsemen in their revolt, resolved to declare for their liberty. The attempt generally took, the Citizens stood upon their defence, and the Tyrant was belieged, for whose head a great sum of money was offered. He was much cast down, and thought to relign his power, according as forme advised him; but Philistus turned his mind, and made him resolve to venture all rather than do it. Bethinking himself how he might circumvent the Citizens, he fent to them, pretending a willingness to quit all, if they would but permit him to carry away his goods; and at the same time he dispatched a message to the Campanians (mercenary Soldiers of Campania in Italy) offering them large rewards if they would fland by him. The Syracufians confented he should depart with five ships, and then, as if their liberty was fully recovered, grew secure, remiss, and idle, disbanding some of their men, neglecting their guards, and taking their pleasure in the fields: The Campanians allured by his promises broke in to him, some Troops of Mercenaries also came to his affistance, with which he fet upon the Towns men, and easily putting them to flight recovered his power. He hindred his men from killing, and a great number flying to Etna, he sent to them, offering them pardon, which some imbraced, and others refused to venture themselves upon it.

CHAP. III.

29. When he had well re-fetled himself, he made War upon several Towns in Sicily, some of which he took, and having an eye upon the Carthaginians, strongly fortified his City of Syracuse. He resolved with himself to make War upon them, hoping that all those Towns which in time of Peace willingly submitted to their yoak, would now revolt to him. Understanding that in the Athenian War a line had been drawn before Syracuse, from Sea to Sea, and thereby access into the Country cut off, with admirable celerity he raised a wall to pictent this for the time to come, labouring himself amongst the workmen, to cause them the more chearfully to undergo the toil: Then did he make extraordinary provisions of all forts of Arms, compleatly furnished himfelf with shipping, and hired Soldiers from all parts. Thus provided, he caused all the goods of the Carthaginian Merchants, and others dwelling there, to be seized by the multitude of the Syracufians, to whom now he carried himself more mildly, being very ready to begin the War; especially upon so profitable terms. Other Sicilian Towns followed his example, out of hatred to the Car-piod ad Civil thaginians for their cruelty, of whom such as were amongst them they unmer- 95. an. 3, 4 cifully handled in way of requital, which taught that State to deal more favourably afterwards with fuch as they took, in remembrance of the viciflitude of humane affairs. Then dispatched he a messenger to Carthage, to denounce War from the people of Syracufe, except they would fet at liberty all the Greek Cities of Sicily. They were much struck therewith, being exceedingly spent with Pestilence, but refused to do it, and as they might, made provision for refistance. Dionysius besieged Motya one of their Colonies, and chief Fortress for War. Upon his ships Imileo, as yet not sufficiently provided, made an attempt, and beating up the Camp presently retired again; so that Dionysius became Master of the Town.

30. Ere he had taken Motya he belieged Ægesta, the Inhabitants whereof them ad Olympic would not betray their truft, and made excursions into the Territories of their 95, ann. 1. Friends. But the Spring following the Carthaginians having created Imileo King, fent him over with a vast Army, wherewith he first worsted Leptines, whom Dionysius had commanded to attend his motions; then took Eryx, and presently recovered Motya. He had Panormus betrayed to him: he took A.M. 3609. Lipara, and after that Meffana with his ships, the Inhabitants having sent their olymp. 96.21.1. Forces out of the Town to meet his Land Army. Leptines according to order made after as falt as he could, and attacking the Enemies Fleet. at first sunk diverse Vessels; but when he was now almost incompassed with Mago's ships which were in number five hundred, not able to fight at such disadvantage, he was forced to fly out into the Main, and in his flight loft one hundred Veffels. Dionysius kept on his march, intending to fight Imileo; but was stopped by the intercession of his friends, who feared lest in his absence Mago might with his whole Fleet set upon Syracuse, and take it. He therefore returned to the City, and dispatched away Messengers into Greece and Italy for aid.

31. Mago by Sea with two hundred ships, and Imilear by Land with thirty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse, besieged Syracuse, who for that the Citizens refused to give battel, wasted their grounds for thirty days, and after that took the Suburbs of that part of the City called Acradina. His Army was taken with a fudden pannick fear, and feized by a fore difease; yet notwithstanding he drew a line for the Fortification of his Camp, and built three Forts upon the Sea, wherein he put his provisions, and sent into Sardinia and Africk for more. Afterwards Polyxenus father-in-law to Dionysius returning out of Peloponnesus and Italy with thirty long ships, and Pharacidas the Lacedamonian, to the affistance of the Syracustans, they took a victualling ship from the Carthaginians. They doing their endeavour to rescue it, the Syracusians drew out their whole Fleet, and ingaging, took the Admiral Gally, and spoyled twenty four Vessels. After this the Carthaginians durft not ftir abroad, and the Syracusians pussed up with this Victory, thought of recovering their former liberty. Dionysius coming in at the Port, called them together, incouraged them in the War, and gave them hopes of finishing it shortly to their satisfaction. Here before his face, one Theodorus in many words exhorted his fellow Citizens to throw off the yoak, and either take the Militia into their own hands according to the Laws, or deliver it up to the Lacedamonian General. But Pharacidas the Lacedamonian, according to his instructions from his superiours (who had now established an Oligarchy whereever they could, agreeable with their own Government and interest, or gave way to the power of a fingle man rather than that of the People) faid openly, that he was fent to help them against the Carthaginians, and not to overthrow the power of Dionysius; so that the people were at so unexpected a thing utterly quelled, murmuring much against the Lacedemonians, who had now twice deceived them in the recovery of their freedom. Dionyfius affrighted hereat, made shew afterwards of great humanity, to gain the affections of the Fruftrated.

32. The Carthaginians were at this time feized with a most grievous Plague, which Diodorus attributeth to their rifling the Temples of Proferpina and Ceres, as the Meritorious cause, and to the unwholsomness of the place beset with Fens, as the effectual means that wrought the diftemper. A grievous disease had formerly fall'n upon the Athenians in the same place. For before A grievous difeate had formerly fair in upon the zomenans in the latter place. And and shaking plague feateth Sun-rife, because of a cold vapour that rose from the Fens, a cold and shaking on the Carther feitzed on the body, then at noon a suffocating heart. So many men being shakes for sufficients. gathered together into one place, the contagion began first with the Africans, who, though they died in great numbers, were at first all buried. Afterwards the number increasing, such as looked to the sick dying also shortly after them, none would venture to come near the infected. But besides want of attendance, no remedy could be had for the evil. For from the stench of the dead, and putrefaction of the Fennish Air, in the beginning of the disease a Catarrh, and then presently an Angina, or swelling of the neck, took the Patient. These were followed by a Fever, pains in the Spina, and numness of the legs, which drew after them a Dyfentery, and Spots over all the body. Some were taken with madnefs, and abolition of memory, who wandring up and down the Camp beat all they met. At length all the endeavours of Phy-ficians were void, through the vehemence of the disease, and suddenness of death, for on the fifth, or at the furthest on the fixth day they died in great torment. Dionysius understanding this sad condition of the besiegers, thought it convenient to fally out upon them, and fent eighty ships to fall on their Navy. The Land Army first arriving took two of their Forts, and diverted them from their ships, which as soon as they saw in danger, they again retired to them; but with little advantage. For the Syracufians boarded and flaughtered them in great numbers, and Dionysius, with his Land Army, fired fourty of their Gallies that rode at Anchor in the Haven of Dafco. The night approaching broke off the fight, and then the Carthaginians fent to Dionysius three hundred Talents, begging leave to depart; which he granted (with exception to all Sicilians and other Mercenaries) being unwilling they should be quite defeated, that through fear of them his Subjects might be the better contained in obedience. After the flight of the Carthaginians, the Sicilians departed home, and all the rest were slain or taken, except the Spaniards, who gathering themselves into a round body, fent to Dionylius to enter into Alliance with him; which he accept-

Then did he make new Leavies, and replanted Messana with its antient Inhabitants the Messenians; but seeing the Lacedemonians his Friends offended with it, he removed them to another place near the Sea, which they called Lyndarides, and wherein they did thrive exceedingly, Conquering and laying feveral places to their demelnes. They feat Heloris to be flege Meffana, whereupon he determined to make War against them; but the Sicilians seizing upon Tauromenium, he first resolved to recover it. He continuing his Siege all Winter, in a dark night got a certain Fort into his Hands, and made way for all his Army into the Town, best his his itans, and many and relifting, from the higher ground, beat back his men, whereof fix undred were slain, and he himself escaped very narrowly, after which the Agrigenties and Messenians for slook him. The them at any year after, he set upon Rhegium on a sudden, burnt the Gates, and set Ladders to the Walls; but was repulfed by the ftrong opposition of the Citizens. By this the Inhabitants of these Sea-Coasts of Italy, seeing how far his coverousness and ambition extended, made a League amongst themselves, and appointed a common Council, both for the refistance of him and the Lucanians, who made War upon them at the same time. 34. Mago was yet in Sicily, and was once overthrown in Battel by Dionylius;

Dionylus with his Mercenaries and Syraculum marched out against him, sending before to the Agrinaus to be in readiness, who thereupon met him, and joyned their Forces with his Army. Mago now in an Enemie's Countrey was fore straightned for Provisions, which made the other refolve to draw out the War in length, and not to try his For-tune quickly by Battel. The Syracustant being earnest for fighting, upon his re-fulal forfook him and departed home. This put him upon a resolution to make free and lift all Slaves, but even then came Ambassadors from Mago to treat of Peace, which he accepted upon this condition, that the Sieilians should be under his authority; and to Mago returned home. After this Diomphus seized on Forced to re-Tauromenium, and then banished the greatest part of the Sicilians from that

The next year but one, being the 3615 year of the World, into which fell part of the third year of the ninty feventh Olympiad, wherein Rome was tak- 4d an 3: en by the Gaules, as some compute, Dionysius once more undertook an expedition against Rheeium. Then Winter drawing on, he made a League with the Lucanian, who after his departure, for a private quarrel betweet them; invaded the Thurians. These sending for aid to the rest of the Italian Cities; would not flay for it, which they might juftly expect according to Covenant, but issuing out against the Enemy, pursued them into their own Territories, who then taking them at advantage cut off many thoulands of them. The rest seeing fome Ships fayl by, cast themselves into the Sea to swim to them, thinking they belonged to Rhegium. But it proved Dionysius his Fleet sent under conduct of his Brother Leptines to aid the Lucanians, yet Leptines took pity of them, and landed them fafe; he also perswaded the Lucanians for a pound of Silver a man

But hereby he loft the favour of his Brother (who hoped to deyour both fides, and make himself master of Italy, when they should have sufficently weakned one another) fo that being displaced, Thearides the other Brother was made Admiral in his flead.

36. Dionysus his mind was still upon Rhegium, to which City he bore mortal hatred, because some years before having sent to them for a Wife, they returned him answer, that their Hangman had a Daughter, which if it pleased him to accept they would give to him. Therefore the Year following he fet Sayl once 1dem ad ann, 4: more against them, who then looking for no mercy in case he should take the ann. 1, 2. Tribute of three hundred Talents, all their Ships, with one hundred Hoftages, and then went against Caulonia, the Inhabitants whereof he removed to Syracuse, razed the Town, and bestowed the Ground upon the Locrians. But his delign was not thus accomplished against them of Rhegium; his resolution was not to dismiss them upon the former Terms, but by taking away their Ships to prevent the bringing in of Provisions by Sea, that he night the more easily starve them in a Siege. Bethinking himself how with any hew of Credit he might break the League, at length hovering yet about the Straights, he defired a supply of Provisions from them, pretending he would shortly return to Syracuse, but he put it off from day to day, excusing himself by his own indisposition, or some other pretext, so that plainly seeing his drift, at length they flatly denied to send him any more Victuals. This he pretending to receive with great indignation as an afront, he laid close Siege to the Town, and battered the Walls. The Inhabitants making one Phyto their General, armed all that could carry Weapons, and making many brave Sallies out upon him, burnt his Engines, and gave him a dangerous Wound with a Lance. 37. After the destruction of Rhegium, Dionysius lying idle at home, applied himself to Poetry, being heretofore much addicted to it. Whilst he lay before them ad ann.3. Rhegium he sent his Brother Thearides to the celebration of the Olympick Games, there to repeat his Verses, which by their baldness drew the auditors into such a diffast, that they risled the Ambassadors Tents. He called together the best Poets from all quarters to judge of his Skill. He also drew over to him Plato the Philosopher, whom at first he used very courteously, but afterwards offended at him for his freedom of Speech, he brought him into the common Cage, and there for five pounds fold him as a Slave. The Philosophers coming over on purpose redeemed him, and then sent him into Greece with this Memento in his Ear, That A Philosopher must either very rarely, or very pleasantly converse with Tyrants. A year or two after this he put out to Sea with fixty Veffels, pretending an intention to clear the Coasts of Pyrates, but wanting Mony, according to his custome towards the Temples of Sicily, he seized upon a Chapel near Argylla, on the Coasts of Italy, which being exceeding rich, he plundered of one thoufand Talents, and got much spoil from the Inhabitants of the place, who oppofed him. Being now furnished with mony, he resolved to renew the War against idem. ad Olympi the Carthaginians, and the next year drew divers of their tributary Cities from 99. as. 1. their Obedience. The Carthaginians made great preparations for defence, raifing a numerous Army, which they committed to the conduct of Mago. He poured out a great number of men both into Sieily and Italy. In the Island, Di-He overthrow. one flus overthrew him in a Battel near Cabala, wherein were flain more than ten eththe carthat thousand of his men, and five thousand taken: he himself with the rest retired to an Hill, where fighting manfully he was flain, and his men fent to Dionyflus

To this he seemed to assent, but alledged they had no power to deliver up the Cities, and therefore defired a Truce for fome time to advise about it. During the Truce, Mago's Son being advanced into his Father's place, trained the Soldiers, and exercised them continually, so as he Sect. 2 brought them into a good condition for fighting, and then at the end of the Truce led them down, and gave battel inftead of receiving Peace. Now were And receiveth the Sicilians fo puffed up by their late Victory, that the other took advantage of their carelesness, and so playd the men, that though Dionysius in his wing, and Leptines his brother in the other, fought most valiantly, and the former prevailed; yet the latter being flain, his party was prefently put to flight, in which great execution was done, the Carthaginians giving no quarter; so as sourcen thousand Sicilians are said to have been slain. The Conquerours departed to thomand Stritten are that the transfer and the confidence for to Dionysius, offering to have the quarret taken up, which he gladly imbraced. Both sides were to retain what they already had, only the Carthaginians took to themselves the City and Territories of Selinus, with fo much ground belonging to Agrigentum as reached to the River Helyeus, and required of Dionysius one thousand Talents. By his importantity he got leave to depart, upon condition that, when Peace was made, Dien thould be recalled, and he return with the condition that, when Peace was made, with him.

41. When the time came, Dionysius earnestly defired the return of Plato, Sect. 2. but would have Dion discontinue a year longer, who earnestly belought Plato to return to Syracuse, for that it was reported that the Prince now was wonderfully taken with Philosophy. He stifly refused to do it, objecting his age, with the breach of Covenants, but being again urged on all fides, a Ship was fent for him, and large Letters were written, wherein the Tyrant promifed to deal with Bion as his Friends should judge reasonable; many of the best fort also in Sicily and his acquaintance were fent to accompany him over. Wherefore Plato once more undertook the Journey, with intention to reconcile Dion to Dionylius, and reduce the Tyrant to a more strict and commendable life. But not long after his arrival Dianifus stopped Dian's Revenues, which Plate taking ill, once prevailed to have the stoppage removed, for otherwise he would be gone; but when the Ships were departed, and Plate's passage thereby prevented, he again sequestred the Estate. After this he fell plainly out with Plate, for holding that Faith was to be kept with Heraclides, who was sufpected to have raifed a Sedition, and put him out of his Court, so as the Philosopher was glad to take up his quarters with the Mercenary Soldiers, amongst whom also Slanders were fored concerning him, so that he fignified his condition to his Frinds at Tarentum in Italy, who with much adoe prevailed with the Tyrant to fend him home fafe. Such was the entertainment of Plate with Dionyfus both Father and Son.

44. But ere long there was an occasion for the recalling of Dion. The Soldiers whom Dionyfius had left in the Castle of Syracuse, being distressed by want of Provisions, resolved over night, that the next day they would yield it up; but that very morning appeared a Fleet fent to their relief, over which Niplius a Neapolitan had the command. The Syracasians issuing forth against it, had the better; but then growing fecure, and giving up themfelves to gormandizing and drunkenness, Nippus thought a good opportunity to be offered for the re-deeming of his Credit, and fell upon the City, sending some over the Wall, who killing the Sentinels, opened the Gates for his Soldiers. The new Captains of the Syracufians being drunk, could take no order for relistance, so as great slaughters were made in every place, the Garrison Soldiers issuing out of the Castle, and great plunder with many Prisoners was carried away. Now the Caite, and great planter with many Prinners was carried away. Now the Citizens faw that no help remained for them, but only in Dion, to whom they fent, begging of him, that laying afide all thoughts of private Injuries, he would now fuccout his difference of the distribution of the private grudges, marched for Syraesis, and was inter by a number of old men, women, and children, who with lattlettable cries implored his help. As the Garrison Soldiers were busie in Plunder, and had set the Houses near the Forum on Fire, he brake in upon them, distributing his men to the several quarters of the City. They fell upon them all in disorder, and burthened with Plunder, killed four thouland; and fo forcing up the rest into the Caftle. cleared all. 45. Dion having atchieved much honour by this act, was made General of corn Negos is the Land Forces; but Heraclides his Emulator still retained his Admiralship. This Dione. vexed him fo, that he gave out fome words that a Commonwealth could not be well governed by many, which procured him great envy, as if he thereby fignifi-ed that he would get the Soveraignty over all. He fluided not how to palliate the matter, but fought to carry on all things by an high hand, and in a way of Force; and either procured Heraelides to be made away, or connived at those whom he formerly hindred from doing it; after which he feized on the goods Phaged into of his Enemies, and diffributed them to his Soldiers. But prefendly again Mo-gret difficult ney failing him, and having none to ruit upon but his Friends, he was confraint-ted either to lofe them or his Soldiers, who being affo difficiated for want of pay, the common people might fafely revile him, affirming that the Tyrant was not to be endured. While he with thoughts of thefe things tormented himfelf, there came to him one Callierates (or Callippus) an Athenian, a most cumning diffembler and irreligious person. He told him, that feeling he was in such danger, both in reference to Soldiers and People, his best way was to have some friend, who counterfeiting himself his Enemy, should hold intelligence with his friend, who counterettain immet his Enemy, Hould hold intelligence with his advertaires, and thereby diffeover all their Plots and Parkitose aptainth him. This part, by Dion's confent, he took upon himself, and under this presence really and indeed practified his defruction, which Dion's Wile and Siffer hearing of, therewith acquainted him; but he regarded them not, giving too much credit to what Callivrates had promified. The women nevertheless brought Callivrates into the Temple of Proferpina, and there made him fovers, that he had not at all plotted against Dion's life; but he midding in Keligion, but being egged on more forward to the accomplishment of his design, but being egged on more forward to the accomplishment of his design, Circumvented hgion, butching egget on the transfer of Zathubas, in to him, whill he was private in his Chamber, who being eafily admitted, for the knowledge his Family had of them, fell upon and pretently bound him: but being unarmide could not kill him, till one Lyco a Syraphus reached them a Sword in at a Window, his Guard hearing, but firring not. against Timocrates, an Author of new and pernicious Laws. Something is therefore according to the nature of our delign to be faid of it. 47. Zaleucus (as he was accounted) a wife, just, and honest man, born of an Eminent Family at Locri, was the modeller of this Commonwealth. Eufebius Ligit ubhum thinketh he flourished about the twenty ninth Olympiad, but Diodorus and several Royal Lucius others making him a Scholar of Pythagoras, who taught in Magna Gracia, reckon fin. him as Contemporary with Charondas the Law-giver of the Thurians, another of Pythagoras his Scholars, and who is famous for the strictness and severity of his Laws, which he is faid to have confirmed by his death in the fame manner as Diocles did his; the same story being told of him. According to their account he must have flourished about the eightieth Olympiad. In the beginning of his Laws, or his Preface to them, this to some appeareth to have been his design; to affect the minds of his people with piety towards God, as the Original of all Right and Justice, the Lord and Governour of Heaven and Earth, as also an hater and punisher of wickedness. Then prescribed he Laws, not very many in number, but most effectual for the defence of Justice, restraining Vice, preserving concord and tranquility in the State, preventing innovations, and for the establishment of themselves; which as long as observed (and they were observed long) preserved the Commonwealth in safety. He thought a few stable and unalterable Laws well obeyed, to be more profitable for a State than an infinite multitude of weak ones, which are easily changed by those that have a mind to innovate, and he concluded, that the speediest way to the ruine of a Commonwealth was by change and innovation. That his opinion was true, the example of Athens abundantly demonstrated, which erring in this point paid dearly for it, as Demofibenes often complaineth; and of Rome alfo, which being infected with this itching diftemper, at length was conftrained to fubmit to the power of one man. It being almost impossible, but that popular Governments should reel and shake, what ever might happen to this inconfiderable City. He commanded his Laws to be strictly observed, and the Magistrate to proceed according to the Letter of them, without giving his own gloss, or pronouncing sentence according to his private sancy. To this purpose is most memorable of all his Laws, that which Demostheres and * Polybius relate concerning one who should afterwards prefer a new Law, ab- * Lib.12.7. rogate any old one, alter any thing in it, or dispute concerning the meaning of it. He was to come into the Council of one thouland men with an halter about his neck, where speaking his mind, if to them he should demonstrate his opinion to be profitable for the State, then was he to be dismissed fafe, and the Law admitted; but if it should appear contrary, then was he to be strangled forthwith in the

48. Zaleucus chose one thousand men out of all the People, in whom he appointed the Supreme Power to refide. It is not to be doubted but he ordained also a Senate of a far less number, by which daily and lesser matters should be dispatched: that there were also certain Magistrates and Courts of Justice, which had orders prescribed to them, we need not question; though we find one only Magistrate in * Polybius, called Cosmopolis, who seemeth either to have presided in the Senate, or the greater Council. It hapned that a naughty man bearing a grudge to his Neighbour that had but one eye, threatned him to strike it out, though with the loss of one of his own. The poor man terrified exceedingly herewith, and judging continual blindness worse than death, with a rope about his neck came into the Council, and asked a Law, that who fever foould frike out his eye that had but one, or deprive him of the use of one who was parblind, should lose both of his own, or be punished with the like calamity and lost that he should bring upon his Neighbour. This as just he easily obtained, and this was the only new Law which in two hundred years time was brought in, the Infolency of innovators being repressed by the severity of the former constitution, as the Orator observeth. Another there was, that a thing controverted should remain in the possession of him whose it was when the fute commenced, till fuch time as a difinitive fentence passed; conwas when the lute commenced, the luch time as a diffinitive relief the part of two men that contending (b) Example, cerning which (b) Polybius telleth a notable flory of two men that contending (b) 12. about a flave, the one having had him long in possession, the other got him into his hand two days before the Tryal, and then the former went and taking him away, possessed him the second time. The Judges referred the matter as an hard cafe to the Cosmopolis, who determined in favour of the first and last possessor; but the other contended with him about the fense of the Law, to whom he offered that both of them should go with ropes about their necks and dispute about it. The young man told him, he was old, and expecting but three or four years longer to live, dying now would be no great loss to him, whereas he expecting a far longer time, according to the course of nature, should have the far worse bargain; with which facete reply he handsomly ended the dispute, and the Judges confirmed the opinion of the Cosmopolis. 50. When Dionysius recovered his Principality over Syracuse, the Citizens were more inclining to one Hicetas born amongst them, who at that time was Lord of Leontium; yet notwithstanding all their attempts he kept his possession. Bur within awhile the Carthaginians from without invaded them, being thus at odds plaints in within arrows themselves which a calculate the contract the most themselves within a carthaginians that a carthaginian within a car within amongst themselves, which constrained the Syracusians to send, and beg aid of Corinth their Metropolis. Hiceras with the Messengers sent some of his own, as defiring the same thing; but held secret intelligence with the Carthaginians. The Corinthians resolving to send aid to their Colony, pitched upon Timoleon for their Captain. He was the fon of Timodemus or Timenatus, of a quiet and loving difpolition, but a great Enemy to fuch as maftered their Neighbours, which he shewed effectually against his own brother, whom, having made himself Lord of Corinib by the help of some Mercenaries, he gave way to have killed, being in the room, and burfting out into tears, whilft his two companions did it. Some accounting this act as unnatural and impious, though others commended it, he thereupon abstained from all imployment for twenty years, till this charge was

East. wrote to Carinha, Occ., that he might be advanced into the place of Dionyfins, wrote to Corinth to stop their proceedings, and procured the Carthaginians to fend to forbid Timoleon from ferting foot in Sicily. He belieged Dionylius, but rifing up upon other thoughts and returning homewards, the belieged followed him, and falling on his rear, forced him to fight. Having the better in this ingagement, he killed three thousand of Dionysius his men; then pursuing the rest to Syracuse, got it all into his hands, except the Island. Timoleon being more earnestly pressed forwards by his fellow Citizens, upon discovery of Icetas his treachery, though he fell into the hands of the Carthaginians fent from him to intercept him, yet escaped, and arrived in Sicily with ten ships and twelve hundred men. The feveral Cities in the Island being accustomed to be deceived and ill used by others, suspected him also; but finding the Inhabitants of Adranum to be part for him and part for the Carthaginians, he using admirable expediton, fell sudainly upon the Enemies Camp, which taking, he was admitted into the Town. After this diverse other places joyned with him, and with speed marching to Syracule, he unexpectedly also broke into the City.

51. Syracuse was now held by three several parties, Timoleon's, and that of Dionysius, and Leetas, in so many several quarters; moreover the Carthaginians were in the Haven with an hundred and fifty Gallies, which carried fifty thousand men. It troubled Timoleon to fee himfelf overmatched, but prefently things turned very well for him. Ten ships came loaden with men and money from Corinth to his aid, and Mamercus Tyrant of Catana, and diverse forts joyned themselves to him. which so discouraged the Carthaginians, as they weyed anchor and departed into their own dominions : Iceras being destitute of their affishance was quite discouraged, and Mellana now also declared for Timoleon. hands, whom he suffered upon his delivery of the Castle, and laying down his ochi 19. Principality, to depart Corinth, some four years after the recovery of his former Philipping 18: estate. Thenceforth, having lost all by his fluggishness, he lived in great contempt who liveth in and penury, fo as he would walk up and down in poor ragged cloathes, frequent the Stewes and drinking houses, gaze upon that meat in the shambles which he had no money in his purse to buy, and at last took upon him the office of a Pædagogue, in which he might best imitate his former carriage towards his Subjects, in tyrannizing over his boys. 52. Izeras very unwilling to lose his hopes of preferment, procured the Carthaginians to return to Syracuse. Mago filled the Haven with his Ships, and landing fixty thousand men, pitched his Camp in the City; Icetas then laid fiege to the Castle, which the Corinthians now held from the resignment of Dionysius. Timoleon relieved them by Provisions sent from Catana in little Vessels through the Carthaginian Fleet; whereupon Icetas and Maga drew out a strong party and be-platath fieged Catana, after whose departure, Leon Captain of the Corinthians fallied out of the Castle, and falling upon the besiegers lying in a secure and careless posture, killed some, and, the other flying, took Achradina the strongest quarter of the City. This the two Generals understanding, quickly faced about and returned; but milfed of both places, out of a defire to possels both. Timoleon having secured Meslana, returned with four thousand men towards Syracuse, whereupon Mago for fear hoifed up fails and departed for Africk, having by his laziness and cowardize loft a fair opportunity of reducing all Sicily into the power of his Superiours. Afterwards Timoleon dividing his men, fet upon fuch places of the City as Hicetas yet retained, and by force got them all into his power, without any bloodfhed of his Timolion reco- own party: then threw he down all the Fortifications and Monuments of the Tyvereth Syracssis, own party: then times he down at the Pottheathons and Mondinents of the Ty-and setten the rants, except Gelon's Statue, calling the People to the work by a publick Crier. Then he applied himself to making of Laws agreeable to a Popular Government, which yet he endeavoured but to little purpose so to restrain, as to prevent the inconveniences which formerly had their rife from too much popularity. In explaining and illustrating Diocles his Laws, he used the help of Cephalus, and Dionysius, both Corinthians. He ordained a new annual and chief Magistrate, whom he would have called the Servant of Fupiter Olympius, in memory of their re- Sect. 2. covered liberty, commanding that by his name the year should be signed, as by the Archons at Athens, and the Confids at Rome. The first that bore this Office was Callimedes, a man of prime note, being chosen by the Suffrages of the People. Now whereas by reason of Wars, Seditions, and Banishments, the City was even exhausted, he recalled the Exiles out of Sicily, Greece, and Mia, which being in number ten thousand, he increased by a far greater, consisting of Sicilians and Italians of Greekifb Original, to whom being made free of the City, he distributed Lands and Possessions.

53. Icetas having retired to Leontium, Timoleon laid fiege to that City; but finding it strongly manned, rose up from before it, and went about to other places, to which he restored liberty, expelling their Tyranni. In this mean while Icetas went against Syracuse; but was forced to retreat with great loss. Timoleon's renown was by this time fo spread abroad, that many Towns of the Sicanians, and others subject to the Carthsginians, fint to him, to desire they might be admitted into the social League. The Carthsginians herein were so concern'd, as to prepare amain for the renewing of the War, procuring Soldiers out of Gall, Liguria, Spain, and Africk. Mago had killed himself after his shameful return, and his dead body was nailed to a Cross for the mal-administration of his Office; therefore in the third year after they fent over Adrubal and Amilear, with two hundred long-ships, and above one thousand of burthen, wherein were so many men transported as made up those already in Sicily feventy thousand Foot, and ten thousand Horse, which with warlike Chariots marched against Timoleon. He having composed the difference with Hicetas mustered all his forces, and judging it wildom to transfer the War into the Enemies Country, for this purpose he chose out of all twelve thousand men, with which he marched away in hafte; but in his journy a great mutiny happened amongst his Soldiers. For one Thrasias a rash impudent fellow, who with the Phocians had rifled the Temple at Delphos, cried out, that Timoleon being mad, led them into most certain death, for that the Carthaginians in number so far exceeded them: and he advised the Mercenaries to return to Syracuse, and demand the pay already due to them. Timoleon had much ado to take up the matter, and one thousand utterly refused to follow him. But he rejoyced that the mutineers had already fallen off, before they came to any ingagement, and with the reft hafted toward the Enemy. 54. By the convenience of a mift he got near to the Enemy undiscried, then lying upon the River Crimefus. Ten thousand of the Carthaginians passing the River, he fell down upon them from the hills, and made great flaughter, and their friends coming in to their relief, the fight was sharply renewed, and the Carthaginians by their great numbers began to incompass the other round, when fell fuch a ftorm, as, together with the valour of the Greeks, forced them to to their heels. Flying into the River by heaps, the Foot amongst the Horse, and Chariots, multitudes perifhed, being either pressed, wounded to death by the fwords of their Companions, drowned through the swiftness of the stream then increased by rain, or elfe killed by the Enemy on their backs: the Sacred band so called confifting of two thousand and five hundred of the choicest Soldiers, fighting most valiantly, all died in the place. Near upon thirteen thousand were flain, and fifteen thousand taken, with two hundred Chariots (the greatest part whereof was broken in pieces) and one thousand brigandines with ten thousand shields; though most of the Arms were swallowed up in the water: Those Carthaginians that remained, in great confternation escaped to Lilibaum. Their friends at Carthage hearing of their defeat, were in no little fear, out of conceit that Timoleon would now come over thither. Wherefore they recalled Gifco the brother of Hanno out of banishment, and made him General of the Army, which they raised with money out of other Nations, not thinking it meet to thrust themselves into such danger for the time to come. But Timoleon returning to Syracuse, found it a convenient time to punish the mutiniers, whom he banished Sieily, commanding them to depart the City before Sun-set. Passing over into Sieily they seized on a Town amongst the Brutii, who rifing and befieging them, took the place, and therein put them all to

55. Hiceras often mentioned before, and Mamercus Tyrannus of Catana joyned with the Carthaginians against Timoleon, perswading them, for fear of losing their share in Sicily, to send over some Forces. Sicily, which at this time had enflaved many Cities of the Island. Mamercus fled over into Italy, and Catana was delivered up to Timoleon, who betook himself to Meffana, where he belieged Hippo both by Land and Sea, and taking him in his flight, delivered him up to the Citizens, who put him to death. Mamercus yielded himself to Timoleon, who having promised him he would not be his accu-fer, he cast himself upon the People of Syracuse, but perceiving them as he began but also for judices and statuas: Moreover the word Consulere is many times taken of Learned Men concerning this Office. Some derive it from the duty or work of confulting the Senate, which was incumbent upon the Confuls. Others interpret it of judging, which, faith (a) Lipsus, I only read in (b) Quintilian, who (a) he Magiputs the question, whether Consul was so named from consulting, or judging, see-first top-Rom. ing that consulere was used also for the later, whence arose that phrase: Rogat (b) Lib. 1.6.9. boni Confulat, that is, judices; but not only Quintilian, but Festus also, in the word Confulat, giveth this Etymology. Lastly, some derive it from the end of the Office, which was consulere, or providere, as (c) Florus and Fustinian's Code, (c) Liking. But those Magistrates were not first of all named Consules but Pratores, which name, although it was common to others, yet stuck to them by way of excellency. (d) Festus faith it expresly; and so doth (e) fustinian in his Novella (d) in voc. Constitutiones. Xonaras faith the name of Prator continued till the December; who (1) 24,6 25. being banished, then at length crept in the name of Conful. But he should rather have faid, that then the name of Fudex crept in; for it appeareth out of Livy, that they were called Fudices next after Prators, before the name of Confuls came in. The Historian in his third Book speaking of such things as hapned in the first year after the writing of the twelve Tables addeth: In these times it was the custom not to call the Conful by the name of Fudex, but Prator. (f) Varro out of antient Com. (f) to time. mentaries confirment this, and (g) Ciero giveth the Etymology of all thele Latinath of Offices thus, a precundo, judicando, consulendo, Pretores, Fudices, Consuler appel lis. lantur. Some upon good grounds conjecture, that after the creation of Prators, who were peculiar Judges, the name of Fudex was left, and that of Conful fucceeded, which continued to the last.

Their power.

2. The power of Confuls was at first the same with that of Kings, allayed only by plurality of persons and shortness of time, so that Cicero calleth it Regium Imperium, and Regia Potestas, and the Greeks chose to call them Hypatoi, which fignifieth those that are most excellent or chief, as Dionysius telleth us. In the beginning they might imprison and sentence at their pleasure, having the power of life and death over the Citizens, though scarce the authority to make Peace and War, as Lipfius affirmeth. By degrees this great power was diminished, and that especially by two things, viz. Appeal, and Interposing, called Provocatio and Intercoffic. The former was prefently brought in after the ban-Ggg 2

Sect 1. ishment of the Kings, by Valerius Poplicola, who preferred a Law for taking away animadversion upon Citizens from the Confuls, and giving liberty of Appeal to the People as the higher Judge. But by the Interposition of the Tribunes of the People who were afterwards created, all actions of the Confuls whatfoever might be obstructed, as by the voice of the People it felf, whose power and dignity thenceforth daily increased, and took authority over all Magistrates. Hereby was that of the Consuls much diminished, Yet not quite broken and diffolved as long as the Commonwealth continued; their Offices being both man, and large. For first they were the head of the State, all or-dinary Magistrales being subject and obnoxious to them, (except the Tribunes) in whose actions they might interpose. Secondly, they had the chief Command in the War over Civizens and Affociates, as also over Provinces and Subjects, whom they might punish; and Authority to appoint Officers in the Army, as appeareth out of Cicero and Polybius in several places. Thirdly, they assembled the People, confulted with it, preferred Laws also, which if enacted bore their Names. Fourthly, they received Letters from Governours of Provinces, from Nations and Cities: gave audience to Ambaffadors, and what was to be done either by Senate or People passed through their Hands as chief Ministers of State. Fifthly, as the Senate handled and executed all things in Peace and War, fo did they govern it in some Sence, they affembled and dismissed it: therein they asked the Members their opinions, counted and divided them : and in conclusion they steered the Ship of the Commonwealth. This was their Power while the free State continued; but after it was subjected to the power of one Person, their Authority was again much impaired, few of all these Privileges remaining to them; for that the Prince assumed the Rights of all Magistrates, but especially those of the Consuls and Tribunes. Under the Emperors they were employed in confulting the Senate, administring Justice, assigning Tutors or Guardians, manumitting Slaves, letting out to farm the Customs (which Office formerly belonged to the Cenfors) and managing publick Games : belides, they had the honour of having the year Characterized by their Names, as formerly. These things will be sufficiently evinced (at least most of them) in the sequel of this History concerning Roman Affairs.

Certain Rites concerning

3. There were observed certain Consular Rites, which it will rather behove us in this place to relate, than scatteringly hereafter to give an account of them. First of all the time wherein the Consuls assumed their Office was not set or conftant, but various, till the year of the City five hundred and thirty two, when A. M. 3676. both they and other Magistrates entred on the Calends of Fanuary, having before, as * Simpson and others observe, Commenced on the Calends of Quintilis called Fuly, as well as at other times. The first day was an high day, and very creditable to them, the Senate and people meeting at their Houses, faluting, and accompanying them to the Capitol, where they took their Oaths and Sacrifized. Thence they went to the Senate House, where they were ordered by a Senatus-Confultum to give thanks to the Prince of the Senate; then fent they Gifts to their Friends, and threw Money to the People, which later expense was afterwards taken away by the Emperors, and appropriated to the repairing of aquaducts. They twice fwore to govern according to the Laws (as all other Magistrates did, none being to keep his Office above five days, except publickly fworn) when first they entred; once in the Capitol, and then again in the Rostra, in their hands to whom they succeeded: and at the laying down of their Office again at the years end they fwore in like manner, that wittingly and willingly they had done nothing, contrary to the faid Laws. Another Rite there was, as Liplius termeth it, about their power, which thereby was so increased as to become as absolute as the Kingly was. This was only upon an extraordinary occafion, or in extream necessity, when all lay at the Stake, and the City was in danger. Then a Decree of the Senate passed in this form: Viderint Consules nequid Resp. detrimenti accipiat, or Dent operam Consules nequid Resp. detrimenti Capiat, as * Sallust hath it, who addeth, that this greatest Power was * De billo given by the Senate to these Magistrates, to raise Forces, make War, all manner catalis. of ways to punish Citizens, and Associates, to have, both at home, and abroad in War, absolute Command and judiciary Power. Otherwise without the command of the People no Consul could do any of these things. In a word, by this Decree was reflored to them that power (or rather more given) which was taken away by the Appeal, and other Laws.

(a) Tacitus observeth, that of old it was lawful at any age to sue for the (a) Annal. Confullbip, and the supream power of Dittator. But afterwards being taught lib. 17. otherwise by experience (in the five hundred and seventy third year of the City) the Romans thought fit to fet bounds to juvenile heat and ambition. This was, as (b) Livy writeth, by a Law which L. fulius (or Villius) Tri- (b) Lib. 10: bune of the People preferred, whereby was limited a certain age before which it was not lawful to stand for any place of Magistracy; but from Cicero it should rather appear that there were feveral Laws made for the feveral Offices; and at length the Lex fulia or Annaria, included, and abolished all the rest. For (c) Philipica 5. (1) Que mills Cicero (e) declareth the fourty third year to have been the age of Confulfhip, faying, that Alexander the great having died in his thirty third year, came ten years short of the Confular age. If his words be taken strictly, the fourty third, but if more largely, the fourty fecond was the year, and this rather as many examples do confirm. A grave age became this most grave and weighty Office; but sometimes the People dispensed with the Law, as will be shewn, the Emperours neglected it, and Casar Distator before them, who made Dolabella Conful at twenty five. Lastly, as for the Term or duration of the Confulfhip, it was annual, as we before hinted in Brutus his Model, and so continued, till Fulius Cafar made several in one year, so that afterwards Confuls were nominated for three, two, and one moneth, and others substituted one after another. Hence came it to pass that there were two forts of Confuls, Ordinary and Substitute, the former beginning on the Calends of Fanuary, and the later at other times. This custom continued till Constantine, who again made the Office Annual, and instead of the Suffecti, or Substitute, ordained a new kind, called Confulares, and Confules Honorarii, whose Office was not called Confulatus, but Confularitas, having derived its Original from the Confular Ornaments invented by fulius Cefar. Of this titular promotion (f) Caf- [f] Lib. 61 findorus is to be consulted. 5. But (to come to the matter in hand) the first Consuls were L. Funius Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus, who began this Office, according to (a) Di- (a) Lib. 5: onysius his Computation, in the beginning of the fixty eight Olympiad, wherein Ischomachus of Crotone was Victor, Isarus being Archon at Athens. Because they could not deny that many good things had been done by Kings for the A. M. 3496. Commonwealth, they would have the name preferved for ever in the State, 01.67. and 4. and therefore gave order to the Pontifices and Angurs to chuse out some one, who Datil 13. taking care of Superstition, and being exempted from War, should be called Rex Sacrificulus, to which Office allotted unto the Patritians, Manilis Papirius of that Order first attained. Next after this, fearing that the People might have, as they well might, an ill opinion of their intentions, and fay that for one they had got two Kings; to diminish Envy, whereas each of them had as yet twelve Axes carried before them, as the Kings used to have, they ordered that but one of them should have twelve Axes, and the other twelve Lictors with Rods alone, and each his Moneth should have the Axes. This contained the People better in obedience, as other things whereby they laboured to render themselves popular. For they revived the Laws of Servius Tullius, concerning publick Meetings and Affemblies, withother things which conduced to the fatisfaction of the common fort, who now looked upon their lawless liberties as recovered.

6. Tarquinius after his banishment first stayed at Gabii for some time, whither many of his party flocking to him, after he could not prevail with them of that place to make War in his behalf against the Romans, he betook himself into Toscany, or Hetruria, where he could claim kindred by his Mother, and there winning mens minds by his munificence, and moving them with his Tears, he procured Ambassadors to be sent to Rome in his behalf. First they moved that he might be received again, promising on his behalf very good demeanour for the time to come, and when this equity could not be heard, they (or others fent afterwards, as Plutarch writeth) defired he might have his Goods,

Sect. 1. especially such as were descended upon him from Tarquinius Priscus his Grandsather, who had in no wife ill deserved of them. Brutus, according to his furious and malicious temper, very vehemently opposed it, saying, that it would shew little forecast in them to furnish him with money to imploy against themselves; but his Collegue was for reftoring the goods, and prevailed to have the Decree pass on his side, by one Vote only overpowering the contrary party, according to Dionysius. The Ambassadors having it in charge to labour with the friends of Tarquinius, that they might do fomething effectually, drew out the time in length, pretending they wanted carriages, and must fell such things as could not be removed. They flayed fo long as to draw over to them fome of the two notable families of the Aquillii and Vitellii, viz. two persons of this, and three of that. Of all these Collatinus the Consul was Uncle; and Brutus also had married the fifter of the Vitellii, by which he had several Children, where. of two youths they drew in, having convinced them of their fathers vehemency, madness, and folly, and given them good hopes of great things to be done for them

> 7. These men met in the house of the Aquillii to ripen their business. There in the dark, a certain flave, Vindicius by name, fearing to be found in that room when they came in, and not with any intent to hearken, had himself behind a & Platnih. Cheft, and heard their whole debate concerning their purpose of killing the Con- in Poplicals. fuls; about which they gave Letters then to the Ambassadors (who lodged in the house, and were present at the meeting) to be delivered to Tarquinius. The Slave in this case knew not how to carry himself; for, to go to Brutus, and to accuse his own sons to him seemed an hard and bold attempt, as also no less to do it unto Tarquinius their Uncle; no private person he knew to whom he might communicate to great a matter, and yet a thing of fuch confequence he thought was not to be buried in filence, nor yet the discovery thereof deferred. At length he betook himself to P. Valgrius, who had also a great hand in casting out the King. Valerius exceedingly struck with the thing, that he might proceed warily, first secured the slave to have him forth-coming, then sending his brother Marcus to feize the King's house, and watch the servants there, that they should carry away no Letters, he himself with his Clients and Friends went to the house of the Aquillii, where he got into his hands what was written to Tarquinius. The Aquillii being abroad met him at the Gate, where they endeavoured to recover by force the Letters from him, but he through the help of those about him drew them into the Forum, as his brother also having seized on other Letters at the King's house, forced some of his servants thither. The tumult being appealed by the Confuls, Vindicius related the Story, and the Letters were read. The parties faid nothing for themselves; all were astonished and silent; at length some to flatter Brutus mentioned banishment; Collatinus shedding tears gave the prisoners hope, and this was increased because Valerius held his peace.

8. But furious and implacable Brutus calling both his Sons by their names (Titus and Tiberius) asked them why they faid nothing to what was laid to their charge, and when they answered not at the third time, he turned to the Lictors or Executioners, and faid, Now is it your part to perform the rest. They prefently took the youths, and stripping them tied their hands behind them: then to death his did they bear with rods, and after that beheaded them, he, whilst others could stripping them tied their hands behind them: not behold to abhominable a spectacle, feeding his angry eyes with the object, till all was done. Then left he the rest to the discretion of his Colleague and departed; after which a flupidity, horror, and amazement, as the things required, for a time possessed all. Collatinus his backwardness and delay incouraged the Aquilii to defire time to answer, and that Vindicius their Slave might be given up to them, and not continue in the hands of their accusers. The Conful was about to do both, when Valerius who kept the Slave all this while in the midft of his followers, would neither deliver him, nor fuffer the People to depart without censuring the accused, though Collatinus was ready to dismiss the Affembly. He laid hands upon the Aquilit, and fent for Brutus, crying out, that Collatinus did unworthily, to impose upon his Colleague a necessity of killing his fons, and think of granting the lives of the other unto Women. The Conful being vexed, commanded the Littors to take away Vindicius, fo that they laying hands on him, wounded those that kept him, and Valerius his friends fight ng in his behalf, the People cried out for Brutus. When he came he faid, that by his full authority he had animadverted upon his own Sons, and left the other delinquents to the People, giving leave to every man to speak.

CHAP. IV. The Persian Empire.

There was no need of this, faith Plutarch (though Dionysius relateth a great Sect. 1. The reft be- contest between the two Consuls) but the Rabble called to the vote, condemned them by all their Suffrages, according to which Sentence they were beheaded. Collatinus now, who for being akin to the King had been suspected, and whose name was hateful to the People, having by his carriage in this business offended the Generality, voluntarily laid down his Office and departed from the City, feeing now to what a fad pass he had helped to bring things, and too late repenting of his Rebellion. To him succeeded Valerius (the Comitia being held for an Election) whom Bratus much defired to have had his Colleague at first, but that the greatness of Collatinus carried it from him.

Valerius Con-

9. Valerius being with the good-will of all the Multitude created Conful; thought the first Fruits of his Office due to Vindicius, whom manumitted he made free of the Commonwealth, this privilege being given to him first of all Liberti or Freed-men, according to Plutarch (which Appius long after communicated to them all) and from him a perfect and full manumiffion had the name of Vindicta. Dionys. 116. 5. This done, the Confuls gave the Goods of the King to be rifled by the People, Livins lib. 2. demolished his House, and laid the Campus Martins which he had to himself, L. 1. 6.8 open as before, wherein lying Corn cut down already, they threw it into the Platar. in Pa-River, and fending Trees that grew there after it, these receiving Gravel and plicals. fuch Rubbish that came down the Chancl, at last grew into an Island called Fiftus in voce Infula Sacra; though some say, this happened in after times, when Tarquinia bifula a Vestal Nun gave the adjoyning Field to the Publick, and for that obtained great Honours, as these amongst the rest; of all Women alone to appear as a Witness in any cause, and liberty to marry, which she refused. But Tarquinius feeing that reason failed, betook himself to Force, and brought a great Army of Tuscans against Rome. The Consuls opposed him with another, and when they came to joyn, Aruns the Son of Tarquin, and Brutus the Consul, with greater wrath and Fury than discretion, singled out each other, and so carelelly demeaned themselves, as both of them lost their Lives. A great and bloody Bat-

tel was fought betwixt the Armies, which Night only broke up, and that with fuch equal Fortune, as neither party could boath it felf, till at length either by a A. M. 3497. Valerius triumphed at his return to the City (leaving an example to posterity which was duly followed) and then buried his Colleague with great Honour, making himfelf a funeral Oration in his commendation, which cuftom Dionysius will have more antient at Rome than in Greece; although Anaximenes wrote that Solon was the Author of it.

10. But when the People confidered how Brutus the Father of their liberty. Pulmius susper as they accounted him, would not govern alone without a Colleague, and yet Valerius made no haste to take a Partner, they began to complain, that he had not taken to himself so much the place of Brutus (which yet not at all belonged to him) but that of Tarquinius, and were much offended with hims They confirmed themselves in their hard opinion, from his having all the Rods and Axes carried before him, and with them, in greater state than Tarquinius used, marched from his House, which was much larger than the Palace that he demolished. His House was very fair, situate in such a place as afforded him prospect round about, and had a difficult ascent; so that the convenience of the Site, confidered with his Kingly port and attendance, feemed to threaten their infant Commonwealth, now an Orphan by Brutus his Death. His Friends remonftrating to him these particulars, he contended not; but that very night sent for Carpenters, who demolished the House ere morning: the next day the People were presented with a New and unexpected Sight, which fully altered their opinion concerning Valerius, who now wanting an House of his own, was glad to accept of the Courtefie of Friends, till the People gave him a place, wherein he built a Mansion less stately than the former. Further, that he m ght render not only himself, but also his Office, in stead of Terrible, familiar and acceptable to all, he removed Axes from the bundle of Rods, and, the Rods themselves, when he came into the Assembly, he bowed or vailed to the People, thereby intimating, that in them lay the chief Power; which custom his Successors followed. Hereby, as to his own Person, he les-

ned not himself, but cut off Envy, and got so much Power, as he renounced

He gave free leave to any to fue for the Confulship, but before a Colleague should be joyned with him, being ignorant what might happen, and fearing he might either through emulation or ignorance crofs his designs, by his fole authority, he gave birth to several Popular Constitutions, which at length produced such effects as shewed the excellency of that Government which he had helped to destroy.

His confti-

11. First he filled up the Senate which had been exhausted, by an addition of one hundred and fixty four Persons, as some delivered the number. Then made he feveral Laws, which gave beginning to that paramount or rampant liberty, whereof the People were afterwards possessed. By one he gave leave to an accufed person, to appeal from the Consuls to the People. By another, he made it death for any one to take upon him an Office of Magistracy without the People's order. A third gave relief to poor Citizens, by taking away the payment of Tribute. Another punished disobedience towards the Confuls, and appointed the mulct to be the price of five Oxen, and two Sheep: the price of a Sheep was ten Oboli (each Obolus was worth 1 d. q.) and one hundred the value of an Oxe. For at that time the use of money was but rare amongst the Romans; wealth confifting in plenty of Cattel, whence riches were afterwards called Peculia from Pecus, and upon the antient money an Oxe, Sheep, or Hog was stamped, which gave it the name of Pecunia: and hence they imposed upon their fons (as Plutarch observeth) the names of Suillii, Bubulci, Caprarii, and Porcii. Another Law Valerius made, which gave power to any man to kill him unheard, that affected the Supreme Power, if he could demonstrate the crime. The last was a Law for the creation of two Questors or publick Treasurers, as Plutarch writeth. For it being necessary that the People should contribute money for maintenance of Wars, he would neither undertake the keeping of it himself, nor commit the care of it to his friends, neither thought it convenient that the Publick money should be kept in a private house: therefore he made the Temple of Saturn the Erarium, or Treasury, and caused the People to chuse out The Questions, two young men to be Questions. The first were P. Veturius, and M. Minucius. A great quantity of money was now brought into the Erarium. For at the Census one hundred and thirty thousand were cessed or valued, besides Widdows and Orphans. Thus much Plutarch delivereth concerning this

12. But some give a more antient beginning to the Questors, making theirs antienter than any Office, except that of Kings. (a) Gracchanus a Lawyer (a) Lib. de wrote, that both Romulus and Numa had their Quaftors, created by the confent (b) Lib. de of the People; however he faith it is certain that Tullus Hostilius had his. (b) officio Quality Ulpian confirmeth the later, and (c) Tacitus seemeth to agree with either of them, affirming that under the Kings there were Quaffors, which the Lex curiata fleweth, that was renewed by L. Brutus. He addeth, that the Confuls had power to chuse them, till the People took that honour to it self, and first of all created Valerius Potitus, and Emilius Mamercus, that they might follow the Army, in the fixty third year after the banishment of Tarquinius. Lipsius thinketh this number should be read twenty three, that it might agree with (d) Dionysius, and also (d) Lib. 8. (e) Livy, who first mentioneth the Questors in the two hundred and fixty ninth year (f) Lib. 3. of the City, twenty three years after the banishment of the King, and differ-(f) Lib. 2.f. eth only in one of their names, having for Amilius, Cafo Fabius. They had their name à querendo faith (g) Varro, because they made in 102.22.1x quiry after publick money, and also Malefactors, or the actions of such, which scales. later employment was afterwards committed to the Triumviri for capital matters, fo that Quaftor is written as for Quaftor. Fullus Liplius is of opinion, that though the Kings might have these Officers for the punishment of Vice, yet the Treaturers were not created till the change of the Government, when the publick Treafure being increased there was need of such. At the beginning they were but two by confent of all; and those were made for the City, retaining afterwards to accompany the Confuls, as Livy faith, which hapned about the two hundred and thirty fecond year of the City. 23. This number long continued, until all Italy was brought in; then was the name of Urbani. But afterward when they were to look to the paying of the Armies abroad, and felling plunder and booty, then were there other two made, it again doubled, no fewer than eight being thought to fuffice for the Tributes of the Provinces; and this hapned when Silver money was first coined, about the four hundred and thirty ninth year of the City, as may be gathered from the Epitome of Livin's fifteenth Book. Not long after Sylla procured by a Law, that twenty should be made for the assistance of the Senate, as Tacitus writeth, to which he had delivered the judicial power: and for fuch an end did Cefar cause fourty to be created. The Questorship was the first step to Offices of Magistracy. Their duty, as is clear from feveral Authors, was to gather, lay up, and pay out the publick revenues, to keep the military Enfigns of Gold and Silver (for they then used no Banners) in the Treasury; to sell plunder and booty, receive, lodge, and carry out Ambassadors. They had also the government of certain places, as Offia and Cales. They received from Augustus the privilege of keeping the Senatus consulta, which formerly belonged to the Adiles and Tribes. And the Emperours had a certain Quaftor of their own called Candidatus Principis, and Questor Principis, or Augusti, whose Office Ulpian describeth. This gave original to the Questor Palatii (faith Lipsius) to whom was granted great authority, as to make Laws and Decrees, subscribe Petitions, return answers, and to be as it were the keeper or President of the Laws, which name is now changed into Chancellour. But, to speak something of the Tressury, the Temple of Sa-The detailed turn was first made use of to this purpose, as Plusarch telleth us. Here also were kept the Libri elephantini, Books wherein the thirty five Tributes were written, and the Decrees of the Senate; but the Libri Linter, or the Annals, were kept by the Pontifices, who therein recorded fuch things as were memorable. In the Ærarium was also a more secret place, where the twentieth part of the revenues were referved for cases of extremity only. The Ararium was afterwards called Fiscas, from the Fiscella, or bags wherein the money was kept, according to Var-70. The first Advocatus Fifei was instituted by Adrian the Emperour, as Spartianus wirnesseth. Amongst other tributes, the People of Rome had the twentieth part of all revenues of Corn throughout Italy, befides Salt, which was the device of Livy, thence Sirnamed Salinator. Those that farmed the Tributes of Custom were called Publicans, and the principal of them Mancipes, according to Pedianus, whom Volateranus followeth.

CHAP. IV.

14. Valerius Poplicola having finished his constitutions of Setlement, held the Affembly of the People for the election of another Consul. Lucretius the father tondial Con- of Lucretia was cholen, to whom, as the elder, Poplicola granted the Fasces or bundle of Rods; which respect of age was ever observed by their Successors, till the time of (a) Plutareh, as himself writeth. This granting of the Fasces (a) newswas yet but for the first month, which indeed afterwards was wont to be granted colato the elder Conful; but no longer than till the Lex Fulia, in the feventh Chapter, whereof this privilege was given to him who had most children, either fill in his own power (that is to Be understood not Emanicipated) or already loft in War. Burif both Confuls had an equal number of children, he who at prefent was a married man was preferred. If both were husbands and fathers alike, then the antient cultom returned, and he who was eldest had first the Esses. Concerning such who were both unmaried, had the same number of children, or were both maried and had no children, the Law commanded nothing. But I hear, faith (b) Gellius, that those who were exempted, were wont to yield the (b) Not Attic. Fasces of the first month to their Colleagues that far exceeded them in age, or 100 200. 15 in birth, or entred upon their fecond Confulfhlp. In the mean time that Conful who had no Fasces, that he might be known by some note of distinction, had an (2) Di Ling.

Horatius, who continued the Colleague of Poplicols for the remaining part of the year. Now was the Capitol finished which had been vowed by Tarquinius Priscus, and begun by Superbus his grand son. Poplicola had a great ambition to dedicate it, but the Nobility envied him the honour, and flirred up Horatius to fland for it, whom when the other was constrained to be absent in the War, they injoyned by a Decree to do it, and carried him up thither, knowing that in the presence of Poplicola they could not have prevailed. Some write, that by lot the War fell to Poplicola much against his will, and the Dedication to Horatius. On the Ide: of September, which fell in with the full Moon of the Greek month Metagituton (answering to August the twenty eighth of the fulian year, ratius having commanded filence, and finished all the usual rites, touched the door, and pronounced the words of Dedication. Then Marcus the brother of Poplicola standing near for that purpose, and watching for an opportunity, said, Thy Son O Consul is dead in the Camp, whereat when all others were struck, Horatius nothing diffurbed answered only, Then cast him out whither you please, for I admit not of mourning, and went on with the matter in hand. Neither was the ftory true, but feigned by Marcus to deter him from the Dedication. The same fortune hapned to the Dedication of the second Temple of Fupiter Capitolinus, after this was burnt in the Civil Wars. For Sylla having rebuilt it died before the Dedication, as Tarquinius was banished, and so that honour came to Catu-Ins. When this had perished in the sedition of Vitellius, Vespatian built the third, and was herein more fortunate than Sylla, that, as he died before the Dedication of his, so the Emperour lived not to see the destruction of this, which presently after his death was also burned. The fourth which stood in Plutareh's time was both built and Dedicated by Domitian. Tarquinius, as was reported, spent fourty thousand pounds of silver in founding his Temple; but the fourth was not guilded for so little as the wealth of the richest private man. The Marble Pillars Plutarch saw at Athens, being then of a thickness answerable to their length, but afterward when they were new cut at Rome, they got not so much splendor as they lost of proportion and beauty, being rendred too slender in bulk or fame year that Horatius succeeded, though not immediately, into the place of P. 160. Brutus, who with Tarquinius his Colleague governed but four months) when the Temple of fupiter Capitolinus was Consecrated, twenty eight years before Xerxes his expedition into Greece, the first League was made betwixt the Romans and Carthaginians. Herein it was provided, that the Romans should not fayl beyond the Fair Promontory, which lay before Carthage towards the North. Polybius thinketh the cause was, for that the Carthaginians would not have them take notice of the places about Byzacium, nor the little Syrtis; which for the fruitfulness of the soyl they termed Emporia. But if it happed that any, either by Tempests or Pirats, were forced in thither, they promised they would furnish them with all things necessary, but forbad any thing to be taken by force, and commanded all to be gone thence within five days. It was lawful hereby for the Romans to Traffick to Carthage, and all that part of Africk which lieth on this fide the Fair Promontory, as also Sardinia, and that part of Sicily then under the Carthaginians, who promife upon their publick faith that all Justice shall be duly executed. From this League it appeareth that the Carthaginians speak of Africk and Sardinia as absolutely their own, but far otherwise concerning Steils exprelly diffinguilhing of that part thereof which they had fubdued. The Romans also include in this League only Latium, making no menti on of the rest of Italy, which was not in their power. After this another League was made, or rather this renewed, wherein the Carthaginians comprized the Tyrians, and the People of Utica. To the Fair Promontory were added Mastia and Tarseium, beyond which it was neither lawful for the Romans to make any depredations, nor build a Town. These things Polybius observeth concerning these Leagues, which he also exemplifieth, and to which we refer Students in Hi-

Now were created Confuls Poplicala Plates piles the seond time being absent, and T. Facobus Capellus observeth that the Consuls commenced at this time of the year from the first of Poplicola, till fifteen years after, A: M: 3452 in the two hundred and fixty first year of the City. Sp. Cassus and Posthumius & 3507 Cominius began their Office a moneth fooner, viz. on the Calends of October. The reason might be, for that the new Moon sell in with the Autumnal Aquinottial on the twenty ninth of Julian September, from which the Pompilian, or Numan, September seemeth to have Commenced that year, the Moon increasing, increasing, although without order. For the Calends of October ought rather to have Sect. 1 been on that day; but such Errors were frequent in the Pompilian year, either through the negligence, or willful neglect of the I riefts. After the third year the Calends (or first day) of Fanuary recovered their true place, viz. the next new Moon to the Winter Solftice; but September obtained to be the beginning of the year until the two hundred and seventy eighth year of the City, wherein the Comitia for Creation of Confuls were cast back to the Calends of the moneth Sextilis (afterwards called August) at what time A. Cocles stood before the Bridge, and repulsed the Enemy so long till it was broken down behind him, which done, he cast himself armed as he was into the River, and swom out to his Friends, having received a Wound with a Spear. To requite him for the Lameness he contracted by this Wound, and in admiration of his Valour, Poplicola caused all the Romans to give him, every one fo much Provision as would serve one for a day, then conferred he on him fo much Ground as he could plow round about in one day, and they erected to his Memory a Statue in the Temple of Vulcan. 19. Mutius a man of excellent courage, and no less Skill in War, resolving with himself to lie in wait for the Life of Porfena, put on the Tufcan habit, and using that Language, came into the Kings Camp, where observing the place in A. M. 3498. which the King was, but being ignorant of his Person, he stabbed his Secretary V. C. 247. who fate with him amongst several others. Being taken in the Act, when they Dail. 15. went about to examine him, he thrust his right Hand into the Fire, as intending to punish it for so great a mistake, and whilst it burned beheld Porfena with a stedfast and angry Countenance, who admiring his resolution dismissed him. and reached him back his Sword from his Seat. Mutius took it with his left Hand (whence he had the name of Scavola, which Word fignifieth one that ufeth his left Hand, faith Plutarch) and telling the King that he was now overcome by his braveness of Spirit whose Threats he had contemned, he said in way of Requital he would reveal a thing to him which no force of Torment could have compelled him to discover. He affirmed there were three hundred Romans now in his Camp watching an opportunity to kill him. As for his part, having been by lot destined to make the first attempt, it did not trouble him that he had failed in killing him a right good man, and one much worthier of the Friendship than Hatred of the Romans. Porsena hearing this, inclined presently to a composure of the Difference, not so much out of sear of the three hundred, as admiration of the Roman Courage. Poplicola having notice hereof, was glad of fuch a Friend, and content to make him Umpire betwixt the Commonwealth and Tarquinius. He often challenged Tarquinius to put the matter to arbitration, to which the King answered couragiously, that he would not admit of any Judge, much less of Porsena, who having promised him aid now basely fallified his word.

Porsena hereat displeased, especially through the solicitation of drams his Son, made Peace with the Romans on these Conditions: that they should quit those

20. For the establishing of this Peace the Romans gave up twenty Hostages, Sect. 1. viz. ten young Youths, and as many Girles, amongst which was Valeria the Daughter of Poplicola. All Acts of Hostility ceasing, the young Virgins went down to the River to wash, and taking an opportunity, when none were present to hinder them, got over the Water, and returned home. Some reported, that one amongst them named Clalia went over on hors-back, and perswaded the rest to swim after. When they presented themselves to Poplicola, he neither admired their resolution, nor approved of their return, fearing it would be obiected as a breach of Faith to the Romans; so that apprehending them all, he fent them back to Porlena. Tarquinius aware hereof placed in ambush a party to entrap them and their Convoy; but Aruns the Son of Porfens hearing of it, came in, and rescued them out of danger. When Porsena saw them, he demanded which had been the cause of their departure, and finding Clalia the principal, bestowed on her one of his own Horses sumptuously adorned. Then to give a further Testimony of his respect towards the Romans, besides other things wherein he shewed his Magnificence, he commanded his Soldiers to depart out of the Camponly with their Arms, delivering up to the besieged his Tents surnished with Victuals, and all other good things. Therefore for a long time after, when publick Goods were fet to Sale, first of all the stuff of Porfena was cried, to preserve the memory of his kindness: and about the Court-house was erected his Statue in a plain and antient Fashion. For the next year Dionysius nameth as Confuls, Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius, of whom Livie maketh honourable mention, but not as executing his Office. He writeth that at the Bridge Sp. Largius and T. Herminius both nobly descended, together with Horatius Cocles, sustained the first brunt of the Hetruscans, but Learned men tell us that it ought to be written Lartius, not Largius.
